Fox,

Those who voted in the negative are: Cassidy, Crites, Harris, of Hamilton; Johnson of Williams; Peters, Stevens.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 166—Mr. Stilwell. To submit an amendment to article II, by adding section 33 of the constitution.—Relative to liens.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 33. Laws may be passed to secure to mechanics, artisans, laborers, sub-contractors and material men, their just dues by direct lien upon the property, upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material. No other provision of the constitution shall impair or limit this power.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. Nye arose to a question of privilege and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 241, by Mr. Dwyer. His name being called, Mr. Nye voted aye.

Mr. Peck arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 241, by Mr. Mr. Dwyer. His name being called, Mr. Peck voted aye.

Mr. Thomas arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 241, by Mr. Dwyer. His name being called, Mr. Thomas voted aye.

Mr. Harter, of Huron, arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 241 by Mr. Dwyer. His name being called, Mr. Harter, of Huron, voted aye.

Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, moved that Proposals Nos. 272 and 329 be informally passed on the calendar.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: So that we may come to a conclusion as to what we desire to do the rest of the week and beginning with Monday, and only for the purpose of bringing the matter to your attention, I desire to move that when the Convention adjourns today it be until two o'clock Monday afternoon.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 322—Mr. Bowdle.

The SECRETARY: You will find the amendment on page 11 of the journal of April 18.

The proposal as amended was read.

Mr. BOWDLE: Mr. President, and Gentlemen of the Convention: I shall speak very briefly for I take it that the value of this proposal is obvious to the professional men here, and those who are not professional men have certainly followed the public prints closely enough to know that it is important, in order to do away with the scandal surrounding criminal trials, that something should be done to regulate the introduction and use of expert medical testimony. The legal profession and the judiciary together have been made the butt of all sorts of jokes because of the introduction and use of expert medical testimony. I take it that it will go without elaboration here that there is nothing in this world more ridiculous than the examination of a medical expert in the ordinary criminal case. We speak of the expert witness—the medical expert witness. The term "witness" as used in that connection is a misnomer. A witness in legal contemplation is merely one who has seen something, or who has heard something about a transaction that is the subject of judicial investigation. A doctor or alien-ist in a criminal case involving such testimony is not a witness in any proper legal sense. He is really a purchased special pleader, who has in every case been examined in advance by the lawyer on the side engaging him, and who has been carefully quizzed as to what his answer would be as an expert to a purely hypothetical case, and when he goes into court he goes there under a mysterious kind of employment receiving a fee unknown in size, and while he occupies the stand ostensibly as a witness he is really there in the capacity of counsel, and his business is to combat the cross-examination of the other side and to defend his theory of the case. All sorts of scandals have grown out of this curious situation. The medical profession—and it should be said to the credit of the profession—has endeavored time and time again to get away from this situation, but without success. So long as our jurisprudence is in its present condition, where either side may employ any expert that the side desires to employ, and pay any size fee that it is able to pay, so long will there be doctors who will respond to the demand, and proceed to furnish the evidence expected by the side employing them. The only effort I know of in the United States on the part of a legislature to get away from this scandal was made by the state of Michigan in 1905.

Regulating Expert Testimony in Criminal Trials.

In 1905 the legislature of the state of Michigan passed a law suggested by the medical profession. It was a very excellent law, but it was promptly declared to be unconstitutional by the supreme court of Michigan. I read a part of it:

No expert witness shall be paid or receive as compensation in any given case, for his services as such, a sum in excess of the ordinary witness fees provided by law, unless the court before whom such witness is to appear or has appeared awards a larger sum; and any such witness who shall directly or indirectly receive a larger amount than such award, and any person who shall pay such witness a larger sum than such award, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not to exceed one year, or both, in the discretion of the court, and may further be punished for contempt.

No more than three experts shall be allowed to testify on either side as to the same issue in any given case, except in criminal prosecutions for homicide. Provided, the court trying such case may in its discretion permit an additional number of witnesses to testify as experts.

There was an evident attempt on the part of the state of Michigan to control the number of experts who should be used in a criminal case. I read another provision of the Michigan law:

In criminal cases for homicide where the issues involved expert knowledge or opinion the court shall appoint one or more suitable disinterested persons, not exceeding three, to investigate such issues and testify at the trial.

The value of that is perfectly apparent. It took out of the hands of both parties the power to go out into the open medical market, and by the use of money bring into court such witnesses as they desired to sustain the issue on their part and placed the whole matter in the power of the court that was trying that case. So when the court saw that the case was approaching a point where it involved the use of medical testimony it could at once appoint this board of medical experts of three persons. I read further:

And the compensation of such person or persons shall be fixed by the court and paid by the county where indictment was found, and the fact that such witness or witnesses have been so appointed shall be made known to the jury.

The excellence of that act is perfectly apparent. What happened to it? The supreme court of the state of Michigan, having due regard to that large body of the common law, under the prescriptions of which, for time out of mind, either party could examine any number of witnesses to sustain the issue on his party, said that this was an effort to depart from that body of the common law which was especially binding in criminal trials and therefore contrary to the constitution of the state of Michigan, and proceeded to denounce it. I shall not attempt to read from the decision. I simply refer to it, People vs. Dickerson, 164 Michigan, page 148. The fourth paragraph of the syllabus reads as follows:

Sections 3 of Act No. 175, Pub. Acts, 1905, providing for the appointment of expert witnesses by the court in cases of homicide is unconstitutional since the act of appointment is in no sense a judicial act, is carried out without notice to respondent or the prosecuting attorney, since the names of the witnesses are not indorsed on the information, and the accused is prevented from knowing the names of witnesses who will testify against him, and since the experts receive a certificate of candor, ability, and truthfulness not given to any other witnesses in the case.

And thus that act fell by the wayside.

Now this provision before us provides that the legislature shall have power to provide by law for the regulation and use of expert medical witnesses and testimony in criminal trials. The provision is permissive only. It allows the legislature full power to determine, after the fullest kind of conference with the best experts to be had, on a scheme for the control of medical testimony. The word "medical" was stricken out and the provision here is somewhat broader than that.

Mr. PECK: Why not use the word "civil" as well as "criminal?"

Mr. BOWDLE: The only answer is that in civil cases involving only A and B, the issues tried usually are not of any great interest to the community at large.

Mr. PECK: Do you know of any class of cases in which experts are more used than in will cases?

Mr. BOWDLE: That is true. I do not object to an amendment broadening the power of the legislature and applying it to the ordinary case, but so far as my proposal is concerned, it is designed to reach criminal cases and thus prevent the greatest scandals that surround these trials.

Mr. PECK: I desire to offer an amendment. I want to insert the words "civil and" before the word "criminal" in line 5 and also, on the suggestion of Professor Knight, to repeat the word "expert" before the word "testimony" in the same line.

Mr. BOWDLE: I will accept that.

Mr. DWYER: In all civil cases—take, for example, breach of contract in building a house—each side may bring in experts to show whether it has been done according to contract. That should not be eliminated here. In civil cases each party should have that right.

Mr. PECK: It only provides that the number may be limited. It does not exclude the power to call them.

Mr. DWYER: Of course, in criminal cases—I have had a great deal of experience with that character of experts in criminal cases, and I think the court should select experts instead of the parties. Then the jury will get some valuable testimony, but the way it is now it is a travesty.

Mr. PECK: The general assembly has the power to pass an act providing for that.

Mr. DWYER: The court should have the power. The court is disinterested, and if it is put in the hands of the court we may get some valuable testimony. The way it is now it is a farce, and the expert doctors are just as bad as the lawyers.

Mr. ANDERSON: Let us analyze this statement. The amendment authorizes the legislature to pass laws which, if passed, unquestionably will give the court the right to appoint experts in any particular case where medical experts are required in civil cases. If you do that, you give into the power of the judge the right to decide any case where expert testimony must be required and where the issues are predicated upon expert testimony. Let me give you illustrations. Say, for instance, some one brings a suit for injuries, which injuries are of a hidden or obscure nature—for instance, growing out of neurotic conditions, shocks or neurasthenia, or matters of that kind. Medical testimony is very much abused, I know, but that is the basis of your lawsuit. If the legislature acts under this proposed amendment the judge will have a right to appoint any doctor he may see fit, and if the doctor or doctors so designated by the judge testify that there is no injury, that concludes the case against the plaintiff, but if the doctor or doctors would say that the injuries were great, that would conclude the case, so far as the amount would be concerned, against the defendant, for a jury would certainly find with the doctor so appointed. If the question to be decided was whether or not a certain litigant had signed a promissory note and he denied the signature, experts could be appointed by the court and their testimony would equally conclude the matter in controversy. So, you see, you place in the hands of the judge the right to pick the witness or witnesses whose testimony will be conclusive, and thereby give to the judge more power than the law has ever seen fit to place in the hands of one person where the litigants had a right to a jury. I cannot conceive of any more dangerous situation being brought about.

Mr. DWYER: On the other hand, is it not a farce the way the medical experts are called by both parties in criminal cases?

Mr. ANDERSON: I am not talking about criminal cases.

Mr. DWYER: They are just as strong for their side of the case as the lawyers are.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am heartily in favor of the amendment as applying to criminal cases, because there the end sought is different. But in every civil case where an injury has been sustained, or where expert testimony is the basis of the lawsuit, it is in the power of the judge, under a law as here suggested, to appoint experts and thereby make their testimony conclusive, and thereby give to the judge the full power or right to decide the case.

Mr. PECK: I can not agree with the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] in his conclusions about this. It seems to me he is drawing on his imagination. In the first place the legislature need not under this pass the power over to the court to select the expert witnesses. It may, as suggested by Mr. Bowdle, create a commission for such purpose, or if the legislature does enact that the judges may select the expert witnesses, it does not seem to me there is any great wrong in it to anybody. It would operate like this: Either party might go to the court before the trial begins and say, "We would like an expert on this, that or any other kind of science. Please designate one for us so that we can have him brought in." The court proceeds to do so. The power of a court in the trial of a case is much greater in the matter of designating an expert. The court is impartial and will endeavor to select an expert who will give a fair opinion. He is not being paid, as at present, to give an opinion on one side. As it is now A and B have a lawsuit. A hires a doctor and he says, "I want you to give an opinion for me and I will give you $500." Then a doctor comes in as an expert for B. He does the same thing. Their testimony is no more valuable than the argument of a lawyer, but it strikes the jury with a great deal more weight, because they are not so familiar with things going before. But let those experts be designated by the court and come in and give their opinion and the presumption is that they would come much nearer giving an impartial opinion than under the present system.

Now, I don't care whether the case is a civil or a criminal case. It does not seem to me there is any difference at all. The attempt to differentiate between a civil and criminal cases is a flat failure. There is no class of cases in which experts are more used than in the contest over wills. There the question of the sanity of the testator is nearly always the main question. Doctors galore are called to testify about his sanity. Judge Dwyer has indicated another class of cases where experts testified on buildings. There are thousands of kinds of experts who have at one time or another been called into court. What we want is to have experts selected in such a way that you may be sure the testimony when delivered will be something like the verdict of a jury. You take all sorts of precautions to have your jurors impartial. In many cases the jurors may be designated by the judge and you would get your experts more nearly impartial by the court designating them than under the present system. I think the passage of this proposal will facilitate the proper dispatch of justice.

Mr. HOSKINS: Just a word on this proposition. My attention was not called to it until it was read and discussion commenced. I do not see any necessity or any demand for submitting a proposal of this kind to the people. It does not seem to me that it is of sufficient importance that we should make it one of the proposals to be voted for. I have never heard any demand for a constitutional provision of this kind. My judgment is that there is not anything in our constitution now that would inhibit or prohibit the legislature from providing against any evil that may have crept into our system under our present constitution. The legislature can provide for the regulation of procedure. We already have a statute limiting the number of witnesses that may be called in a certain character of cases, and in a number of instances the court at all times has control of its procedure and of the witnesses that may be called and of the examination of those witnesses. We are undertaking to write into the constitution a provision against an evil that in my judgment does not exist, and which, if it does exist, can be provided against.

I am opposed to the whole proposition, but I am especially opposed to that part of it that relates to civil procedure. The proposal if passed, in any event ought not to pass other than in its original form. I feel that the present constitution is ample to deal with any evil existing along this line, and I do not think we should appear here as doctors of every imaginable disease the body politic is afflicted with. We are trying to get through with the work. We are using expedition. However, we must not pass these proposals lightly, and unless this proposal is thoroughly discussed and understood we should not vote on it. I think the whole matter ought to be laid on the table or indefinitely postponed, but in any event, whatever may be the judgment of this Convention, I ask especially that you do not incorporate in the proposal the amendment that is proposed, because it is especially dangerous. It is my judgment that the whole proposition, the proposal and amendment, should be defeated. There is no public demand for the same and every evil attempted to be remedied by them can be cured under the present constitution.

Mr. PIERCE: I would like to vote for the original proposal, but I would like to vote against the amendment. Therefore, when the amendment is voted upon I demand the yeas and nays. I will ask for a division and the yeas and nays on both propositions.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I had not intended to say anything about this matter because I thought it was so fair that it would appeal to the judgment of every man as being a necessary provision in the constitution. The fact is that expert testimony, so far as medical testimony is concerned, has become a disgrace to our jurisprudence. There are many expert medical men in this state and others who make a business of taking employment as experts. They will take the side of the case that employs them regardless of who employs them, and they will enter in a battle of wits between themselves and the lawyers who are cross-examining them with the view of aggrandizing themselves without a whit's care for the merits of the case. That condition is beyond doubt existing and it should be regulated in some form, so that we would have some respectability and credibility along with that kind of legal procedure. I think the Peck amendment is dangerous on the ground that the judge who sits upon the bench and has the selection of the expert is liable to select a man in whom he has confidence, and that would most likely be his family physician, who may enjoy his confidence and the confidence of the whole community and may not know very much. One knows whether a lawyer is capable because he has a forum before which he demonstrates his ability, but the doctor has none. Who has the discriminating power to test his ability? He covers up his mistakes in the graveyard and nobody ever knows about them. He may be enjoying a creditable reputation, based upon his personality and his credit in the community, which probably may be a mistaken credit. Many physicians know that there are men who are enjoying large reputations as being great physicians when they really know very little. The judge may have as his physician one of those. I think if the judge appoints one of those expert medical witnesses that would be the most dangerous power that could be given him.

Mr. RILEY: Does this allow the judge to select the expert?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I have been informed so.

Mr. RILEY: It does not. It simply applies these regulations to civil as well as criminal cases.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I understood under the proposal that would have to be the practice.

Mr. PECK: No; you are adopting Mr. Anderson's talk about that.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I believe the original proposal should go through and the Peck amendment should be defeated.

Mr. WINN: We have been discussing this so far as if medical experts were the only ones to which the act, if passed, would apply. We must keep in mind, however, that there are other experts. Let us assume that we are engaged in the trial of a will contest. The lawyers all understand that any person who had any acquaintance with the testator is an expert respecting his mental capacity. Now we give the same sort of regulation respecting the testimony of those persons as we do respecting medical experts.

Mr. PECK: Those persons who knew the testator are not classed as experts. They are testifying as to facts.

Mr. WINN: They are required to give opinion testimony. There are just a few instances in which opinion testimony is given and this is one of them. The witness becomes to that extent an expert. It is opinion testimony and all opinion testimony is expert testimony.

Mr. PECK: Oh, no.

Mr. WINN: There are higher and lower grades of expert testimony. Suppose you were trying a will case and the question is, "Did the testator have mental capacity to execute the instruments?" The legislature, if it passes the act at all must designate some authority to regulate that or there will be no regulation. It may be the court or the clerk of the court. I don't know what. It will be somebody else than the parties or their lawyers.

Mr. ANDERSON: Say it would be the court, the clerk of the court or a board, and that authority designated by the legislature would say that Doctor Smith must be the witness. That ends it so far as medical testimony is concerned in that lawsuit.

Mr. WINN: It might.

Mr. ANDERSON: The act would not allow either party to bring in any other expert than the one appointed by the court and that would be an end to the case.

Mr. WINN: Suppose on one side of the case there are witnesses called who would give an opinion one way and another set of witnesses would give a contrary opinion. If some authority could say how many witnesses could be called and who shall be called, he might designate all on one side. I have just been engaged in a trial of an important suit in which the validity of a note was involved. It was claimed by the man who was sued that the note was a forgery. I claimed the same thing because he was my client. Perhaps one of the best experts on handwriting in the country was called as a witness for the plaintiff. He was put upon the witness stand and testified at very great length respecting a long, careful, painstaking examination that he had made of the signature to the instrument and of other writings which he used as a basis of comparison, and when he was through it was found on cross examination his experience extended over a period of fifteen years as an expert on handwriting. Yet he testified that he had been engaged as an expert in a very great number of cases in the fifteen years, and that there had been called on the other side of practically all of those cases other experts who testified exactly to the contrary of what he testified, leaving it entirely for the jury to say whether or not one expert was right or the other.

Mr. ANDERSON: This proposal if carried in reference to civil cases would not leave it to the jury at all?

Mr. WINN: No, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then the court would be deciding the case and jury not.

Mr. WINN: Yes. Now, here we leave it to some court or authority or commission to say who shall be called as a handwriting expert. Suppose in that case this particular expert had been called as a witness and nobody else, the court or the commission assuming that he was altogether disinterested. In that case the other side would be precluded from attacking and breaking him down at all.

Mr. BOWDLE: Would you be in favor of the proposal if the word "civil" were stricken out?

Mr. WINN: I believe I would. I see the difference. It is not because the same rules may not apply, but it is because in the prosecution of criminal cases the state is one of the parties. The state presumably stands disinterestedly between the prisoner at the bar and an unjust verdict, and I believe in a case like that there is no serious objection, but I think this amendment offered by the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] is dangerous, and I move the previous question upon the amendment offered by the member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK].

Mr. KNIGHT: There are two parts to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT: When the motion is put the division will be made. The question is, Shall debate close on that amendment?

The main question was ordered.

Mr. KNIGHT: I had an amendment and I passed it to Judge Peck and he has included it in his. It has nothing to do with the question of a civil case.

The PRESIDENT: That question will be put first.

The question now is on the adoption of that part of the amendment.

The SECRETARY: That is to insert the word "expert" before the word "testimony" so it will read:

Laws may be passed for the regulation of the use of expert witnesses and expert testimony in criminal trials.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: Now the other part of the question.

The SECRETARY: That is to insert the words "civil and" so that it will read:

Laws may be passed for the regulation of the use of expert witnesses and expert testimony in civil and criminal trials.

Mr. WINN: The question is upon laying that upon the table.

The PRESIDENT: The question is upon the adoption of the amendment inserting the words "civil and".

Mr. HOSKINS: I move that the entire matter be tabled.

Mr. DOTY: The Convention is ready to vote upon this amendment. That is before the Convention and nothing else, and the motion is out of order.

Mr. LAMPSON: I think the gentleman from Cuyahoga is correct. The previous question has been ordered on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOSKINS: I now move that this entire matter be laid on the table.

The motion to table was lost.

Mr. PETTIT: I move the previous question on the proposal.

The main question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the passage of the proposal and the secretary will call the roll.

The SECRETARY [calling the roll]: Anderson—

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I would like to have that read.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. The roll call has begun.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 65, nays 37, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 322—Mr. Bowdle. To submit an amendment to article II, of the constitution.—Relative to the use of expert medical witnesses and testimony in criminal trials.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows.

Laws may be passed for the regulation of the use of expert witnesses and expert testimony in criminal trials and proceedings.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. Watson arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 241, by Mr. Dwyer. His name being called, Mr. Watson voted in the affirmative.

Mr. Lampson arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 322, by Mr. Bowdle. His name being called, Mr. Lampson voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOSKINS: I now move that we recess until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

The motion was carried and the Convention recessed until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess.

Leave of absence for the remainder of the day was granted to Messrs. Pettit, Rockel and Harter, of Stark.

Leave of absence for Monday and Tuesday was granted to Mr. Marshall.

By unanimous consent the following proposal was read by its title and referred as follows:

Proposal No. 334—Mr. Jones. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

Mr. Donahey arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 241, by Mr. Dwyer. His name being called, Mr. Donahey voted in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 232—Mr. Doty.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. DOTY: The principle involved in this proposal is probably new to most of you laymen and all of the lawyers. That a very prominent lawyer, vice president of the United States and afterwards president of the United States, and one of the greatest lawyers of his time is the originator of the idea is neither here nor there so far as the lawyers are concerned, for they never heard of it before. So that you may not think I am tremendously original and got up this myself I will tell you that the name of the man who originated this idea was one Thomas Jefferson, who came from Virginia and who was vice president of the United States and president of the United States and a few other things too numerous to mention. Those of you who have the idea that this is a brand-new proposition get over it, for it is about one hundred and fifteen or twenty or thirty years old. Thomas Jefferson was the greatest progressive of his time. I presume if he were living now he would be a conservative. You always get conservative as you grow older. This Convention is an illustration of that. When we started on January 9 it was heralded as the progressive convention of all time. I do not know whether some of the rest of you have reached the conclusion that I have, that this Convention is not a progressive Convention, but it is a reactionary Convention. Just look at the votes. The last vote we had that gave the line of demarkation between the progressive and the reactionary, showed we had just exactly twenty-nine progressives left. When this proposal of mine comes to a vote I want to see how the twenty-nine hold out.

Mr. HOSKINS: What is your definition of a progressive? What must the Convention do to be progressive?

Mr. DOTY: It should have been progressive enough to adopt the short ballot and it may do it yet, notwithstanding the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] is not yet progressive enough to vote for the short ballot.

Mr. WINN: Is it progressive to go back and adopt the theories of Thomas Jefferson?

Mr. DOTY: It is progressive to go back and adopt the theories of Thomas Jefferson if the theories he founded then are still progressive in their tendency.

Mr. WINN: That would be progressive like —

Mr. DOTY: —like the democratic party, and Thomas Jefferson was a democrat, too.

Mr. LAMPSON: Don't you know that was a piece of satire on Jefferson's part?

Mr. DOTY: No; I think he put it in as a "safe-guard." Now, I really want to say something about my proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON: Does not the gentleman think if we had just adopted the initiative and referendum and quit that then we would have been progressive?

Mr. DOTY: When I look over the things that we have adopted since the initiative and referendum and size them up it strikes me if we had stopped at the initiative and referendum we would not have been so far wrong. Anyway we have gotten away with the idea that we are progressive. Some of us have had to change our minds since.

Mr. HALFHILL: May I ask a question?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; I was wondering where you were, you were quiet so long.

Mr. HALFHILL: Did your people complain any about the initiative and referendum we adopted?

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; our constituents haven't had any mass meetings of more than three of them together Limiting Time of Operation of Laws—Contempt Proceedings and Injunctions.

Mr. LAMPSON: Will you allow me to present to you a progressive card [presenting a card entitling one to a free shampoo at a certain barber shop in town].

Mr. DOTY: This is a card that the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] seems from his appearance to have been in the habit of using—"One extra shampoo free."

Now, before I retire from the floor I propose to offer an amendment correcting a typographical error or two.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 9 strike out "for ten" and insert "twenty-one," and change "from" to "after".

That increases the life of a law to twenty-one years, and that is all the time that Thomas Jefferson, one of the greatest democrats that ever lived, said that a law should last, and as I am in a convention of democrats, I think this ought to pass.

Mr. WINN: Do you think any lawyer would ever draw a bill like that?

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; I don't think he would. Having sat at the desk there and having seen a good deal of the bills that lawyers draw, I know they could not. Let me tell you something about lawyers trying to draw bills. It is a well-known fact that never in the history of legislation has any lawyer been able to draw a bill correctly. I state that from an experience of five years at that desk and never yet was any lawyer that ever came down here able to draw a bill correctly.

Mr. TANNEHILL: And nobody else.

Mr. DOTY: Yes; I can draw one.

Mr. HOSKINS: We don't send our best lawyers down to the legislature.

Mr. DOTY: Nor to this Convention either. Now I am going to have a yea and nay vote on this proposal. If the Convention will accord me a yea and nay vote on the main proposition well and good, but we are going to have a yea and nay vote on this and if the Convention will amend the proposal as I have asked and have a vote on the proposition that is all I want. Those who vote for it will be really and truly progressive. I have nothing further to say.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] was agreed to.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 23, nays 63, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Baum,	Farrell,	Pierce,
Beatty, Wood,	Hahn,	Read,
Bowdle,	Halenkamp,	Stamm,
Crosser,	Harter, Huron,	Stilwell,
Davio,	Hoffman,	Thomas,
Donahey,	Hoskins,	Ulmer,
Doty,	Leete,	Mr. President.
Eby,	Moore,

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Longstreth,	Smith, Geauga,	Woods.

So the proposal, not having received the required majority, was lost.

Mr. DOTY: The progressives have gone down from twenty-nine to twenty-three. There are only a few of us left.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I move that Proposal No. 252 be informally passed on the calendar.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I make the same motion with reference to Proposal No. 170.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 134, Mr. Halenkamp.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HALENKAMP: This proposal has come at a time when I did not expect it. Looking over the calendar the other day I noticed it was behind taxation, municipal government and a few others, and I naturally did not think the proposal would come up until some time next week. I am not really prepared to come before the Convention with the argument I had hoped to make in favor of it, so if the Convention will permit I would ask that the proposal be informally passed and retain its position on the calendar.

Mr. DOTY: Is there any opposition to the proposal that you know of? Would it not be well to go on with it for a time and pass it without your argument if there is no opposition.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 33, nays 52, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Elson,	Leete,
Beatty, Wood,	Farrell,	Miller, Crawford,

So the proposal, not having received the required majority, was lost.

Mr. FESS: I do not believe any of us want this matter to be passed over in that manner. I voted on the prevailing side and I move to reconsider the vote by which the proposal failed to pass.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the further consideration of this proposal be postponed until tomorrow and that it retain the position it has now on the calendar.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 227.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I have to look after all the Millers in the Convention and I asked for indefinite leave of absence for Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, for the rest of this week and it was granted. Now he is here and I withdraw that request.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I do not know any reason why the informally passing of other measures does not obtain in regard to this. I have met several men on the way out who are somewhat interested and who requested that it be informally passed retaining its position, and I so move.

The motion was carried.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I move that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was lost.

Mr. DOTY: The next proposal is the so-called short ballot. I move that that be informally passed and retain its position on the calendar, which will give Mr. Bowdle a chance to make his anti-divorce speech.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: Proposal No. 25 is the next business in order. The committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights recommends the indefinite postponement of this proposal.

Mr. DOTY: Under the present rule the gentleman is limited to five minutes and as I think he has at least half an hour's speech there, I move that Mr. Bowdle's time be extended sufficiently to allow him to read his paper.

The motion was carried.

Mr. BOWDLE: I fear that after I have read my paper you will promptly decapitate my proposal, but I shall have no feeling against you whatever.

This minority report is signed by Mr. Johnson, of Williams, and myself. If, when I finish, there are any other members of the Judiciary committee sharing the sentiments of this report, those persons are cordially invited to sign this report.

After full consideration by the Judiciary committee of Proposal No. 25—Mr. Bowdle, providing for the abolition of divorce in this state, we, constituting a minority of the committee, beg leave submit the following:

1. It seems wise to us that this Convention should take cognizance of this evil, which has now become a national peril, benumbing the nation's moral sense, and destroying the integrity of society's most sacred institution—that of monogamous marriage. While the legislature has power to deal with this question, yet its course for a half century, and the course of all our state legislatures (except one, to be mentioned) has been toward greater and greater laxity. The legislature, by reason of its very closeness to the people, has proven responsive to the demands of that evil, egoistic spirit that is so deplorably active in modern life, while the great inactive mass of men, who still cherish the old ideal of indissoluble monogamous marriage, remain unheard. It is, therefore, evident to us that the protection of this ideal, which is the foundation of human society, is very properly a constitutional matter, and well within the scope of this Convention's work. To a convention which has debated for two weeks on the initiative and referendum and whether or not the saloon should be licensed or taxed, or whether it is desirable or undesirable for the new court of appeals to see the witnesses personally, it should not be necessary to elaborately prove that the Divine institution, which is responsible for our existence, and the state's integrity, has a claim for constitutional consideration superior to the claim of any other subject pressed upon our attention. Moreover, we have a variety of precedents, in that many state constitutions of this Union are not content to leave the matter of divorce wholly to the legislature. These constitutions limit the power of the legislature in many ways and that of South Carolina undertakes to abolish divorce altogether. All this justifies the view that this Convention on principle and precedent should take jurisdiction of this grave subject.

2. At the outset of our constitutional history, as an assemblage of states, the legislatures assumed the power of granting divorce. This scheme of things, like the present, led to vast abuses; and, accordingly, later constitutions deprived many of our state legislatures of this power, and, thinking to cure the evil, conferred this power on the courts. This course, it was supposed, would at least eliminate politics from the trial, would surround the hearing with the strict rules of proof not applicable to legislative hearings, and would impart a degree of seriousness and solemnity to the proceeding which would deter parties from lightly entering the divorce court. Precisely the reverse has been the ironical result; it is simply notorious that the getting of a divorce is the lightest thing of modern life; entering the divorce court is now catalogued by the individual and the public with jocular happenings. Moreover, the proof required is of the lightest character, many courts being already under the spell of that menacing spirit which obligingly "looks to the happiness of the parties," overlooking utterly the institution of marriage, which has today received its all-but-death wound at the hands of that lustful egoism which, in America, is the pestilence that walketh in darkness. The Fathers, in taking this power from the legislature and conferring it upon the courts, overlooked an interesting merit (?) in their scheme—the element of cheapness. Today, in Ohio, a man may be fully divorced for $10.35, with $5 additional to some impecunious attorney, who will attend to the perfunctory details of the formal proof. Thus, the system being evil, every evolution of the system has been evil, until today under the blight of it all the condition of family life in America is but little better than domestic life in the days of Rome's decline.

3. In the loosening of the family tie nothing now remains but the allowance of divorce by "mutual consent." The apostles of the present system see this to be a logical step, for it has the splendidly utilitarian features of allowing full and immediate expression of sexual desire, and likewise saves the parties from the annoyance and embarrassment of even a formal public hearing of their real or fancied differences. That this scheme may result from the present carnal program is well within the range of probability. Already one may see in current literature numerous suggestive articles having such titles as "Why not Freer Divorce?", "Shall Divorce be Made Easier?", "Impurity of Divorce Suppression," "A Defense of Divorce," "Divorce by Mutual Consent, Why Not?" These articles—and they are very numerous—should arouse us to a sense of the profound peril that menaces us.

4. The divorce system, being immoral, the whole drift of it is toward the extinction of the marriage tie by common consent.

M. Emile Durkheim, a distinguished professor of Paris, in writing on "suicide" deals with the moral aspects of the divorce problem, particularly with relation to its bearing on his subject. He says:

Marriage gives a man the strongest moral standby, as it places a wholesome check on promiscuous desires, which are mentally and physically so enfeebling, as well as destructive of the moral fibre. In proportion as the marriage tie is fragile the continence of married persons become less reliable. A check from which it is possible to free one's self with conventional ease is no longer a check that will moderate the desires, and, by moderating, appease them. There is consequently little need to show that in instituting divorce by mutual consent further facility would be given to couples who were the victims of illicit desires; the salutary check, in fine, would cease, more than ever, to exist.

Answering the proposition that marriage, being a contract, should be rescindable at the wish of the contracting parties, this distinguished sociologist says:

Every contract is susceptible of affecting other parties than the principals. In the case of marriage the contracting parties are bound by ties which are no longer subject to their own will, but involve the interests of third parties. Marriage modifies the material and moral economy of two families, the relationship of persons and things after marriage entirely changing. This holds even where no children have been born. As soon as the children are born the physiognomy of marriage changes entirely. Each parent has become a functionary of domestic society bound to fulfill a specific function; neither can be allowed to withdraw from the obligation because of any personal dissatisfaction occurring. The institution of marriage is the best safeguard of the interest of both men and women, promoting, as it does, the utmost amount of normal happiness to be expected. The regulation and discipline of natural desires is the end of marriage. To permit promiscuous divorce is to enfeeble the principle on which marriage is based, with the result that those who benefit by it will be the first to suffer.

As showing that divorced persons, while seeming to find their own "happiness," are in fact the first to suffer, this clear thinker points out that it is "statistically a fact that divorced persons commit suicide much more frequently than married persons—the exact ratio being four to one."

Mr. Durkheim quotes Bertillon approvingly, the latter showing that "divorce varies in degree in every country in proportion to the character and mental stability of its inhabitants." What shall be said of our national character and stability?

The increase of divorce in America is most astonishing. Mr. Stevens in the Outlook for June 1, 1907, says: "More divorces are granted in the United States each year than in all the rest of the Christian world." The statistics on this subject show an amazing situation here in America. It would be a waste of time simply to more than allude to this notorious fact. Professor Ross, of the University of Wisconsin, says, writing in volume 78 of the Century:

Twenty years ago an investigation by the Department of Labor showed that 328,716 divorces had been granted in the United States between 1867 and 1886 [20 years] and that divorces were increasing two and one-half times as fast as population. The recent census for 1887-1906 brings to light 945,625 divorces, and demonstrates that the movement certainly gains in velocity. * * * The fact that accelerated divorce is produced by the modern social situation, rather than by moral decay, does not make it any less the symptom of a great evil.

5. The evidence of our moral breakdown in this prime matter is on every hand.

(a). In family life young women of marriageable age freely speak of the ease with which divorce may be obtained, when older persons happen to utter some cautionary word about entering into the marriage engagement. (b). The stage constantly parodies marriage and its old-time sanctity and deftly glorifies free-love. (c). The modern novel cannot sell unless it exhibits a "situation" in which the old-time purity is placed in antagonism to the modern "freedom" from conventional restraints.

And this—all this—is seconded by the divorce laws of Ohio, and by the laws of all our states, except one.

The exception is the state of South Carolina. In 1895 that state, by its constitution, article 17, abolished divorce. The writer of this report has a letter from his excellency Governor Blease saying that the scheme works so well that "the state would not think of returning to the old practice."

6. It is often naively urged by advocates of freer divorce that it is in the interest of the race unborn to allow freedom in this respect. The fact is that divorce is not sought in the interests of the race born or unborn. The race gains nothing in quantity or quality by divorce or the remarriage that often follows it. The selfishness which usually brings on divorce is not interested in children.

7. It is well known by lawyers of experience that our divorce litigation is productive of nothing but evil. Rarely does the truth reach court or counsel. While the law dismisses cases in which there are symptoms that the parties have agreed, yet it is impossible for court or counsel to discover such agreement, when it exists; and, in many cases where it does exist, it is freely winked at. Perjury abounds in such cases and it is absolutely undetectable. Thousands of men and women have taken their first lesson in perjury in our divorce courts.

8. There are those who dispose of this great question by simply saying, "Oh, the law can't make the married live together if they don't want to." This superficial popular utterance obscures the issue. To allow the married to separate, and to allow them to divorce and remarry, are vastly different things. Separations however unfortunate, occur daily and without legal intervention. These inflict no damage upon the institution of marriage, and the maintenance of the bond allows of sober second thought and reconciliation. Divorce allows, usually, no repentance, inflicts irreparable damage to the institution of marriage, sets its parties adrift in society, and subjects both parties, and particularly women, to altogether peculiar temptations. The report of the Chicago Vice Commission contains pitiful statistics as to the large number of divorced women who are driven to evil lives because of their uncertain social status. With this fact before us, Durkheim's figures as to the large ratio of suicides among divorced persons are explicable. It is evident to all who have carefully studied this subject that once the affections of two persons are solemnly blended the severance of them involves necessarily a profound tragedy. In that tragedy the state should take no part.

9. The adoption of this proposal would tend to strengthen the moral stamina of our people. There would be fewer hasty marriages. It would tend to the adoption of much-needed medical-examination laws, and thus prevent fraud in marriage. It would tend to check the carnival of free-love now in full sway in America—at least, it would put the state out of partnership in it. It would save our courts from grave misuse and take from them a filthy class of cases, the trial of which tends to break down the moral sensibilities of the parties. Our divorce laws are but a dangerous sop to weakness. They increase the evil. They do not allay it. With the frequency of post, ease of transportation, and the telephone, those intending marriage may know more of each other than in former days. There is no reason for ignorance. Weakness here needs no comfort. The oath should mean what it says. The institution of marriage is greater than any weak man or silly woman.

The national government has compiled the statistics of marriage and divorce throughout the entire nation, from January 1, 1867, to December 31, 1906. The compilation is most complete. The figures and comparative tables are astonishing. At page 19 of the government report there is shown diagrammatically that, taking 100,000 of the population as the unit, the United States grants more than twice as many divorces as Switzerland, which country leads Europe in this regard. These two governments, the most democratic of the world, stand far and away beyond every other government except Japan (p. 19, Gov. Report). This latter nation is the most immoral nation, maritally. Our nation stands next to Japan. It is instructive to observe that for 100,000 of the population the United States grants sixty times as many divorces as Ireland. Within our own country the comparison between our states is startling. Thus, taking 100,000 of its married population as the unit, the state of Washington granted twelve times as many divorces in 1900 as did the state of Delaware.

Washington, as a state, is far more advanced in democracy and liberal thought than is Delaware. This relation between democracy and marital looseness bears out the theory of Montesquieu, that democracy has its dangers, and that it requires a high decree of virtue to permanently support it. Unless carefully guarded it is evident that a degenerate egoism is liable to vitiate and destroy the best institutions of a democracy, and this spirit is threatening our civilization. Montesquieu's truth is gravely thrust upon the attention of the people of America, for it is daily more evident that our complex national structure requires a greater and ever greater influx of virtue and honor to sustain it. The assault upon the foundations of our national life is now insidious, satanically cunning and destructive. Truly, as said St. Paul, "We war not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

The situation entails upon us, who are apostles of democracy, an unspeakable responsibility in this matter of divorce. If democracy is to be maintained—and it must be—we must pay a price for it, a price of increasing sense of moral responsibility, increasing in direct ratio to our wealth and intelligence.

We hold that the function of law should be to invite men to higher ethical levels rather than to facilitate their descent to lower. This is actually facilitated by our present divorce laws. Unless this descent can be arrested the outlook in America is far from reassuring. We accordingly recommend the adoption of Proposal No. 25.

Mr. DOTY: Do I understand that the member is offering some kind of a report?

Mr. BOWDLE: I offer this minority report.

Mr. DOTY: I don't object to a minority report, but I object to that speech going in.

Thereupon Mr. Bowdle reduced to writing and offered the minority report which was read as follows:

The minority of the standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights to which was referred Proposal No. 25—Mr. Bowdle, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its passage.

STANLEY E. BOWDLE,
SOLOMON JOHNSON.

Mr. WINN: I move that the minority report be laid on the table.

Mr. WALKER: I offer an amendment.

Mr. DOTY: To what? This is the report of a committee. It has not reached the stage for amendment yet. The minority report has to be voted on and presented. We have not come to the stage where amendments are permissible.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the substitution of the minority report for the majority.

Mr. OKEY: I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOTY: I second it.

Abolition of Divorce—Petitions and Memorials.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 39, nays 46, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Baum,	Halfhill,	Longstreth,

Fackler,

The minority report was disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the majority, which is the indefinite postponement of the proposal.

The motion to indefinitely postpone was carried.

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: I want to ask that the committee on Labor be relieved of Proposal No. 131, offered by myself, and I call up that proposal before the Convention.

Mr. DOTY: I move that Proposal No. 131 be re-committed to the committee on Labor.

The motion was carried.

Mr. ANDERSON: If there is no objection I would like to move that Proposal No. 240 be taken from the table. In the conclusion I do not think we got proper consideration upon that and so that we can have a vote properly recorded I would like to have it taken from the table.

The PRESIDENT: By unanimous consent the motion to take from the table Proposal No. 240 will be put.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is "Shall the proposal pass?"

Mr. ANDERSON: I would like to have a full vote and I move that that be informally passed.

Mr. KING: I second the motion.

Mr. DOTY: I move that further consideration of the matter be postponed until tomorrow and that it be placed at the foot of the calendar.

The motion was carried.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. Fess presented the petitions of four hundred members of the W. C. T. U. of Sherwood; of the W. C. T. U. of Beallsville; of the members of the W. C. T. U. of Brookfield; of the members of the W. C. T. U. of Edon; of E. Knox, of Oak Hill; of R. N. Edwards, of Oak Hill; of A. E. Arthur, of Oak Hill; of the Rev. R. O. Williams, Oak Hill; of Geo. E. Jaynes, Oak Hill; of Lewis C. Foster, Oak Hill; of the Rev. J. R. Fields and many other citizens of Oak Hill; of the Rev. Chas. P. Cornet and many other citizens of Oak Hill; of the members of the Loudonville W. C. T. U.; of thirty thousand adherents of the Maumee Presbytery; of the Rev. D. Thomas and other citizens of Oak Hill; of the members of the W. C. T. U. of New Lexington; of the members of the W. C. T. U. of Millersburg; of the members of the W. C. T. U. of Cuyahoga county; of the ministers union of Toledo; of E. J. Jones and many other citizens of Oak Hill, asking for the passage of Proposals Nos. 65 and 321; which were referred to the committee on Education.

Mr. Stilwell presented the petition of the council of the city of Cleveland, to establish home rule for cities liberal enough to permit cities to establish a double platoon system in the fire department in cities; which was referred to the committee on Municipal Corporations.

Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, presented the petition of the Rev. Hugh Leith, and twenty-two other citizens of Lancaster, asking for the support of Proposal No. 321; which was referred to the committee on Education.

Mr. Cassidy presented the petition of E. P. Ames, of Wauseon, relative to salaries; which was referred to the committee on County and Township Organization.

Mr. Weybrecht presented the memorial of W. L. Ringwald and many other citizens of Alliance, representing Stark Lodge No. 630, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, requesting the passage of Proposals Nos. 24, 34, 122 and 209; which was referred to the committee on Labor.

Mr. Ulmer presented the petition of Isaac Taylor and twenty-three other citizens of Toledo asking that the legislature be abolished; which was referred to the committee on Legislature and Executive Departments.

Mr. Bigelow presented the petitions of F. H. Schoonard, of W. L. Dulin, of Cleveland, asking for the passage of Proposal No. 4; which were referred to the committee on Liquor Traffic.

Mr. Bigelow presented the memorials of the Rev. W. H. Walden, of Clyde; of the Rev. C. T. Redfield, of Springfield; of the Rev. Todd Forker, of Pleasant Hill; of the Rev. C. H. Wolcott, of Chagrin Falls; of the Rev. G. C. Quillin, of Coshocton protesting against the passage of Proposal No. 321; which were referred to the committee on Education.

Mr. DOTY: I now move that we adjourn.

The motion was carried and the Convention adjourned.

SIXTY-FOURTH DAY

AFTERNOON SESSION.

MONDAY, April 29, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the member from Clermont [Mr. DUNN].

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

* Mr. THOMAS: I offer a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 110:

Be it resolved by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That the congress of the United States be, and it is hereby requested to make proper and suitable provisions by law for the loan, to states, counties and municipalities within the United States of the moneys or funds deposited in the postal savings banks of the United States, at two and one-half per cent. interest, upon the said states, counties and municipalities depositing with the treasurer of the United States bonds of said states, counties or municipalities in a sum equal to the amount so loaned.

The PRESIDENT: The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. KNIGHT: The select committee created some time ago to have supervision over the official reporter desires to call one matter to the attention of the Convention and follow it with a request from the committee. As we are presumptively approaching the closing days of our discussion, we desire that the material of the reporter shall be in shape to be at the future disposition of the Convention and we find that there are some twenty or thirty speeches delivered to the members, some of them five weeks ago, that have not been returned, and the committee feels that a simple statement of the fact, and perhaps the suggestion for their return, is all that is necessary. That can be done this week in order that our records may be complete before we take the recess.

Mr. DOTY: If they are not returned will they be omitted from the record? If they will, there is no use in anybody returning them.

Mr. KNIGHT: The committee has no power to make the members speak over again.

The PRESIDENT: Motions and resolutions are still in order.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I offer a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 111:

WHEREAS, The deliberations of the Convention have been so much disturbed by loud talk and unnecessary moving about of the members in the hall and lobby; therefore

Be it resolved by the Convention, That members and employes be requested and required to refrain from talking or moving about in the hall or lobby, while any member is speaking or while the clerk is reading or calling the roll.

Be it further resolved, That the president and the sergeant-at-arms be required to strictly enforce the requirements of this resolution.

Mr. FESS: I move a suspension of the rules and that the resolution be put upon its passage.

The motion to suspend the rules was carried.

Mr. DOTY: This is the first resolution of censure that has been offered upon the officers—

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: It is not a censure upon the officers, but upon the members. The officers are trying to do all they can.

Mr. DOTY: I am in favor of the purpose of the resolution, but I do not think the resolution itself is proper.

Mr. KRAMER: I think it is exactly right if we will only meet on Friday. We solemnly resolved to keep order and we don't keep it, just as we solemnly resolved to meet on Friday and haven't met. We only have one or two weeks left and I am sure the president and sergeant-at-arms will keep order.

Mr. ANDERSON: I will offer this amendment that all delegates be required to give strict attention to the speeches being made by any other delegate and the delegates must refrain from reading any documents or newspapers while speeches are in progress.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] was disagreed to.

Mr. LAMPSON: I think inasmuch as public attention has been called to this situation members ought to take it upon themselves to abide by the rules. The rules already cover what is involved in this resolution and it will not look in the record exactly as it sounds when it is read here before the full Convention, all of us understanding the evil that we are seeking to cure. I therefore move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was carried.

INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSALS.

The following proposals were introduced and read the first time:

Proposal No. 335 — Mr. Dunn. To submit an amendment to article XII, section 2, of the constitution. — Relative to taxation.

Proposal No. 336 — Mr. Read. To submit an amendment to article I, section 7, of the constitution. — Relative to moral training.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. Knight submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Education, to which was referred Proposal No. 321 — Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The report was agreed to.

Reports of Standing Committees—Resolutions Laid Over—Second Reading of Proposals.

Mr. WALKER: I submit a report.

The standing committee on Public Works, to which was referred Proposal No. 331—Mr. Walker, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends its passage.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: If there is no objection the reports will be engrossed.

Mr. KRAMER: I offer the following report;

The standing committee on Legislative and Executive Departments, to which was referred Proposal No. 310—Mr. Read, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

Mr. READ: I believe this question ought to be debated. While of course I bow to the superior wisdom of the committee, I was led to believe that that committee was going to report that without recommendation, but in their wisdom they have deemed to do it differently. They treated it very cordially. I only asked that they might give me an opportunity to argue it before the Convention, and when I left them a few days ago I felt quite good because they were going to allow that to be done, but the next thing I know they handed me one in the solar plexus. Now I am a little disfigured, but I am still in the ring, and I want to ask the Convention to be kind enough to allow me to present it to the body and see if the Convention can not see some merit in it. I hope, therefore, that this report to indefinitely postpone will not be carried. I think I at least should have the privilege of presenting it to the Convention.

Mr. DOTY: This proposal in its present form is not one I would care to vote for, but it has in my judgment some principles involved in it that are worthy of consideration by this Convention. The whole question of when our legislature shall meet and how it shall perform some of its duties is involved in some of the proposals. While I do not agree with Mr. Read upon some parts of the proposal, I think it is one that is worthy of earnest consideration. I hope the recommendation of the committee will be voted down and the proposal will be engrossed and put upon the calendar.

Mr. KRAMER: The committee ought to say just a word or two on that. We had this proposal or one like it before us three different times. We heard from Mr. Read three different times. The proposal provides for a session of legislature each year. The first session of the legislature does nothing but put in bills and refer them to committees. The second year they may consider bills already presented at the first session. While it may have some merit in it, the committee didn't think it had sufficient merit to take up the time of the Convention in discussion. We have had the idea that the people of the state would rather have a session of the legislature every four years than every year. I think that is pretty much the sentiment of the committee.

Mr. DOTY: Does not the member know that the evil came down from the time when the legislature was, in addition to what an ordinary legislature is, a board of county commissioners for eighty-eight counties, a city council for seventy-one cities and a board of education for seven or eight thousand school districts in the state of Ohio? Don't you know that is true?

Mr. KRAMER: No.

Mr. DOTY: It is a fact, just the same.

Mr. KRAMER: If you say it is a fact, it is. I just wanted to make that statement so that the Convention would know.

The motion to indefinitely postpone was carried.

Mr. WATSON: I did not have time to introduce a proposal during the regular hour and I would like to introduce it right now.

Mr. DOTY: A proposal at this time?

By unanimous consent the following proposal was introduced and read the first time:

Proposal No. 337—Mr. Watson. To submit an amendment to the constitution.—Relative to the recall.

Mr. WATSON: Some gentleman has suggested that I may have a speech, but I have not. I have just one new idea.

RESOLUTIONS LAID OVER.

The PRESIDENT: The order is still reports of committees. If none, resolutions laid over. The first is Resolution No. 109—Mr. Stilwell.

Mr. DOTY: That is a resolution of my colleague, who is not present. I therefore move that this resolution be informally passed upon the calendar.

The motion was carried.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The PRESIDENT: The next order of business is proposals on their second reading and the first is Proposal No. 272—Mr. FitzSimons.

Mr. KNIGHT: As the chairman of the committee on Municipal Government, who expected to be here for this session, is evidently delayed by a late train, and it is the desire of the proponent as well as the committee that this proposal and the proposal following it on the calendar be informally passed until the chairman of the Municipal committee is here, I move that this be done.

Mr. DOTY: There are about one hundred and sixteen members here who came in for this two o'clock session. They came in to take up this matter of municipal government. The author of the proposal and a very influential part of the committee are here. Why can we not read it the second time and proceed with the debates? There are a lot of people who want to make speeches on the proposal. The rest of us got here at two o'clock, as we agreed on Thursday we would do, and I do not see why we should informally pass anything. I am willing to do this, as agreeable all around, to transfer the fourth item on the calendar up in the place of the first two.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is evident from the fact that none of the delegates from Cincinnati who were to come up on that train have arrived, that the train is delayed in some way. They expected to be here. That is the reason for the suggestion, but if the Convention insists, rather than make the change in the order proposed, we will take up Proposal No. 272.

Suits Against the State.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member from Franklin make a motion?

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that Proposals No. 272 and 329 be informally passed and retain their places on the calendar.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 252 — Mr. Weybrecht.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. WEYBRECHT: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: The proposal, which has been recommended by the Judiciary committee, recognizes the right of the individual to seek redress for claims against the state in such courts as may hereafter be designated, without petitioning the legislature as is now the custom.

It is probably one of minor importance in comparison with many of the proposals introduced and considered by this Convention, yet in its denial of the old-time notion that the state or sovereign can not be amenable to the suit of a citizen without its consent, it is in line with the recommendation of constitutional writers for the past sixty years and in accord with the practice that during the same time obtains in every European country, with the possible exception of Russia.

In our national government this ancient attribute of sovereignty was overthrown many years ago when congress conferred on a special court the adjudication of all claims of the individual against the general government.

Today the states of Pennsylvania, New York and Connecticut, through their constitutions, confer on the legislature, as does this proposal, the right to designate the tribunal in which redress may be sought.

I understand that in Virginia and North Carolina such courts have been named by legislative enactment, and on this point I desire to quote Judge Cooley in his admirable "Constitutional Limitations," in which he decries the tendency of state legislatures to abrogate to themselves the right to enact laws that seek to nullify the immemorial rights of sovereignty, among which privileges he names this very proposition, the inviolability of the state in denying claimants (without its consent) judicial redress for private grievance.

From the reading of this section one would infer that Judge Cooley takes the position that any interference with what he calls the right of sovereignty is incompatible with good government yet further along in another section, in speaking of the action of congress in establishing the United States court of claims, he approves the creation of this court by saying that "it was clearly within the constitutional authority of congress to do so."

From Judge Cooley's analysis I believe that the proposal is eminently a constitutional question, and not, as in the case of Virginia and North Carolina, a proper subject for legislative enactment.

It will no doubt, be argued that the citizen has now, and always has had, the right to submit his grievance to the legislature, and supplicate that body for the privilege of making the state a party to a suit in some court in which he might judicially establish his claim.

Our year books contain innumerable laws of this nature passed by former legislatures. They also contain laws appropriating money for the settlement of claims, as determined by some committees of the legislature without the formality of court procedure. In this method of disposing of such claims we might well ask the question, Why should the state demand of her citizenship a certain line of conduct in the settlement of disputes between individuals, partnerships or corporations, and hold herself aloof from the operation of her own laws? Is the pecuniary loss of such a creditor any less because the state arrogates to herself an immunity founded on the fetish that the sovereign is sacred and therefore not amenable?

Why should the humble claimant against the state be obliged to abjectly supplicate the legislature for the privilege of entering the court of justice?

On the other hand, why should the legislature appropriate the people's money in settlement of claims against the state of dubious and uncertain origin and without the intervention of courts?

Let the state exemplify by this constitutional provision her willingness to submit to every enactment she imposes on the citizen. Let the state indicate by the adoption of this proposal that the same restrictions — the demands of the industrial establishments within her borders — must apply to the numerous charitable and penal institutions under her management. The thousands of employes in these institutions are entitled to the same protection of life and limb in their various avocations — many of them hazardous — as are the workmen in any manufacturing plant in the state, and, in case of injury, to just compensation determined after a fair and impartial trial, and not as such cases are usually disposed of by the legislature — a settlement based upon charity and doubt.

If we want to get the government back to the people, make it responsive to their ideals of equal and exact justice. Let the humblest citizen feel that while the state can impose on him all the duties of citizenship, taxation, obedience to law and the common defense, he is the equal of the sovereign before the law.

In closing I want to read, at the suggestion of the member from Marion [Mr. NORRIS], sections 1677 and 1678 of Story's Federal and State Constitutions. When we consider that this was written many years ago, we must conclude that the argument adduced therein has had its influence in shaping both national and state legislation on this subject:

Section 1677. As to private injustice and injuries, they may regard either the rights of property or the rights of contract, for the national government is per se incapable of any merely personal wrong, such as assault and battery, or other personal violence. In regard to property, the remedy for injuries lies against the immediate perpetrators, who may be sued, and cannot shelter themselves under any imagined immunity of the government from due responsibility. If, therefore, any agent of the government shall unjustly invade the property of a citizen under color of a public authority, he must, like every other violator of the laws, respond in damages. Cases, indeed, may occur in which he may not always have an adequate redress without some legislation from congress; as, for example, in places ceded to the United States, and over which they have an exclusive jurisdiction, if his real estate is taken without or against lawful authority, here he must rely on the justice of congress, or of the executive department. The greatest difficulty arises in regard to the contracts of the national government; for, as they cannot be sued without their own consent, and as their agents are not responsible upon any such contracts when lawfully made, the only redress which can be obtained must be by the instrumentality of congress, either in providing (as they may) for suits in the common courts of justice to establish such claims by a general law, or by a special act for the relief of the particular party. In each case, however, the redress depends solely upon the legislative department, and cannot be administered except through favor. The remedy is by an appeal to the justice of the nation in that forum, and not in any court of justice, as a matter of right.

Section 1678. It has been sometimes thought that this is a serious defect in the organization of the judicial department of the national government. It is not, however, an objection to the constitution itself; but it lies, if at all, against congress, for not having provided an adequate remedy for all private grievances of this sort in the courts of the United States. In this respect there is a marked contrast between the actual right and practice of redress in the national government, as well as in most of the state governments, and the right and practice maintained under the British constitution. In England, if any person has, in point of property, a just demand upon the king, he may petition him in his court of chancery (by what is called a petition of right), where the chancellor will administer right, theoretically as a matter of grace, and not upon compulsion, but, in fact, as a matter of constitutional duty. No such judicial proceeding is recognized as existing in any state of this Union as a matter of constitutional right, to enforce any claim or debt against a state. In the few cases in which it exists it is a matter of legislative enactment. Congress has never yet acted upon the subject so as to give judicial redress for any nonfulfillment of contracts by the national government. Cases of the most cruel hardship and intolerable delay have already occurred, in which meritorious creditors have been reduced to grievous suffering, and sometimes to absolute ruin, by the tardiness of a justice which has been yielded only after the humble supplication of many years before the legislature. One can scarcely refrain from uniting in the suggestion that in this regard the constitutions, both of the national and state governments, stand in need of some reform to quicken the legislative action in the administration of justice; and that some mode ought to be provided by which a pecuniary right against a state or against the United States may be ascertained and established by the judicial sentence of some court; and when so ascertained and established, the payment might be enforced from the national treasury by an absolute appropriation. Surely it can afford no pleasant source of reflection, to an American citizen, proud of his rights and privileges, that in a monarchy the judiciary is clothed with ample powers to give redress to the humblest subject in a matter of private contract or property against the crown, and that in a republic there is an utter denial of justice in such cases to any citizen through the instrumentality of any judicial process. He may complain, but he cannot compel a hearing. The republic enjoys a despotic sovereignty to act or refuse as it may please and is placed beyond the reach of law. The monarch bows to the law, and is compelled to yield his prerogative at the footstool of justice.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 79, nays 6, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 252 — Mr. Weybrecht. To submit an amendment to article I, section 16, of the constitution. — Providing for redress of claims against the state.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Suits may be brought against the state, in such courts, and in such manner, as may be directed by law.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. Riley and Mr. Marriott.

Mr. KNIGHT: At the request of the proponent of Proposal No. 272, which was informally passed a moment ago, and by the desire of members of the committee, I wish to call up Proposal No. 272.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DOTY: We have gotten to Proposal No. 170. That is the regular order of business. Regularly Proposal No. 272 does not come up until tomorrow, when we are going to take up municipal government and when we are going to take up taxation. I now have my desk full of papers thinking we were going to start on something else. What are we going to do? The next thing before the Convention is Mr. Worthington's taxation proposal.

Mr. KNIGHT: The motion before the Convention is to take up the proposal about municipal home rule, and I want to take it up and have it discussed. Then we will follow right on with the calendar.

Mr. DOTY: Well, what is the question?

The PRESIDENT: That Proposal No. 272 be taken up.

Mr. KNIGHT: I would like, in behalf of the chairman of the committee, to explain the proposal and then the discussion can proceed.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: Proposal No. 272—Mr. Fitz-Simons, is up for its second reading.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. Leete here assumed the chair as president pro tem.

Mr. KNIGHT: Gentlemen of the Convention: In the absence of the chairman of the committee I desire to explain this proposal somewhat in detail.

The proposal undertakes to accomplish three things not now possible under the present constitution:

First, to make it possible for different cities in the state of Ohio to have, if they so desire, different forms and types of municipal organizations.

Under the present constitution it seems that it is not competent for the lawmaking body to classify municipalities, save in the two classes mentioned in the present constitution, namely, cities and villages; and the further provision which requires uniformity of laws for corporations makes it necessary that the legislature in enacting laws shall provide for one general uniform type of government for all cities and another general uniform type of government for all villages. With cities in the state varying in population from five thousand to half a million, it is obvious that either the large city must get along with crude machinery inadequate for its needs, or the small cities must have all the machinery of government adequate to a city of half a million. In either case the awkwardness is apparent and the burden of expense upon the smaller municipality is needlessly large. Therefore, the first thing that this proposal undertakes to do is to provide that municipalities shall—and I shall go into the details of that a little later—have the right, if they so desire, to frame charters for themselves, to provide each for itself such type or form of organization for municipal business as it desires.

The second thing, and the main thing, which the proposal undertakes to do is to get away from what is now the fixed rule of law, seemingly also required by the constitution, that municipal corporations, like all other corporations, shall be held strictly within the limit of the powers granted by the legislature to the corporation, and that no corporation, municipal or otherwise, may lawfully undertake to do anything which it has not been given specifically the power to do by the constitution or the lawmaking body. It has often been found under our present system, and undoubtedly would be found also in the future, that many things necessary from the standpoint of city life, which the city may need or urgently desire to do, can not be done because of the lack of power specifically conferred on the municipality itself. Therefore, this proposal undertakes pretty nearly to reverse that rule and to provide that municipalities shall have the power to do those things which are not prohibited, that is, those things with reference to local government, with reference to the affairs which concern the municipality, which are not forbidden by the lawmaking power of the state, or are not in conflict with the general laws of the state under the police power and the general state regulation. So the presumption would now become a presumption in favor of the lawfulness of the municipalities' act, and that presumption would only be overcome by showing that the power had been denied to the municipalities or that it was against the general laws of the state.

In the third place the proposal expressly undertakes to make clearer or make broader the power of municipalities to control, either by leasing, constructing or acquiring from corporations now owning or operating the public utilities within the corporation and serving the corporation, the water supply, the lighting and heating supply and the other things—without specifying—which come within the purview of municipal public utilities, thus removing once and for all, all legitimate questions as to the authority of municipalities to undertake and carry on essential municipal activities.

These three things are the fundamental things which are undertaken by the proposal, and these three things taken together certainly constitute what may be termed, and rightly termed, municipal home rule.

The proposal does not undertake, your committee believes, to detach cities from the state, but it does undertake to draw as sharply and as clearly as possible the line that separates general state affairs from the business which is peculiar to each separate municipality, be it a city or a village, in the state, and to leave the control of the state as large and broad and comprehensive in the future as it has been in the past with reference to those things which concern us all in the state of Ohio, whether we live in cities or in rural districts, and, on the other hand, to confer upon the cities for the benefit of those who live in the cities control over those things peculiar to the cities and which concern the cities as distinct from the rural communities. I repeat, to draw as sharply and as definitely as possible, a line between those two things and to leave the power of the state as broad hereafter with reference to general affairs as it has ever been, and to have the power of the municipalities on the other hand as complete as they can be made with reference to those things which concern the municipalities alone, always keeping in mind the avoidance of conflict between the two so far as possible.

Now, I will take up the proposal somewhat in detail. In the first place, as a matter of form, there are only two or three sections of the present constitution which either directly or indirectly touch the subject of municipal corporations. Therefore, it seemed to the committee desirable to embody this in a new article to the constitution. The present constitution has seventeen articles, and therefore it is proposed that this shall be article XVIII, devoted solely to municipal corporations. The first section speaks so obviously for itself that it needs no explanation beyond the statement that it recognizes what has been the rule and custom for years in Ohio that there are two kinds of municipal corporations, differing from one another on the basis of population, known as cities and villages. It preserves the same line between those cities and villages that is now observed, and distinctly confers the right upon the lawmaking power to determine the method of transition.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. HOSKINS: Why did you select five thousand as this basis?

Mr. KNIGHT: The municipal code adopted that, and as there has to be some division somewhere this would work the least possible change with the present code, and we kept the same line of division.

Mr. HOSKINS: Without desiring to break up your remarks in anyway, with this proposal conferring those powers of municipal local government is it necessary to leave the dividing line between the villages and cities as it has been in the past?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, and no. Principally yes, because this proposal, as I shall attempt to explain in a moment, provides that the general assembly may enact general laws for the government of cities and general laws for the government of villages, one type of government, and unless a city or village chooses to exercise its option under one or the other it has no charter; it just continues as now. Therefore, if there were no differentiation between the cities and the villages, those cities that choose to remain as they are now would be obliged to have a form of government necessary for the large city.

Mr. HOSKINS: Under this provision a city, no matter what the size, could form its own charter?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, but there must be a general law to take care of cities until and unless they form charters for themselves. It is not mandatory upon any city to form its charter.

Mr. HOSKINS: My reason for asking you this is that a number of municipalities very much object to the arbitrary limitation of five thousand and think that the limitation should be higher in number, so that a city of five or six or seven thousand could be governed as a village instead of as a city if it chose.

Mr. KNIGHT: Under this a city of six thousand could choose its own form of government and continue until it gets one hundred thousand, but we must take care of the present villages which do not choose to exercise their rights for framing a charter for themselves. The present code would continue and the present type of city government would continue until any city exercising its right under this proposal should frame a different charter. It could simplify its government if it wants to. If Cleveland wanted to have the government of Canal Winchester it could, or Canal Winchester could have the form of Cleveland.

Mr. DOTY: Is it possible for the legislature to pass a law under this to allow a village to have ten thousand people in it?

Mr. KNIGHT: I didn't catch your question.

Mr. DOTY: Could not they so frame the law that a village can maintain itself as a village although it went over the five thousand? In our county that would be quite an advantage. A village like Dexter, with a city population, wants a village government.

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not think the legislature would have the power to continue a village as a village. It must provide one type of government for the city and one for the village. Then the village can choose its form.

Mr. DOTY: Suppose the legislature passed the law that no city in Ohio could pass from one grade to the next higher grade except by a resolution passed by its own city council. If such provision were passed and a village did not pass such a resolution would it not under this proposal remain in the lower class?

Mr. KNIGHT: It is possible that this is susceptible to that construction. What the committee had in mind was that it must devolve upon some one to decide whether a village has passed the type in which it is, at other periods than the census period, for if it depended on the census a village having five thousand in 1910 must remain as a village until 1920, even though it has double the population.

Mr. DOTY: You see here is our difficulty: In the larger counties we have villages that are cities in population, but want to retain the village form of government.

Mr. ANDERSON: How do you get around section 1 where it says, "All such corporations having a population of five thousand or over shall be cities; all others shall be villages?" Do you think the legislature would pass a law that would permit a municipal corporation of over five thousand to remain as a village?

Mr. KNIGHT: Beyond the decennial period of the census. I think it would be proper for the legislature to pass laws that they should take their place only at decennial periods.

Mr. ANDERSON: That is, if they were under five thousand at one census they could continue that until the next census?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: What is the use of putting five thousand in there? Why not put that entirely in the hands of the legislature to do as it pleases and to say where the line of demarkation shall be between the village and the city?

Mr. KNIGHT: One legislature might make it four thousand and the next legislature might make it three thousand. The next one might say it shall be some different number.

Mr. ANDERSON: In article XIII, section 2, the constitution provides: "Corporations may be formed under general laws; but all such laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed." Now the word corporation has been held to mean municipal corporation?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Now, without any change of section 2 of article XIII there would be a conflict.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think before the proposal is passed finally there will be a modification in the last section.

Mr. ANDERSON: Again in section 1 of article XIV there is mentioned—

Mr. KNIGHT: You mean section 6 of article XIII?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, and the adoption of this article would repeal section 6 of article XIII. Don't you think so?

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. KNIGHT: There is no trouble there.

Mr. ANDERSON: Would you as a member of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology recommend the leaving of both of those two sections as they are?

Mr. KNIGHT: I can not see any objection to it.

Mr. WINN: The question in my mind has reference to section 4—

Mr. KNIGHT: If the gentleman withhold, I am going through this, explaining each section, and I will reach section 4 directly. Through the generosity of the rules of the Convention there is no time limit on this debate.

Mr. DOTY: No; you can take a week.

Mr. KNIGHT: With permission of the Convention I want to go through section by section, and perhaps this is as good a place as any to say the committee on Municipal Government held between twenty-five and thirty meetings, and that every proposal and every word of the proposal was gone over, and most of them more than once, before this proposal was reported. We are perfectly willing that any "i" should be dotted and any "t" shall be crossed, but we think we have saved the Convention some trouble by the careful manner in which the proposal has been gotten up and considered in the committee.

Mr. STOKES: The demarkation between cities and villages of five thousand has reference to those organized under general law only, has it not?

Mr. KNIGHT: No, sir; any kind. A village under that would be less than five thousand. However, a municipality with more than five thousand can adopt a village form of government.

Mr. STOKES: It would be a city with a village form of government?

Mr. KNIGHT: It would be technically a city, but it could decide its form of government. There is no crystallized type.

Mr. STOKES: The form of government could be that of a village?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, and a city in point of law.

Mr. STOKES: But a village as a matter of fact?

Mr. KNIGHT: No.

Mr. STOKES: In its form of government it would be?

Mr. KNIGHT: No. It would be like a village.

Mr. HOSKINS: If this proposal is adopted all the present statutes relating to cities and villages remain in operation just as they are until a municipality seeks to take advantage of this and change its form?

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not mean to put it that broadly, because there are some provisions that would modify some features of the code.

Mr. HOSKINS: Everything else remains as it is until they take advantage of it?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; it does not force the next general assembly to adopt any new municipal code for all the cities and villages, but it would have the effect to strike out some items. It would not, however, affect this line between the city and the village.

Mr. DOTY: May I ask a question about section 1?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Don't you think, after all, inasmuch as we are attempting to give villages and cities in the state the right to form their own charters, that it would be just as well that section 1 be omitted altogether?

Mr. KNIGHT: No, sir.

Mr. DOTY: Why?

Mr. KNIGHT: Because there must be a line of division between the cities and villages that choose to operate under the general law.

Mr. DOTY: I see; but the question was whether the bulk of the laws on the books will now stand until the villages and cities do away with them.

Mr. KNIGHT: They will stand and be effective as controlling the organization of all cities and villages in the state until and unless such villages or any one of them, or such cities or any one of them, choose to form a charter for themselves providing for a different form of government, save where this proposal, if adopted, repeals certain items of the present code because they would be inconsistent with this new constitutional provision; but it does not affect the line between cities and villages, nor does it affect the question of the form of government now provided for cities in general, or now provided for villages in general.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do I understand this correctly? You attempt this classification because you want to have general laws that apply to both cities and villages and also special laws that, if adopted by municipalities, may apply to cities and villages, and also further special charters?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; there are three ways provided here for city organizations.

Mr. HALFHILL: And your classification of villages and cities in the first instance is necessary in some form to have a line of demarkation to apply these three several things?

Mr. KNIGHT: No; not necessarily to apply these three several things. If I may restate it, we are most all of us familiar with the fact that under the present constitution the general municipal code of the state provides for cities, namely, municipal corporations having more than five thousand population, and also villages, namely, municipal corporations having less than five thousand population, and the municipal code provides one single form of government for all cities and one single form of government for all villages. It is not presumed that all cities in the state will at once take advantage of their right to form for themselves charters. It may be presumed also that there always will be some villages and cities that will be satisfied with the general type of government provided for by the general law, and, therefore, it is necessary, unless we abandon cities and villages altogether and have one form of government for all municipal corporations that do not choose to form their own charters, to have a fixed line of demarkation for the cities, because if the cities ever need a larger or more extensive form of government than do the villages it is necessary to have a provision for it and it is also necessary to have another type simpler and less extensive for less than five thousand population, namely, villages.

Now, passing on to section 2, it reads, "The general assembly shall, by general laws, provide for the incorporation and government of cities and villages". That is the present power. If this proposal stopped right there, there would be nothing new in it compared with what we now have in Ohio. That is, the present municipal code would remain or could remain without the general assembly having to adopt a new municipal code for cities and villages. The general law will be applicable to all cities and villages that have not by their own action taken themselves out from under it.

"And it may also enact special laws for the government of municipalities adopting the same". The meaning of that is this: We may assume that the present municipal code stands. Take that as an hypothesis to work upon. If it stands, then no city can get, for example, a commission form of government were it not for the last lines I have read, namely, lines 11 and 12, unless it further by special election chooses a charter commission and that charter commission provides a charter form of government. Under the provision of lines 11 and 12 the general assembly may enact a special law providing for a commission form of government which may, by a vote of the people of any municipality, be adopted for that municipality without having resort to the charter commission itself to frame it. In other words, a ready-made form for each city to adopt if it wants to, or it may adopt a separate plan applicable to all cities, and such cities as choose by referendum to adopt it.

Mr. HOSKINS: I am at a loss to understand the word "same" in line 12. It reads "The general assembly shall, by general laws provide for the incorporation and government of cities and villages; and it may also enact special laws for the government of municipalities adopting the same".

Mr. KNIGHT: That is analogous to the local option feature—that is, it may provide an alternative form of government for any city that chooses to adopt it. If the city doesn't choose to adopt it, it remains under the general law.

Mr. HOSKINS: Does it mean that the legislature may provide a system of general laws for the government of municipalities that any one municipality, if it sees fit, may avail itself of?

Mr. KNIGHT: In addition to the code. It provides the present form of government in the code, and then it might enact a statute providing a ready-made commission form or federal form of government in the alternative, to go into effect only where they see fit to adopt that in place of being governed under the municipal code.

Mr. HALFHILL: Would that be adopted as a general law—it says a special law?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then the legislature would have the right to pass special laws, laws applicable to special cities?

Mr. KNIGHT: Not necessarily. The idea is that the legislature should have the right to pass laws for fewer than all corporations, but only to go into effect when a municipality itself by a referendum vote chooses to adopt it.

Mr. HALFHILL: If my home city wanted to get a special law it could get it by adopting it or ratifying it on a referendum vote?

Mr. KNIGHT: That would take the form of a general law, that any municipality could have anything special by a referendum vote.

Mr. HALFHILL: I think it is important to understand just what the committee means, whether a special law can be passed applying to some particular class.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; you can pass a law or a statute that applies to any municipality that chooses to adopt it. You may pass one that affects only one, but it can not go into effect unless the people of that locality can ratify it.

Mr. STOKES: An enactment of the legislature under general laws would not be applicable to villages or corporations operating under this special act?

Mr. KNIGHT: It would not necessarily affect the form of government. It might vary it at some single point. It would not take it out from under the general law, except so far as the special law covered it. It comes back in another form and is intended to come back to the point where the legislature may enact special laws for municipalities or a municipality, but no such special law shall become effective by mere act of the legislature. It can become effective only upon a referendum vote of the people of the municipality itself. The old danger of the ripper bill is entirely avoided, because a ripper bill would rarely, if ever, be ratified by the people of the municipality. This provides that no special act for any municipality can go into effect in any municipality except by a vote of the municipality.

Mr. DWYER: The word "special" seems to be obnoxious. Why not say a general law of limited application? The word "special" I dislike very much in there, and I think it is an obnoxious word. And "special" as applied to municipalities is very obnoxious.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is often desirable that the law-making power of the state should have the right to enact a law for one municipality alone.

Mr. DWYER: I would object to that, most surely.

Mr. KNIGHT: But it can not be forced upon the municipality without the consent and the ratification of the people of that municipality. No boss or group of bosses can come to the general assembly and get a special law passed and force it upon any municipality until and unless it is accepted by the people of that municipality.

Mr. WATSON: After the people of that municipality have accepted that by a referendum vote could they then at some future time change or modify it, and if so how?

Mr. KNIGHT: By adopting a charter for themselves.

Mr. ROCKEL: Or by the legislature passing another law.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, and the people under a referendum accepting it.

Mr. WINN: If I understand this section 2, under its provisions it would be possible for each city of the state to have a government entirely distinct from every other city?

Mr. KNIGHT: Possibly not under this section, but certainly under section 7, if you could find as many forms of government as there are cities.

Mr. WINN: Why not under this one? If the general assembly has a right to enact special laws for the government of municipalities, why can it not enact one special law providing that cities can be controlled by certain boards and commissions and then if that is adopted by any city it is operative; then the legislature may enact another measure providing for another system of government, and if that is adopted by another municipality that is the law, and every city can have a government distinct from every other city? Am I right?

Mr. KNIGHT: Theoretically, yes; but I do not think you can find enough forms of government for every city in the state to have a different government.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. WINN: That would be the only limit; the abilities of the different municipalities could concoct different schemes?

Mr. KNIGHT: Not to frame different plans of government.

Mr. DWYER: In 1851 we had municipalities under special act and they were very obnoxious and objectionable.

Mr. DOTY: What is your notion of what would happen after the legislature had passed a special act for the city of Cleveland and the city of Cleveland approved it and it became a law, and also there was a special act passed that had something distinctive about it so that another general law could be passed which would say that all counties in Ohio having a city of thus and so that applied to—could that be done?

Mr. KNIGHT: I doubt whether it could be done under this.

Mr. DOTY: That is exactly the form of all special legislation since 1892.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think all of the gentlemen forget the one fundamental difference between this and anything that has been in the state of Ohio before, and that is that the general assembly had no power under the present constitution to submit a question to a vote of the voters of any municipality, but it has the power to force it upon the municipality at some one's behest. The committee admits that this provides for special legislation, but I submit that is protected when we say that it does not take effect until the people of the municipality vote for it.

Mr. DOTY: That is a principle that I concur in and agree with, but where does it provide that the county of Cuyahoga may have a referendum on such a law as I have indicated—

Mr. KNIGHT: It does not. This does not undertake to legislate for counties.

Mr. DOTY: But it makes it possible to pass special legislation for counties.

Mr. KNIGHT: No, sir; for cities.

Mr. DOTY: Every city in the state?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, sir; but a county is not a municipality.

Mr. DOTY: Of course not, but you can pass a law describing the county, saying every county that has a city thus and so—

Mr. KNIGHT: I don't think there will be any trouble on that. You can pass a law that the city of Cleveland could—

Mr. DOTY: I am not talking about Cleveland, but about Cuyahoga county, and I am referring to the kind of special legislation we have had for forty years. If you are sure we are not getting into that I would like to know it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think the gentleman is confusing things or I am.

Mr. DWYER: That word "special" is very offensive to me and it has been in the past.

Mr. HALFHILL: May I ask a question?

Mr. KNIGHT: I want first to try to answer Mr Doty's question and then I will yield to the gentleman from Allen. This proposal undertakes to deal with municipalities and does not undertake to impose any authority or to withhold any authority from the lawmaking power with reference to anything else. I don't think I catch exactly the point of Mr. Doty's question.

Mr. DOTY: I would like to make that plain. Suppose this was in the constitution of the state of Ohio and we had a legislature and we had passed a special law which provided that a city may build five viaducts; now Cleveland, being the only city that has five viaducts, why can't we pass another law after the city of Cleveland has accepted that—why can't we pass a special law applicable to every county in Ohio which has a city which has built five viaducts?

Mr. KNIGHT: The supreme court has already knocked that legislation out.

Mr. DOTY: But the supreme court has not passed upon such legislation as that authorized under this constitutional provision.

Mr. DWYER: If you put it in a constitution they can't knock it out.

Mr. KNIGHT: I submit that all of us are inclined to see a thing that we are looking for and not anything else.

Mr. DOTY: I am trying to see a way out. I am not trying to get into trouble, I am trying to get out.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am trying to argue with the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty]. I am trying to show him that he and I agree. The proposal does not confer any authority to enact special legislation to become operative or effective upon anybody except by vote of the people of the municipalities that choose to accept it.

Mr. DOTY: That is plain and I see that.

Mr. KNIGHT: That being the case I still feel that the hypothetical case put by the gentleman from Cuyahoga is not in point.

Mr. DOTY: Would you say it is hypothetical in view of our experience? Both the gentlemen from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] and myself and the gentleman from Williams [Mr. JOHNSON] have voted for laws like this: All counties containing cities that have a population of sixty-four thousand, three hundred and sixty-three and not more than sixty-four thousand, three hundred and seventy-five, shall be able to do thus and so.

Mr. KNIGHT: Oh, no.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: What the general assembly has done is to provide that all cities having a population of not more than sixty-four thousand, three hundred and seventy-five and not less than sixty-four thousand, three hundred and sixty-three—

Mr. DOTY: Now I know what I am talking about. That is not the way of it. We used to pass laws with the provision that in all counties containing a city having the population of thus and so, when there would be only one county in the state having a city of that population, could do so and so. That is the only way the county would be allowed to issue $1,000,000 of bonds for instance.

Mr. KNIGHT: I can answer your question directly now. This proposal neither confers the right to enact such legislation, nor does it change by the least letter or syllable the present power of the general assembly to enact the kind of law you have named. If it has not such power now this does not give it. If it has that power now, this does not take it away. That is not a part of the subject matter of city government.

Mr. CROSSER: This does not give the legislature power to pass a special law for anything but a municipality?

Mr. KNIGHT: I have said so several times.

Mr. HOSKINS: I have been trying to get the very point that you just made and I want to ask a question on it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I was to answer the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL], and when I get through with him I will take you next.

Mr. HALFHILL: Your proposal, of course, absolutely repeals the present provision of the constitution which provides for the incorporation of villages by general law, does it not?

Mr. KNIGHT: No; it adds to it.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now, here is a question, but I shall have to read section 29 of article II of the present constitution to put it:

All laws, of a general nature, shall have a uniform operation throughout the state; nor shall any act, except such as relates to public schools, be passed, to take effect upon the approval of any other authority than the general assembly, except, as otherwise provided in this constitution.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is not the gentleman reading the constitution of 1874?

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; the present constitution. I withdraw that. I have not the right section before me. I will put that in a different shape. There is a section which provides that all laws of a general nature shall be of uniform operation throughout the state. Now is not there a conflict?

Mr. KNIGHT: Insofar as any conflict with the present sections of the constitution is concerned, it is the desire of the committee, and it will undoubtedly be done after the proposal has been threshed out, to make such necessary adjustments between it and the other clauses as shall avoid any conflicts. Our proposal provides part of what you have covered: "The general assembly shall, by general laws, provide for the incorporation and government of cities and villages." And then it goes on and says it may pass special laws which will become operative by the vote of the people. If there be conflict between this and the clause you have cited we will modify the final section of this proposal. The difficulty with the present constitution is that under the interpretation that the courts have placed upon the section applying to corporations there is confusion between private corporations and municipal corporations, and it is the intent and, I doubt not, it will be the desire of the Convention to so completely separate those that the provision the gentleman is referring to shall retain its place as applying to private corporations, but shall not apply to municipal corporations in any other way than as provided here in section 2.

Mr. HALFHILL: What I intended to read to you was section 26 of article II. I had the wrong book. Then it would be possible, if I understand your interpretation correctly, for there to be actual special legislation such as we have found to be inimical in this state under the old constitution. Of course, if you are going to change that it would change the entire theory of it.

Mr. KNIGHT: The gentleman is right. This undertakes to provide authority to the general assembly to pass special legislation, subject to ratification by the municipality before it can go into effect. There is no use for discussion on that. It is intended to have that effect, and the difference between the kind of legislation the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. DWYER] referred to and the kind referred to by Mr. Halfhill is that the people of the community affected by it did not have anything to say about it. A group of men would come to the legislature and get a bill passed and it would go into effect over night without the people having anything to say about it, but under this no such law could go into effect without a vote of the people, which, in the judgment of the committee, removes the entire evil which has been thought to exist in special legislation.

Mr. NYE: Why would it not obviate all of this difficulty by leaving out the term "special"? Then your provision would read "and it may also enact laws for the government of municipalities adopting the same; but no such law shall become operative in any municipality until it shall have been submitted," etc. Why call it "the special law" at all? Why not have a general law to be adopted by any municipality that may choose to adopt it?

Mr. KNIGHT: So far as I am personally concerned, I see no objection to it. The language, however, was put in by the committee.

Mr. ROEHM: Would not that in effect be a special law even though the word "special" were left out?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, but there is something in sentiment, I suppose.

Mr. ROEHM: Suppose a city had about made up its mind for a certain kind of government—for instance, a commission form of government, which many cities desire to adopt. Now, in order to get it they would have to go through the form of an election, electing a commission, which would be expensive?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. ROEHM: In the committee was it not thought a good thing if the legislature should pass, say for the city of Dayton, a commission form of government, which then could be adopted by any other municipality by a referendum vote without going to the expense of another election? That is all really that this accomplishes; it saves the expense of an election by a municipality for the government that they desire.

Mr. KNIGHT: Just the difference between going to a tailor and having a suit made and going to a ready-made clothing establishment and buying one. You get your individual suit.

Mr. ROEHM: One fits better than the other usually.

Mr. KNIGHT: And one is cheaper than the other usually. We have already discussed lines 13 and 14 which provide that no such special legislation shall go into effect until submitted to the electors and confirmed by a majority of those voting thereon under regulation to be established by law.

It will be noted that in every portion where anything is submitted by a referendum vote it is passed by a majority of "those voting thereon." That is the principle we have adopted, and it goes all the way through.

Municipal Home Rule.

Section 3 provides: "Municipalities shall have power to enact and enforce within their limits such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as are not in conflict with general laws, affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." That is intended to give general, widespread, complete, local police power to municipalities to enact ordinances coming within the category of the police and other similar regulations, wherever those are not in conflict with general laws that are or may be upon the statute books affecting the welfare of the state as a whole. It is further provided, in lines 19 and 20: "and no such regulations shall by reason of requirements therein, in addition to those fixed by law, be deemed in conflict therewith unless the general assembly, by general law, affecting the welfare of the state as a whole, shall specifically deny all municipalities the right to act thereon."

They can add to and make more strict the requirements, but no such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations shall be regarded as in conflict with the statutes unless all municipalities have been forbidden to legislate on that particular phase of police regulation. This is the clause which reverses to a degree the present presumption, and the conflict, if a conflict arises, is resolved in favor of the city unless the legislature has forbidden all municipalities to touch that particular subject.

Mr. LAMPSON: What is the primary purpose of that section?

Mr. KNIGHT: To give the municipalities beyond question, the full police, sanitary and regulatory power without the presumption now existing that the exercise of such power is in conflict with or in derogation of state authority. It is simply in furtherance of the general power and general intent of the proposal to make each municipality as nearly autonomous locally as possible.

Mr. LAMPSON: Would not the power granted in this section be sufficient to enable a municipality to set at naught general statutes and put a burden on the people outside of the municipality or the state generally to show that the particular ordinance was against the general laws of the state?

Mr. KNIGHT: I don't think so. Has the gentleman in mind any specific instance of illustration?

Mr. LAMPSON: I have not, but I have been studying over it very carefully and I am very much in doubt as to the power contained in that section. It looks as if it might be very extensive.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is not intended to invade state authority in the least, but to make clear that the municipality has the right to enact such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. It can not take away, however. For instance, take the quarantine laws. A city can not make them less strict than the state, but it can make them more strict.

Mr. PETTIT: In line 18, the first part of it says "In conflict with general laws," and then it adds "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." Is not that surplusage? Would not "general laws" cover it without "affecting the state as a whole?"

Mr. KNIGHT: Not if the statement made five minutes ago is correct, that we could pass a special law under the form of a general law. If that is so, it would not be surplusage. This means it shall be a bona fide general law.

Mr. PETTIT: It seems to me those words are surplusage. I think any general law passed would affect the state as a whole.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to ask a question relative to line 17: What power under "local police, sanitary and other similar regulations" would be conferred on the municipality in addition to what we have now? Have you in mind any concrete instance?

Mr. KNIGHT: At the present time municipalities have only such power under those heads as are specifically conferred by the general assembly in the code; they can not touch a single subject that is not specified by the general assembly in the code. Under this they have all power over those subjects insofar as an ordinance under this head does not attempt to weaken some general law of the state on the same subject.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then the municipality might exercise all authority to put local police, sanitary and other similar regulations not forbidden by the state into effect?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: And now they can exercise only those that are granted?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: It just exactly reverses the rule on that?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is the intent.

Mr. HOSKINS: The latter part of it, where it refers to "general laws, affecting the general welfare of the state as a whole"—would that have any effect on the law which was in general operation throughout the state and yet in which there was no specific provision denying the right? In other words, is it the meaning of that section that the law must specifically provide that it was denied the municipality, or would the general law be construed to deny it?

Mr. KNIGHT: It would not. It says "specifically deny all municipalities" the right to touch that subject. But the extent of that is qualified in line 17, because it applies only to "local police, sanitary and other similar regulations," and in line 19, "in addition to" those fixed by law—not subtracting from those fixed by law, but in addition.

Mr. WATSON: Is there any danger of the court holding under that provision that the question of local option is not a general law?

Mr. KNIGHT: Personally I do not think so.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose a municipality should pass an ordinance enlarging the sanitary powers of a municipality beyond those granted by the general law of the state. Would the municipal law control over the general law?

Mr. KNIGHT: If it goes further than the general law, it would, but if it would fall short of the general law it would not.

Mr. DOTY: Is not that true of all sanitary regulations throughout the cities now?

Mr. KNIGHT: To a degree only, because the general assembly has in the code specifically conferred that. It is contingent on the law remaining as it is.

Mr. DOTY: Is not there such a wide difference between the necessities of different municipalities that it is necessary to have that?

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes. In one city, for instance, there will be a necessity for very strict laws about sanitary plumbing. That will not apply to a rural district. There may be a law about quarantine, and different sections would be affected differently. For instance, in a thickly populated municipality there would necessarily be more stringent regulations on the quarantine.

Mr. DOTY: Sometimes you would have a quarantine in the city where the state would not?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: But the source of power of the municipality now is in the general law?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, and this undertakes to reverse that. They will have the right to exercise power so long as it does not detract from the general law. They may make more stringent but not less stringent.

Mr. LAMPSON: Under the police power of the state—I suppose you regard the power of the municipality as coming under the police power of the state—before you can have police power in the municipality it has to be granted by the state, and under the conditions now the municipality in and of itself has no police power?

Mr. KNIGHT: I understand that.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then you take a city and give it all the police power and more too than the state has?

Mr. KNIGHT: You give it supplementary power to meet local conditions. You do not lessen the power. It can not destroy or weaken any statute enacted by the general assembly of uniform application.

Mr. ANDERSON: Under this proposal you do not need any right in the state itself to do anything under the police power. You have it inherent in the cities?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, you do.

Mr. ANDERSON: Can you name one instance?

Mr. KNIGHT: The general assembly in behalf of the people not living in the city might enact laws to protect the rural people from infection from the cities.

Mr. ANDERSON: But under this proposal the city itself as such has all the police power, and it makes no difference what the state may do in reference to it?

Mr. KNIGHT: Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. ANDERSON: If the municipalities can go beyond the state in passing laws under this police power, can it not have complete police power without the state acting?

Mr. DOTY: In answer to that—

Mr. ANDERSON: I am asking the professor. I think he knows more about law than you do.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think the objection to the gentleman's point of view, rather than his question, is this: This proposal does not undertake to take the city of Cleveland or Cincinnati or Columbus out of the state of Ohio. There are certain regulations of a police character, many building code regulations and quarantine regulations, and a great many others with reference to drainage into rivers and all that sort of thing, which it is necessary for the general assembly to enact for the welfare of everybody in the state. Now in the absence of this provision the municipality might—

Mr. LAMPSON: Under this provision is not the police power of the municipality found directly in the constitution?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, sir.

Mr. LAMPSON: Rather than through the legislature from the constitution?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, and it ought to be.

Mr. LAMPSON: And, therefore, would it not be paramount and superior, whatever it might be, if it were within the constitutional authority, to any general law upon the same subject?

Mr. KNIGHT: It can add to what the state has enacted under the police power. The municipality can add to the law because the needs of the municipality are beyond the needs of the state as a whole.

Mr. LAMPSON: But the power of the constitution is greater than the power of the statutes?

Mr. KNIGHT: Of course.

Mr. LAMPSON: And the municipality getting its police power directly from the constitution would not need to be concerned about the state?

Mr. KNIGHT: No; it could go further than the general assembly for the municipality. If the general building code is not sufficient for the needs of a municipality, the municipality can enact a stronger one, but it can not enact a weaker one.

The president here resumed the chair.

Mr. HOSKINS: Referring to the questions asked by the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON], would it not be a fact under this proposal, say a municipality undertook to exercise police power for regulations stronger, if I may use that expression, than the police power asserted by the state, yet if thereafter the state undertook to extend and broaden its police power, would the act of the municipality or of the state be supreme?

Mr. KNIGHT: Insofar as the later act of the general assembly went beyond the act of the municipality the state law would be superior, beyond any question.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then by this provision you do not undertake to permit the municipality to limit the police power that may be exercised?

Mr. KNIGHT: Not in the least. It does not subtract a particle from the police power of the state, but does give the municipality unquestioned right for local purposes to go further than the general assembly is willing to use its powers.

Mr. HOSKINS: But the general assembly may subsequently go further?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, and that would supersede the local statutes.

Mr. LAMPSON: Wouldn't that furnish an excellent opportunity for a lawsuit to run three or four years to determine that question?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; almost anything we do will furnish opportunity for a lawsuit to those seeking it. I do not think it would afford any very excellent one in this case—

Mr. WATSON: Is not this fact apparent, that if we are going to retain our present prohibitory laws that that section will have to be safeguarded?

Mr. DOTY: Safeguarded!

Mr. KNIGHT: I don't catch the "safeguarded." What is the point?

Mr. WATSON: To retain our present prohibitory laws—the local-option laws?

Mr. KNIGHT: Personally I do not think so. If there is anybody able to show that that provision has anything of that character in it—that there are any "sleepers" in it anywhere—I am ready to vote to strike it out, and to help put it in proper shape.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. PECK: Point out the specific language which provides the exercise of police power that the municipality may go beyond the state but will not diminish the state.

Mr. KNIGHT: The last four words in line 19 and the first three words in line 20.

Mr. PECK: The whole proposition strikes me as being as vague as smoke.

Mr. KNIGHT: "No such regulation shall by reason of requirements therein, in addition to those fixed by law, be deemed in conflict" with the general law. That is they can go further than the general law, but if they undertake to weaken any provision of the general law it is in conflict with the general law and therefore inhibited, but if they undertake to make it more stringent it shall not be deemed in conflict with the general law. That is the intent.

Mr. PETTIT: The question I want to ask is this: If the rule works one way, why not the other? If they can pass more stringent laws, why can they not make more liberal laws?

Mr. KNIGHT: This provides against it by six words, and if those six words do not do it I am willing to have put in any other six words or any number of words that will do it.

Mr. WATSON: On the point that I raised a while ago: This gives home rule to each municipality on all questions—

Mr. KNIGHT: Are you asking a question?

Mr. WATSON: Yes—which are not in conflict with general laws affecting the whole state. Is the question of local option a law that is going to be in conflict with the general laws affecting the state as a whole?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am of opinion not. I do not think there is anything in this provision that endangers local option. If there is anything—if this thing is thought to be loaded in any way, then the man who objects to it on the theory that it is loaded must show where it is loaded, and if he can prove his case I for one do not propose to vote for a proposition doubtful on this or any other point.

Mr. ANDERSON: Can it not be remedied—even the doubt—by just a few words offered at the proper time in the way of an amendment, and can not the amendment be so framed that it will in no way interfere so far as home rule in the cities is concerned?

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not know that I can answer it. I have not undertaken to modify the proposition yet. I have no doubt that those who think it needs modification can frame something. I am undertaking to explain the operation and admit any valid objection. I am not here to say this is perfect in every way, though I am sure it has had more care in committee than any other proposal that has come before this body.

Mr. HALFHILL: Did your committee find in any constitution of any state a provision similar to this?

Mr. KNIGHT: The constitution of California.

Mr. HALFHILL: Was that one of recent adoption?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not certain how long ago it went into effect, but within a few years. It was not one of last fall's adoption, however.

Mr. HALFHILL: It is a fact, I believe, that we concede that the present municipalities get their power by a grant from the general assembly and that they exercise that power and such other powers as the legislature permits them to exercise. Your committee has absolutely reversed that rule; you grant all the police power to municipalities, and that being so, is not the question pertinent that was raised by the gentleman from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON]? Do we not control the liquor traffic by the exercise of the police power?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, sir.

Mr. HALFHILL: If you grant all the police power in the first instance to the municipality and only restrict it by special law, is there not danger of a conflict right to start with between the state and municipality, and can that conflict ever be avoided unless the general assembly can restrict the police power of a municipality?

Mr. KNIGHT: I think so. This provision does restrict it in that they can not break down any statute enacted under the police power that is of general application throughout the state. It is so provided in terms in lines 21 and 18, and under this provision the municipality may stiffen within its borders the provision of the general law upon whatever particular subject is within the police power. Let me state what seems to me to be an illustration: The general assembly may enact a law—I would like to use some other illustration, but this comes to mind—providing that all restaurants shall close at ten o'clock at night. No municipality would have a right to say that they shall keep open till eleven, but they would have a right to say they shall close at nine. That illustration occurs to me off hand.

Mr. HALFHILL: Did your committee not consider that this was to a certain extent experimental, to grant all that power to a municipality, to put it on a plane with sovereignty itself?

Mr. KNIGHT: No, sir; it is not experimental at all to those familiar with municipal home rule. That is what it means. It means the people of a municipality shall have the right to control their own affairs.

Mr. PECK: Can you cite a city where they have home rule to that extent?

Mr. KNIGHT: Los Angeles.

Mr. PECK: How long since have they had it?

Mr. KNIGHT: Under the provision of the present constitution of California.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is it not wrong on principle to create the same power of sovereignty in the municipality as exists in the state? The municipality being a creature of a state, is it not wrong on principle to put the municipality in the constitution on a parity in power with the state?

Mr. KNIGHT: We do not put them on a parity, because any time the general assembly of the state sees fit to enact a new regulation under the police power making it more stringent than under the municipal government, then to that extent the state provision immediately supercedes the municipal ordinance. The ultimate authority is in the hands of the state, but the municipality is clothed with the power beyond what the lawmaking power of the state thinks is necessary for the state as a whole. This says that the municipality can do a thing until or unless it thereby undertakes to weaken some exercise of a power established by a law made by a general lawmaking power of the state applicable to the people of the entire state.

Mr. HALFHILL: Would not any municipality that framed and adopted a charter have the same right and reach the same end that you intend to grant by this provision?

Mr. KNIGHT: This applies to all municipalities. Your question applies only to those who frame their own charters.

Mr. WOODS: In line 18 you have the words "general laws, affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." Have you any objection to leaving out the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole"? You can not have a law unless it does affect the general welfare of the state.

Mr. PETTIT: That was my objection.

Mr. WOODS: Why have you those words in there?

Mr. KNIGHT: The committee felt that under the guise of general laws a good many really special laws are passed that do not affect the welfare of the state, and in order to make sure it would be a general law in fact as well as in form this was put in there.

Mr. WOODS: You mean by that whenever a general assembly passes a law in order to show it is a general law you have to show that it affects the welfare of the state as a whole? Is that what that is put in there for?

Mr. KNIGHT: I know of no purpose except what is given in my answer of a moment ago. The court would be likely to take official knowledge of the provision of the constitution on this point.

Mr. HOSKINS: What words do you want to strike out, Mr. Woods?

Mr. WOODS: I suggest striking out the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." I do not understand what those words are in there for.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have no knowledge of their being in there for any purpose other than that I have just stated.

Mr. LAMPSON: Don't those words limit the words "general law," and with them in there authority would be granted to the municipality to enact some laws that were in conflict with general laws, but they must be not in conflict with general laws affecting the welfare of the state as a whole? That leaves it open as a matter of judgment to the court, as to whether the particular law does so affect?

Mr. KNIGHT: I thought the gentleman was going to ask a question; if so, I didn't hear it.

Mr. LAMPSON: I did ask a question.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then I missed it.

Mr. LAMPSON: My question was do not the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" limit the words "general law"?

Mr. KNIGHT: Obviously.

Mr. LAMPSON: And that being so, can municipalities pass some laws in conflict with general laws provided those general laws are held not to affect the welfare of the state as a whole?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; I think so. The general laws must affect the welfare of the state as a whole under the police power in order to defeat the right of the municipality to supplement that or to enact laws of a similar character.

Mr. PECK: I do not know that I undersand the meaning of the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." Do they mean it is applicable to each and every place in the state?

Mr. KNIGHT: So intended from the discussion of the committee.

Mr. PECK: You are aware that the supreme court has decided that there may be a general law which has application in only a few places? It may be drawn to apply to any place in the state, but as a matter of fact would not apply to any but one.

Mr. KNIGHT: For instance, what?

Mr. PECK: For instance, one city.

Mr. KNIGHT: What kind of a law?

Mr. PECK: Conferring power. Any subject whatever. They may pass a law conferring any sort of power upon any municipality in the state and yet limit it in such a way as to only apply to one particular place.

Mr. KNIGHT: That is an old form of special legislation that is knocked out by the supreme court.

Mr. PECK: The definition of general law has not been knocked out. There might be a general law which would necessarily not apply generally because there was only one place that would be affected by it.

Mr. KNIGHT: The committee was of opinion that a general law was one that in fact and in form touched the subject that affected the state universally.

Mr. PECK: You might have a law that bridges shall be erected in such a way; but some counties have no streams and there are no bridges. That is a general law?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: But would not those words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" really alter the meaning of such a law as that because the law as to bridges would not affect any county in which there was no stream and did not have any bridges?

Mr. KNIGHT: No.

Mr. PECK: Why not?

Mr. KNIGHT: It is general where there are bridges.

Mr. PECK: But it doesn't operate over the whole state; it doesn't affect the state as a whole?

Mr. KNIGHT: It doesn't say that. It says it must operate throughout the whole state. You wouldn't have a bridge where there was no stream, but wherever you have a bridge anywhere in the state it would apply.

Mr. PECK: I can not understand a good deal of your exposition. A good deal of it is subjective and not objective.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am trying to explain why the committee put this in.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If I understood you, in your reply to Mr. Lampson, you admitted there might be difficulty in making the distinction between an ordinance of a local place or the law the municipality might enact which would not affect the state as a whole. Will you observe the same language is used in the same section at another place?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; it is in three places because the proceeding was the same in the three parts of the proposal.

Now, in section 4 we touch on a subject that undertakes to convey the power to construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility the product or service of which is supplied to the municipality or its inhabitants. The acquisition of any such public utility may be by condemnation or otherwise, and the municipality may acquire thereby the use of or full title to the property and franchise of any company or person supplying to the municipality or its inhabitants the service or products of any such utility. That has in mind the supply of water and supply of municipal lighting, and therefore the provision confers specifically the power to acquire by condemnation or otherwise. It provides in section 5 the method which must be resorted to and the details which must be resorted to by a referendum vote.

Mr. WINN: I want to ask a question about section 4, down to the first period. The first sentence in section 4 seems to limit the public utility that may be purchased and acquired by the municipality to such public utilities as are in use in the particular municipality. Is that intended?

Mr. KNIGHT: To what exactly do you refer?

Mr. WINN: Let me read that: "Any municipality may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility the product or service of which is supplied to its municipality or its inhabitants."

Mr. KNIGHT: It is possible that it would be improved by substituting "may be" for "is."

Mr. WINN: It seems to me that this language limits application to those utilities now existing.

Mr. KNIGHT: It was not so intended.

Mr. WINN: See if this would express the intention of the committee: "Any municipality may, for the purpose of supplying the product or service thereof to the municipality or its inhabitants, acquire, construct, own, lease and operate, within or without its corporate limits, any public utility; and may contract with others for any such product or service."

Mr. KNIGHT: Simply hearing it once I think that would cover it, but I think it would be more easily covered by inserting two words after "is" and make it read "to be." That would cover it.

Mr. WINN: Under the provision of this section if the municipality is now receiving a water supply from some private corporation the municipality may purchase the plant, but if the municipality has no water supply it could not erect or purchase a plant?

Mr. KNIGHT: It was not so intended.

Mr. HALFHILL: In section 4 you provide for the acquiring by the municipality of any right or rights to operate a public utility. Would there be any objection to saying that those utilities ought to be under the same regulation as may be provided by general law—that is to say, a public utility of a municipality ought not be regulated under ordinances, but should be under general law?

Mr. KNIGHT: That has been covered under section 3. The state has a certain power and the municipality can not do anything else, but may do more.

Mr. HALFHILL: Ought not the municipal utility be subject to all the same general rules?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is a matter of police regulation. The state has that police power. It has a right to say that all public utilities in the state shall conform to certain things, or that no municipality can break that down, but it can be stricter if it wants to. It can go beyond the state, but not fall short of it. The committee believes that is amply taken care of in section 3.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now the latter part of that same section 4 reads. "The acquisition of any such public utility may be by condemnation or otherwise, and a municipality may acquire thereby the use of or full title to the property and franchise of any company or person supplying to any municipality or its inhabitants the service or product of any such utility." Is there any conflict, in the judgment of the committee, between that provision and the limitation of the federal constitution which says no laws shall be passed by a state that in any way impair the obligation of a contract?

Mr. KNIGHT: I think not.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is not a franchise a contract?

Mr. KNIGHT: This undertakes to give a right to the municipality under condemnation proceedings. The question of purchase has no application, because that is not under condemnation proceedings. Condemnation proceedings condemn not only the property but the franchise.

Mr. HALFHILL: The point I want to inquire about is, a franchise being solely a matter of contract, can the corporation under the right of eminent domain condemn that contract?

Mr. KNIGHT: It condemns the value of the contract and pays the value for it, and under this provision any franchise granted in the state of Ohio, hereafter at any rate, will be granted subject to that right.

Mr. HALFHILL: Was that question raised by the committee, or do you recall?

Mr. KNIGHT: At one stage of the proceedings, yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: Can it now condemn as property, under the power of eminent domain a contract right; and is not the grant and acceptance of a franchise purely a matter of contract?

Mr. KNIGHT: This is true. If there be any apparent conflict in so far as there is such, this can not override a provision of the national constitution. I say if there be such a conflict, but I am not sure there is not any.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is it not a fact that the franchise granted to the corporation is a property right which the owner enjoys and which may be condemned as any other property right under the power of eminent domain?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is my understanding, that any property right can be condemned and paid for, and that a franchise is a property right. That was the attitude of the committee.

Mr. HOSKINS: Would that be a similar illustration to the one where the state has obtained title to land property direct—and we have many such deeds on record—and the state or municipality had failed to use that property, would not they have a right to condemn that property?

Mr. KNIGHT: Beyond doubt. A direct provision of our own constitution fully recognizes that.

Mr. HOSKINS: That, like all private property, is subject to condemnation for public use, and if this constitution undertakes to say that the property value of a franchise is needed for public use, that property, like any other property, is held subject to the superior right of the public to take it, and it can be taken under condemnation proceedings, and the municipality can not simply abrogate the contract, but it can take over the property value represented without in any way coming in conflict with the provisions of the federal constitution on that subject.

Mr. KRAMER: We have a company that runs a line from Mansfield eight or ten miles out into the country. I was wondering what the rights of the city of Mansfield would be under this provision with reference to that company or any other company that runs outside of the corporation.

Mr. KNIGHT: That is provided for in lines 42, 43, 44, 45, and 46: "—may also sell and deliver to others any transportation service of such utility and the surplus product of any other utility in an amount not exceeding in either case fifty per centum of the total service or product supplied by such utility within the municipality." That is clear, and the committee thought it entirely clear, and that under it no municipality would have the right to have more mileage outside than one-half of the mileage inside.

Mr. KRAMER: Then the municipality can to that extent own an interurban line that would run between two cities?

Mr. KNIGHT: If it did not exceed one-half of the mileage within the city of that same public utility.

Mr. KRAMER: Suppose it did exceed one-half. How would you deal with a railway company like that? Suppose the mileage outside of a city exceeded more than one-half of the mileage within the city?

Mr. KNIGHT: My judgment is you could not take it over under municipal ownership under those circumstances.

Mr. KRAMER: Could you take any of it?

Mr. KNIGHT: That within the corporate limits, I think, but I do not think it would be advisable to do that.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I would like for information to inquire, what additional power does the proposal give to villages to acquire public utilities.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is not clear that they now have any power about street railways.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: What else?

Mr. KNIGHT: Telephones.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Also electric lights?

Mr. KNIGHT: Might do it.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Those are the only two powers that will be conferred by the proposal in addition to what they have?

Mr. KNIGHT: Those are the only two public utilities now that they can not have.

Mr. KERR: In line 26, "The acquisition of any such"—would it not be better to insert "any property for any such public utility"?

Mr. KNIGHT: Suppose you want the existing plant?

Mr. KERR: If you want to construct such a plant outside of the city you have to acquire the property first.

Mr. KNIGHT: That particular part applies only to public utilities previously in existence, and the power of condemnation here is for the purpose of acquiring them. Section 4 confers specific power on the municipalities to construct; while the condemnation proceeding here was intended to apply to existing public utilities, and therefore it was put in that form.

Mr. DWYER: I would like to know whether under section 4 the municipality could not purchase an interurban street railway by condemnation? Is not that broad enough to permit that, and then could they not extend it thirty miles?

Mr. KNIGHT: I answered that question during your absence from the hall by calling attention to lines 43, 44, 45 and 46, which limit the municipality in such a way that it can not furnish transportation outside of the corporation beyond fifty per cent of what it has within the corporation. Obviously it would not undertake to condemn property that it could not operate afterwards. It is limited in the amount it could operate, and therefore it would be clearly limited by common sense in the amount it could condemn.

Mr. HOSKINS: If a municipality undertook to condemn an interurban line across the state and that line had much more mileage within the city than outside of it and they undertook to condemn just what was in the city, would they have a right to do that?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then would not the company have an action for the damages resulting in taking the part within the city and not the other; wouldn't that be an element of damage to be considered in fixing the price to be paid?

Mr. KNIGHT: Beyond all question.

Mr. HOSKINS: So if they would largely damage the interurban property it would become a matter of inadvisability for the city to undertake to buy the part within the city?

Mr. KNIGHT: Beyond doubt. The committee thought that was so clear, it didn't need guarding on that point.

Mr. KRAMER: Section 6 doesn't say they can't own it.

Mr. KNIGHT: Has the gentleman any idea that any municipality would undertake to construct a railway line that it couldn't operate afterwards?

Mr. KRAMER: I am just saying you have not put in any restrictions. All it says is that they may sell it.

Mr. KNIGHT: Sell what?

Mr. KRAMER: Sell and deliver to others any transportation service.

Mr. KNIGHT: But go on: "transportation service of such utility and the surplus product of any other utility in an amount not exceeding in either case fifty per centum of the total service or product supplied by such utility within the municipality."

Mr. KRAMER: I do not see anything that prevents the municipality from owning it. Where is there anything that prevents the municipality from owning an interurban line clear to Columbus?

Mr. KNIGHT: What would it do with it? What could it do with it?

Mr. KRAMER: Suppose it wanted to go into the railway service?

Mr. KNIGHT: What for?

Mr. KRAMER: As a matter of profit.

Mr. KNIGHT: It can not do it. It can not furnish service to anybody outside of the corporate limits in any amount exceeding fifty per cent of what it furnishes inside of the limits.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. KRAMER: What does that mean in section 6, "may also sell and deliver to others"?

Mr. KNIGHT: Go on and finish the line.

Mr. KRAMER: I can not comprehend it.

Mr. KNIGHT: "Sell and deliver to others any transportation service of such utility." It is the service that is sold, not the railroad. The service of a road is transportation. It can not furnish transportation outside of its corporate limits exceeding fifty per cent of what it furnishes inside. Suppose you built a railroad clear across the state. The municipality couldn't operate it.

Mr. DWYER: What are we to understand by this: "Any municipality may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits"? It can purchase a public utility outside of its corporate limits. What is that for and what are we to understand by that?

Mr. KNIGHT: There are cities in the state of Ohio that are so far back in the middle ages that their water supply is furnished by a corporation and the sources of that water supply are outside of the limits of the municipality. This simply gives the municipality the right to acquire that and apply it in the same way as I stated a moment ago while the gentleman was out of the room, that in the case of supplying electric lights to a city the era is almost here when a good deal of the water power will be utilized by transforming its electricity to supply heat and power to a municipality, and what use would it be to a municipal corporation to acquire a line inside of the town when it could not get the part that furnishes what the electricians call the "juice"?

Mr. DWYER: Do you think there would be no danger of having another lawsuit such as they had over the Cincinnati Southern? There was an act passed by the legislature authorizing any city of the first class having a population of one hundred and fifty thousand or over to construct a railroad, one terminal of which was to be in the city and the other terminal wherever it saw fit to select it. Under that law they built the Cincinnati Southern from Cincinnati to Chattanooga and issued city bonds, and of necessity the supreme court had to hold them to be constitutional.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am glad you put in that statement.

Mr. DWYER: Would there be any danger that such a thing could be done again?

Mr. KNIGHT: I think not, because of the limitations of lines 43, 44, 45 and 46. They can lease it from a private corporation so as to operate it—

Mr. DWYER: I know that in the presentation of the question to the supreme court the lawyers argued that if the city of New York could go forty miles to bring the water of the Croton river into New York, that by analogy Cincinnati had the right to build a railroad to bring coal to the city of Cincinnati. They put it on the same ground that the city of New York was allowed to get the Croton water, but I think most of us are convinced that there never will be another decision like that. They had to do it.

Mr. HARBARGER: In lines 44 and 45 you say "in an amount not exceeding in either case fifty per centum of the total service." In the case of a municipal lighting plant do I understand they are limited to the amount they can sell in the municipality and that much more?

Mr. KNIGHT: That section applies to selling outside and you can only sell outside one-half as much as inside.

The delegate from Franklin here yielded the floor for a motion to recess.

Mr. DOTY: I move that we recess until seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was carried.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by the president pursuant to recess, and the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] was recognized.

Mr. KNIGHT: At the time of recess an attempt had been made to explain as far as section 6 of the proposal.

Section 7 is in some ways the most important single section in the proposal, for it provides what has been unknown hitherto in the state, the right, already referred to two or three times this afternoon, of any city to frame, adopt or amend a charter for its own government and to exercise under it all power of local self-government.

This is the third of the three ways suggested this afternoon under which and by which cities and villages may be governed, the first under general laws applicable to all the villages and the cities, the second the referendum idea and the third that each city by the machinery provided in the following section 8 may elect a charter commission to frame for the city its own charter, irrespective of the form of government that may prevail in any other city of the state. It may be likened to this body now assembled. Just as this body is seeking to frame or amend a charter for the state of Ohio, so this proposal in section 7, with the details provided in section 8, undertakes to confer on each municipality the right to have its electors choose a charter commission, which charter commission is exactly analogous to this Convention, the charter convention being authorized to frame a charter, which again may be likened to a city constitution, a charter for the city, which, if ratified subsequently by the voters of the city, shall become the charter of that city. Provision is made in this seventh section that under that charter the city may exercise all powers of local self-government, but that under any such charter powers shall be subject to the general law affecting the welfare of the state as a whole.

Mr. WOODS: Back in the same place, that is, over in line 18, I would ask the member from Franklin if he is not willing that that phrase shall come out of those two sections?

Mr. KNIGHT: In the three places in which it occurs?

Mr. WOODS: Are there three places?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; it occurs in three places of the proposal, lines 18, 21 and 49 and 50. Now what is the question?

Mr. WOODS: Are you not satisfied that that phrase should be taken out of the three places in the proposal?

Mr. KNIGHT: I may answer that question by stating a fact or two first. The basis upon which this proposal was framed was a draft of a charter formulated by the Municipal League of Ohio. Section 3 as here contained in the proposal and section 7 now under consideration are substantially as framed there, but the words concerning which the gentleman has asked the question were added in the committee.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DOTY: By the committee?

Mr. KNIGHT: By the committee in the committee meeting.

Mr. DOTY: Will you please tell us why they did it?

Mr. KNIGHT: So far as I know they were added for reasons undertaken to be explained this afternoon, in order to make more certain that the phrase "general law" should mean what it said. A gentleman has asked me if I would have any objection to their being stricken out, and, not wishing to be understood as in any way binding the committee, I would say in my own personal opinion the clause in question is not necessary to accomplish the purpose intended.

Mr. DOTY: What is that purpose?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is that the general law of the state as mentioned in section 3—and I apprehend the same here—that the general laws of the state shall control. Let me read that to get it clear: "Municipalities shall have power to enact and enforce within their limits such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as are not in conflict with general laws" on the subject of police regulation of the state. That would be just as formulated in the Municipal League, and the committee added after "general laws" the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." Now, I am answering from my personal opinion only. I do not believe those words add anything to the section. If it is felt by the Convention that there is anything which involves ambiguity, personally I feel that either the language of those few words should be changed or they should be omitted. Again, I am not speaking for the committee on that point.

Mr. DOTY: If you care to give it, the information might throw light on the subject, you might state why this was put in, for what purpose?

Mr. KNIGHT: To strengthen the words "general laws."

Mr. DOTY: Was that the purpose?

Mr. KNIGHT: So far as I know.

Mr. DOTY: Was that the purpose given in the committee?

Mr. KNIGHT: I think so. I do not know of any other purpose. I am subject to correction by any member of the committee, however.

Mr. DOTY: But does it strengthen the words "general laws"? In other words, if you were to put a period after the word "laws" and strike out all the rest of the paragraph, would not the paragraph mean just exactly what you suppose it means now?

Mr. KNIGHT: In my personal opinion it would.

Mr. ANDERSON: As a matter of fact, if you strike out that part that has been referred to by the gentleman from Medina [Mr. Woods] and the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] would not the section mean more than it does now? Is this not in fact the limitation on general laws? In other words, are there not laws which would come under the definition of "general laws" that will not come under the words as contained here, "general laws, affecting the welfare of the state as a whole"?

Mr. KNIGHT: No; but I do not think the words to which the gentleman from Medina referred enlarge any powers or the meaning of the phrase "general laws."

Mr. ANDERSON: But what I am after is, do they not limit it to some extent?

Mr. KNIGHT: It might be so interpreted. It seems to have been so interpreted by some on the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then either they were put in from a mistaken notion or for a reason not stated. Is that true?

Mr. KNIGHT: I have stated every reason of which I have any knowledge.

Mr. ANDERSON: If there is any other reason you never heard of it?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is right.

Mr. ROCKEL: In the discussion of this section 7, the original draft had in it "except in municipal affairs?"

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. ROCKEL: Did not the committee find out that the courts had had a great deal of trouble in construing what were "municipal affairs" as used in section 7?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is true.

Mr. ROCKEL: And, therefore, in that place these words were inserted?

Mr. KNIGHT: In what is now section 7?

Mr. ROCKEL: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: The words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" were inserted.

Mr. ROCKEL: Those words were inserted in place of "except in municipal affairs."

Mr. DOTY: What line is that in?

Mr. KNIGHT: Forty-seven.

Mr. ROCKEL: That is the way these words got in the proposal?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, sir.

Mr. ROCKEL: And afterwards, to make the proposal conform, they were also put in the other sections?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am obliged to the gentleman for the statement on that point, which is correct.

Mr. DOTY: I would be glad to have that stated again.

Mr. KNIGHT: I yield to Mr. Rockel to make the statement.

Mr. ROCKEL: In the original draft of section 3, after it was put in section 7, it had the words, "Any city or village may frame and adopt a charter for its own government and may exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government; but all such charters shall be subject to the general law of the state, except in municipal affairs."

Mr. KNIGHT: That was the original proposal?

Mr. ROCKEL: Yes. Judge Worthington examined the decisions of California and of some other state, and I did too, and the judges there said they had very great difficulty in defining what should be included in the words "municipal affairs." Therefore, I think it was suggested by some member of the committee that there should be a change made from the language used in the brief furnished the committee. What they meant there was to convey the idea opposite to "local affairs" and that it referred to what would affect the state at large.

Mr. PECK: Do you think the phrase "local self-government" is any more definite than "municipal affairs?"

Mr. ROCKEL: That is probably true.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DWYER: What other power has a city excepting in municipal affairs?

Mr. ROCKEL: Those California courts had a great deal of trouble and there were dissenting opinions from pretty nearly all of the judges. One of the judges said he did not know what it would include. So this term was really meant to include "state affairs" as opposed to "local affairs."

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you not think it would often be very difficult to determine whether a general law affected the welfare of the state as a whole?

Mr. ROCKEL: If anyone can suggest a phrase that would exactly mark the dividing line between local municipal affairs and state affairs we would be glad to have it. We do not want to take the city out of the state. We want to keep the city in the state.

Mr. DOTY: I would ask the same question I asked the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT]. I would ask you, if we were to take the section as it stands, put a period after "general laws" and strike out all the rest of the paragraph, what difference would that make in what you say was attempted to be put in there?

Mr. ROCKEL: I think the idea of this section was to give the city supreme authority—

Mr. DOTY: I am for that, all right.

Mr. ROCKEL: —and that the legislature could not take it away—

Mr. DOTY: Quite right.

Mr. ROCKEL:—unless it were by a law that would affect the state as a whole.

Mr. DOTY: Now will you answer that question?

Mr. ROCKEL: What difference it would make?

Mr. DOTY: Yes. You have laid the groundwork for my question and now what is the answer?

Mr. ROCKEL: Well, I don't know.

Mr. DOTY: Well, I don't.

Mr. ROCKEL: I might possibly conceive that there might be a general law—

Mr. DOTY: Is not the theory of the general law that it is for the welfare of the whole state? Is not that the entire theory?

Mr. ROCKEL: That is general law.

Mr. DOTY: Then general law means for the whole state.

Mr. ROCKEL: I would not have any objection to striking out the words "affecting the state as a whole."

Mr. DOTY: Then you do not think those additional words are of any use at all?

Mr. ROCKEL: I got it from this man's brief. He said that is what they meant; that they did not want to take away from the state the right to pass laws affecting the general welfare of the state as a whole.

Mr. WOODS: I want to suggest to the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT], if everybody seems to agree, I have an amendment taking those words out and we might take them out now and save a lot of trouble.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member yield?

Mr. KNIGHT: I would prefer to go on, not thereby meaning to oppose or obstruct any opportunity to introduce amendments.

Mr. HALFHILL: A question on the same point: In the last analysis who would determine whether or not there was any conflict?

Mr. KNIGHT: Conflict where?

Mr. HALFHILL: Determine whether there was any conflict between the general laws?

Mr. KNIGHT: The courts, I apprehend, would have to determine the conflict, as always.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then the sovereign power in the legislature to legislate and the sovereign power in the municipality to legislate would never be determined until the courts get it?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is true in all cases of conflict between two bodies acting under a constitution which confers powers that may possibly overlap. In the last analysis of it the courts always have to determine that.

Mr. HALFHILL: But is not the controversy much greater in an instance like this than it would be if the grant of the power came from the state to the municipality in the ordinary understanding?

Mr. KNIGHT: I apprehend not, if the proposal is drawn as carefully as we think it is. There is an attempt to provide against conflicts at all points where we can, and to confer in the constitution directly upon the municipalities the right to do certain things; and of course the state has a right under a modified constitution as now through its lawmaking body to legislate for the state, and this attempts merely to increase the local autonomy of the municipality and to avoid the necessity of coming to the legislature for each specific item of power which the municipality may be permitted to exercise. That is the sum and substance of the whole thing.

Section 8 merely provides the machinery for which, by which and under which this charter framing shall be done. In the first place, by a vote of two-thirds of the legislative body of the city or village, without any petition of the voters, or upon a petition of ten per cent of the voters, the ordinance shall be passed providing for the submitting to the electors of the municipality this same question, Shall a commission be chosen to frame a charter?

Mr. DOTY: A question on that point. Suppose in Columbus ten per cent of the electors would file a petition with the council and the council should refuse to pass an ordinance. What would happen?

Mr. KNIGHT: You could only postpone the matter until the next municipal election. The whole of section 8 provides the machinery by and under which the question shall be submitted to the voters whether they want a charter commission, and also the method of electing or selecting the charter commission.

Section 9 provides for a similar procedure with reference to amendments to a city charter at any subsequent time.

Section 10 deals with the question of the acquisition of property by the municipality, that in any proceedings to appropriate or acquire by any means property for public use, municipalities may acquire by either condemnation or other means of acquisition an excess amount of land or property beyond that needed immediately for the improvement or public use of any kind. That is what is known technically as excess condemnation, with the restrictions that bonds issued by the municipality for the acquisition of any such excess over and above the bonds that may be issued upon the general credit of the city must be what may be termed mortgage bonds simply and constitute a lien upon all the property acquired under the particular condemnation proceedings. If, for example, a municipality desires to acquire three hundred acres for a park, and in the process of, or at the time of, that acquisition it seemed to the municipality desirable to appropriate an additional one hundred acres surrounding that park or in connection with the park, but not immediately needed or not intended to be used for park purposes, such excess may be acquired under this condemnation proceeding, but the bonds issued for such excess shall not be a general liability of the municipality—

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. PECK: Necessarily it would be as to the interest?

Mr. KNIGHT: Just a moment—but will be a lien upon the entire four hundred acres thus acquired, and any forfeiture or failure to pay the interest upon such bonds at any time would immediately warrant and authorize, as under any other mortgage, the foreclosure and taking possession of the entire property, just as in any other similar proceeding.

Mr. PECK: It would have to be foreclosed?

Mr. KNIGHT: It would have to be foreclosed.

Mr. DWYER: Would not that allow the city to go into the real estate business?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, sir; exactly what is done in a large number of European municipalities. In order to make further municipal improvement, property has been acquired for the purpose, for instance, of erecting modern tenement houses for the people in the city and more property was acquired than was desired for the immediate purpose; that property was subsequently sold and a considerable portion of the expense of the original acquisition paid out of the increased value of the excess realty which was acquired in the first instance, the increase being due to the improvement by building on that part which the city wanted to use for its own purpose.

I want to emphasize or restate the proposition that the bonds so issued for this excess amount need not be a general liability of the city, but simply a lien upon the property in question, and, like any other bonds, secured by mortgage and that a default of interest upon them would enable the holders of these bonds to proceed to take possession of the property under foreclosure proceedings.

Mr. DOTY: Now will you explain lines 95, 96, 97 and 98?

Mr. KNIGHT: Lines 95, 96, 97 and 98—I want to call attention to those. I did not intend to pass them—"Any municipality appropriating private property for a public improvement may provide money therefor in part or in whole by assessments upon the abutting property not in excess of the special benefits conferred upon such abutting property by the improvements."

At the present time, under the decisions of the court under our present constitution, the benefit conferred upon the abutting property may not be taken into consideration; consequently may not be made the basis of any special assessment or additional burden for the making of the improvement. This is intended to provide that the abutting property shall bear some share of the burden of improvement in an amount not to exceed the benefits conferred upon that property by the improvement.

Mr. ANDERSON: Say you were to take one hundred acres for a park. Would the owners of the abutting property have to pay for the taking of the park?

Mr. KNIGHT: Not beyond the amount of the benefits conferred on the property by the fact that the park is created.

Mr. ANDERSON: How would you get at that? By taking the people living in the city who were interested—the taxpayers—to determine how much the general taxpayers should pay and how much the abutting property owners should?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is the rule everywhere.

Mr. ANDERSON: That is just the reverse of the situation at the present time.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: Do you not know that was a question that was greatly discussed in the constitutional convention of 1851 and that there is a powerful argument against it by Rufus P. Ranney?

Mr. KNIGHT: A good many things were discussed in there.

Mr. PECK: And we haven't learned anything on that subject since, either.

Mr. DOTY: Is it not a fact that what is attempted to be done is what the supreme court decided for forty years could be done, and that suddenly, ten years ago, that was overturned?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; under the constitution of 1851 the abutting property was held liable.

Mr. DOTY: Was it abutting or benefited?

Mr. KNIGHT: Benefited. The decisions of the court for forty years were that the benefited property should bear its part. Now, the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] assumes a three hundred-acre park, and according to this language the abutting property—that is, the property all the way around—would have to bear a share of the burden, assuming that the burden was not in excess of the benefit.

Mr. ANDERSON: But the benefit of the park is not confined to the abutting property owners. Do you know any park that does not spread its benefits out over the people?

Mr. KNIGHT: Every improvement affects all the property.

Mr. ANDERSON: Oh, no; a curbstone in front of your property does not benefit people on the other side.

Mr. KNIGHT: Oh, no; it depends on how many want to go by that place.

Mr. ANDERSON: What I want to get at is the difference in degree of the spreading of the benefit. Excepting the very minor improvements the benefits spread farther than the abutting property, do they not?

Mr. KNIGHT: I suppose so.

Mr. ANDERSON: For forty-one years the supreme court held that benefited property should bear part of the cost.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then why, if we are trying to put in the constitution something that will put us back to that same situation, do you not use the word benefited?

Mr. KNIGHT: I have no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON: In your judgment is it not better?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am inclined to think it is as good.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am glad to get you at least up to that point.

Mr. KNIGHT: You didn't have to get me.

Mr. DWYER: I have had a good deal of experience on that in my time. Take the building of streets; they put the assessment on the benefited property and they would go out several squares where it was not benefited at all in order to get a larger amount. There is gross injustice done under that idea.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DOTY: That is not done now.

Mr. DWYER: I have known them to go several squares out, where the property was not benefited at all.

Mr. DOTY: Perhaps I can give an experience there. The city of Cleveland opened a street for the benefit of the whole lower section of the town at a cost of $1,200,000 or $1,300,000, and the city attempted under the old decision of the court to spread that out, and that was the case in which the supreme court reversed the decision that had stood for forty-one years.

Mr. KNIGHT: While I have no absolute authority to make a statement, I am of the opinion that the substitution of the word "benefited" for the term "abutting," or a similar equivalent, will be satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. PECK: Would not the word benefited include property not abutting?

Mr. KNIGHT: Certainly.

Mr. MAUCK: In the case of Norwood vs. Baker did not the supreme court of the United States hold that you could not take a street out of a piece of property and assess the rest of the property for that improvement? It has been many years since I have read that decision, but I think that is what the case decided. Maybe Judge Peck or some of the Cincinnati members might be familiar with that.

Mr. PECK: The court did so decide.

Mr. KNIGHT: My knowledge of that case is about as antiquated as that of the gentleman from Gallia [Mr. MAUCK], but my impression is that the extent of the holding of the supreme court was that the abutting property could not be assessed beyond the benefit of the remainder of the property. I may be in error, but that has been my impression as to the limit of that decision.

Mr. MAUCK: That was the Ohio rule under which it was attempted, and the federal court interfered by injunction and restrained the opening up of the street, because you could not take part of a man's property and assess the rest of it for the taking of it. If that is so, it is exactly against your proposition.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not prepared at the moment to deny that, but my idea is that the decision did not go as far as the gentleman states.

Section 11 applies a similar principle to the issuance of municipal securities in the acquisition of public utilities as provided for in section 10, for the acquisition of excess property in connection with a park and other similar acquisitions, that where the municipality acquired, constructs or extends any public utility, and desires to raise the money for any such purposes, it may issue mortgage bonds therefor beyond the general bonded indebtedness permitted to a municipality, provided, however, that such mortgage bonds beyond this limit shall not impose any liability upon such municipality, but simply be a lien upon the utility itself, including the franchise, the terms of which shall be described, and which may be acquired by the bondholders if it becomes necessary to foreclose upon that mortgage on account of a default in payment of principle or interest.

Mr. KING: Does that mean the municipal corporation can proceed indefinitely to appropriate or purchase public utilities and proceed with the construction so far as the limit of bonded indebtedness will allow, and when it shall have had half or two-thirds constructed and the limit is reached, that then it is allowed to issue municipal securities binding upon the entire city, which can then proceed to give a mortgage upon the utility for the balance of the cost of construction?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; it means just that.

Mr. NYE: I would like to ask this question concerning the indebtedness of the city applying only as a lien on the utility when an individual is required, if the mortgage property does not pay the required debt, to be responsible beyond that. Now why should not the same rule that is applicable to an individual apply to the city or municipality? To illustrate: I have a large tract of land adjoining the city and the city appropriates it at a certain price and gives a mortgage on it and issues bonds to pay for it. Perhaps when they take the property it is of large value. Now the city may go in another direction and by the time the bonds are due the property will not sell for enough to pay the bonds. Why should not the city be liable for the whole indebtedness the same as an individual would be if a mortgage that he gives does not pay the debt in full?

Mr. KNIGHT: The committee in its judgment, which may or may not have been wise—I think it was wise—did not think it well to provide that these mortgage bonds, issued for a specific purpose and for the construction of a specific utility, should constitute a lien upon any of the municipal property other than the property in question.

Mr. PECK: And no obligation on the taxpayers?

Mr. KNIGHT: And no obligation on the taxpayers beyond the general liability of the municipality.

Mr. PECK: Do I understand that the additional bonds are to be no liability upon the taxpayers?

Mr. KNIGHT: No liability except through the mortgage bonds on the utility itself, and nothing else.

Mr. PECK: Then if the city issued in its own name specific mortgage bonds referring to a particular utility, including the franchise which would be granted to the holders of the bonds, and if foreclosure became necessary under it, you say that they might acquire the utility, but could not have any judgment over?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; that is what this is meant to do.

Mr. PECK: Do you not think if the individual did that he would be liable over?

Mr. NYE: A further question in connection with that: If the property taken is of great value when the city takes it and it depreciates in value during the time the city has it, and when it comes to be sold it does not pay more than half of the bonds, why should not the city be required to pay the balance of the indebtedness the same as an individual would be if the individual had bought the property and given a mortgage?

Mr. KNIGHT: We have simply provided here to put the municipality upon the same basis as a private corporation which issues a mortgage in which it pledges the utility in question. We put the municipality in no better or no worse shape than that private corporation operating the same utility and we put the holder of the bond in no better or no worse situation. In other words, we put the municipality operating a public utility upon the same basis as a private corporation, and the holder of these mortgage bonds when issued by the municipality on the same basis as the holder of mortgage bonds when issued by the private corporation.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. NYE: Why should not the city be as liable as an individual who bought the same property? The individual would be liable for the balance of the indebtedness after the security was exhausted.

Mr. KNIGHT: Because the committee was of opinion that it should not be. This was meant in the first place not to encourage unduly the construction of public utilities by the municipalities until or unless it is evident that the municipality is making a wise municipal undertaking, and in that case there will be no depreciation, and consequently, since the mortgage bonds are a lien upon the entire property of that utility, including the franchise, the bondholder is secure.

Mr. THOMAS: It is a bond issue in the name of the city, but secured upon specific property insufficient to secure it. Would not that operate as a fraud upon innocent holders of the bonds?

Mr. KNIGHT: When the bond states specifically in its face what the lien is upon I do not regard it as a fraud.

Mr. DWYER: A great many years ago the city of Toledo issued bonds to the extent of $700,000 or $800,000, or possibly $1,000,000, to get natural gas into Toledo. Suppose they had issued bonds of the city for that and the gas plant became a failure, which it did in that case. Who would be the loser, the men who held the bonds or the city?

Mr. KNIGHT: I apprehend in a case like that, where the municipality undertook to construct a public utility of that sort and to issue mortgage bonds for the entire cost of the public utility, that the thing would take care of itself, in that those bonds would not be purchased. You will note in this provision, up to the extent of the limitation of the general indebtedness provided by law, the city may issue its general bonds, and presumptively in every case the mortgage bonds would not be for the full value of the utility itself.

Mr. DWYER: I hope the president will allow the broadest discussion to this matter, as it is one of great importance. Now suppose a city wanted to buy an electric plant already in use and issues bonds. The bonds then are a lien on the plant. Suppose by bad management on the part of the city—which is generally the case where cities undertake to manage such things—the value of that plant deteriorated—and a plant of that kind deteriorates very fast unless properly taken care of—suppose the plant originally cost $1,000,000, and it deteriorates by mismanagement on the part of the agent of the city. Who would suffer in that case? Would the bondholders suffer that loss?

Mr. KNIGHT: I apprehend so, but the Judge omits entirely one consideration which I thought I had explained a moment ago. I apprehend as a business proposition, if your city undertook to buy the electric light plant—I speak now without a definite knowledge of whether your plant now is a municipal plant or not—assuming that it is operated by a private corporation, and the city desires to purchase it and has no margin for the issuance of general bonds at the present time and is not able to raise any part of it by taxation at the present time, I apprehend it could not float the mortgage bonds, and therefore nobody would be the loser, because the bonds could not be issued in the first instance, and the safeguard—with apologies to the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory]—depends on what margin the city has left of general bonds, that a considerable portion would be provided for by the general bonds and only the remainder over beyond the amount the city could issue of general bonds would be covered by the mortgage bonds.

Mr. DWYER: From my experience of these matters I would be very slow to take any of those bonds—bonds issued by a city for a public utility, with the bonds only on the utility.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then probably you would not lose anything.

Mr. HOSKINS: We are gradually getting the question I wanted to ask answered. I would ask this, however: Is it the idea of this provision that if the city is already bonded up to the limit and desires to acquire a public utility then it can only give a lien upon that public utility itself?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is exactly the intent and exactly the provision, as near as the committee could frame it.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then if the city finds itself in that shape it would be impracticable to acquire a public utility at all—

Mr. KNIGHT: Until it reduced its general bonds so far below the limitation that there would be a margin.

Mr. HOSKINS: Would it not be possible and entirely probable that the city issuing mortgage bonds on a public utility which it might condemn and take over by condemnation proceedings might permit that property to depreciate and retrograde in value so as to destroy the mortgage security?

Mr. KNIGHT: I suppose that is possible. A good many things are possible in American cities.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you think it possible in the market to float a mortgage of that kind, a mortgage that the city does not put its credit behind?

Mr. KNIGHT: Those whose advice the committee sought, and it has been sought rather widely, were distinctly of the opinion that that would depend altogether on how large a proportion of the original cost could be paid by general bonds, just the same proposition as confronts an individual when he undertakes to place a mortgage on his farm. It depends altogether on what relation the loan bears to the total value of the farm.

Mr. HOSKINS: If the city undertakes to acquire a public utility for the benefit of the public, why should not the city assume the entire responsibility itself and stand behind all of its own obligations the same as an individual?

Mr. KNIGHT: For the simple reason that under the present conditions if you confer upon the municipality power to go into full municipal ownership without this provision or some similar provision you practically destroy the power of limiting the indebtedness of the city, the value of which limitation we all know. That has been one of the greatest evils in connection with city government, and it was the purpose of the committee to guard against that evil and yet give the fullest practicable municipal ownership.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. HOSKINS: It was the purpose to limit what they might actually be bound for, but to leave no limit as to what the city might hog? They can take everything in the municipality—

Mr. KNIGHT: Provided they can pay for it.

Mr. HOSKINS: Or promise to pay.

Mr. KNIGHT: Or promise to pay in terms that anybody will take.

Mr. PECK: In other words, if they can catch suckers enough to buy those bonds.

Mr. TANNEHILL: If the city has a present limit as to indebtedness and is up to that and the city wants to go extensively into public utilities, your method is the only method by which they could do it?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: I want to get back to this question as to general government and local self-government. In section 7 you say that "any city or village may frame, adopt or amend a charter for its government, and may exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government." What powers do you mean?

Mr. KNIGHT: All the powers of local self-government, subject to the limitations of section 12.

Mr. PECK: You don't say anything about that?

Mr. KNIGHT: There is a specific limitation in section 12.

Mr. PECK: Point it out.

Mr. KNIGHT: Section 12: "The general assembly shall have authority to limit the power of municipalities to levy taxes and incur debts for local purposes."

Mr. PECK: I am not thinking so much as to the amount, but as to the manner of doing it. Do you propose to let the city determine what shall be assessed, how it shall be assessed and who shall make the assessment and collect the assessment?

Mr. KNIGHT: Subject to general laws.

Mr. PECK: That certainly is a wide power of local self-government.

Mr. KNIGHT: The next line covers that, "subject to general laws."

Mr. PECK: You say "subject to general laws." There you come to a proposition I don't understand. What do you mean by that?

Mr. KNIGHT: General laws covering the matter of taxation.

Mr. PECK: Then you do not confer the power of local government in the matter of taxation?

Mr. KNIGHT: It does not confer any powers of local self-government beyond the limitation of the following lines, which is a limitation—I mean line 49.

Mr. PECK: There are many sorts of things that affect the general government and affect the city?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: For instance, laws relating to elections—

Mr. KNIGHT: It is specifically provided that all elections shall be held under the general laws of the state.

Mr. PECK: A good provision, when you do not make any such provision as to taxes. You leave to them the power to limit, which might apply to the amount and not to the mode of collecting.

Mr. KNIGHT: It was not so intended and I doubt if the language would bear that interpretation.

Mr. PECK: I think it would be bad to confer local self-government of that sort.

Mr. KNIGHT: In the machinery for collecting taxes?

Mr. PECK: Yes, and you might think of others. The machinery for collecting taxes in this state is very perfect and so admitted by everybody.

Mr. KNIGHT: "And the committee is of the opinion that lines 47, 48 and 49 do not interfere with it."

Mr. PECK: It is not likely to be improved on and the additional power of the municipality—

Mr. PETTIT: I rise to a point of order. These gentlemen are having a little discussion among themselves—

Mr. KNIGHT: I am answering questions.

Mr. PETTIT: But the gentleman is not asking a question, but arguing a question.

Mr. PECK: We are trying to get this in shape. My talk suggests what I want an answer to. Now, as to the matter of assessment. Suppose you lay out a road through a man's land, assess his compensation at $3,000, pay him for that road and proceed to assess back on him $3,000 for benefits conferred. Have you not simply appropriated his property for nothing?

Mr. KNIGHT: I think that has been covered by my answers heretofore.

Mr. PECK: It was not covered by any answer I have heard.

Mr. KNIGHT: The gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory] asked whether the word "benefited" would not be acceptable in place of the word "abutting."

Mr. PECK: That does not fill the bill with me.

Mr. KNIGHT: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. PECK: You may think so, but it does not. This thing of paying a man for his property in estimated benefits is a different thing from paying him in solid cash. If you take his property now you are bound to pay him and you can not pay him in estimated benefits.

Mr. KNIGHT: For forty years the supreme court held otherwise under the present constitution.

Mr. PECK: They didn't so hold except in connection with improvements. They held the improvements might be taken as an offset to any damage that might be done. The man had to be paid in cash for his property, but if he claimed there were any damages to the rest of his property those damages could be offset by benefits to the property.

Mr. KNIGHT: There is no difference between us. If the language here does not accomplish what you are trying to do we are willing to make it.

Mr. PECK: I am going to propose to strike all of that out when the proper time comes.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you not think the practice of allowing a great city to issue bonds without being fully responsible for payment would be somewhat akin to the principle of selling bonds and stocks on blue sky against which we passed a proposal the other day?

Mr. PECK: Or gold bricks?

Mr. KNIGHT: Not at all, in the judgment of the committee; and there is no analogy between them.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you not think it would have a tendency to encourage an adventurous city administration in speculation in building up railways and public utilities so that by the time the administration gets to its end it has failed and the bonds are worthless?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is an argument instead of a question, but, answering the argument, the provision is this: You have to sell your bonds before anybody loses any money. You have stated a double proposition, first that it would encourage municipal speculation. This very provision, in the judgment of the committee, has the opposite tendency. If you permit unlimitedly the municipality to go into municipal ownership, without any limitation on the city, you encourage municipal speculation.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. PECK: Why not let them stop when they get to the end of their credit?

Mr. KNIGHT: We think there might be a well justified desire for the municipality to go beyond that limit to the extent covered here.

Mr. PECK: Some speculative gentleman that has something in mind, is about the amount of that.

Mr. STEWART: As I understand the situation in reference to municipal indebtedness, there are two types of bonded indebtedness. One class is based on paved streets, sewers, public buildings, etc., from which no revenue is received.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: The other type is such as water works, electric lights, etc., upon which revenue is received.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Under our present system of limitation that applies directly to that portion from which there is no revenue received; do you not see that when you are combining these two types of indebtedness, you are absolutely closing the door to any improvement along the line of paved streets, sewers, public buildings, etc.?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; I understand the statement, but your question is not clear. Will you put that question over again?

Mr. STEWART: I mean that when you have these two types of public improvements, after having them created, might not this kind of a situation prevail: When the people have embarked in municipal ownership will it not take away from the people their right to incur any indebtedness for the things from which they receive no revenue and do you not thereby tie them up?

Mr. KNIGHT: No; not any more than they are tied at the present time. Any municipalities that have reached the limits of indebtedness are tied up now. It is discretionary with the municipality in which direction it will go.

Mr. DWYER: In the city I represent we are selling our bonds at three and one-half per cent because of the high character of the security. They have all the property of the city back of them. We have a private electric light plant there. Now suppose the city goes to work and buys that under this arrangement and issues bonds, what rate of interest would the city have to pay?

Mr. KNIGHT: It depends on whether the city attempted to issue bonds for its full value or not. They would have to pay a higher per cent if the value were only $1,000,000 and they attempted to issue $1,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. DWYER: You would have the city paying two different rates for money.

Mr. KNIGHT: Quite possible, depending on the nature of the security. That is the rule of the financial world.

Mr. DOTY: If the municipality decided to buy the electric plant because it is of benefit to the whole community how can you justify the preventing of that municipality from using its own resources that it legitimately has for the purpose of bringing into existence that lighting plant? What is the justification in cutting down, as the member from Ashtabula brought out, one-half the resources to produce a thing for the benefit of the whole city? Why should not the whole city be allowed to use that which is for its own benefit?

Mr. KNIGHT: In the first place I undertook to answer that a moment ago by referring briefly to the history of municipal indebtedness in this country. The committee was unanimously unwilling to let the municipality incur indebtedness to an unlimited extent. If you answer, why put a limit? I reply, if we put no limit each municipality is allowed to go to ruin if it wants to.

Mr. DOTY: That is not the question. Leave the limit entirely separate, although I myself do not believe in a debt limit. That does not enter into the discussion. Assume the city has no debt, but has a debt limit which allows it to issue $20,000,000 of bonds. Under this you do not allow the city to use any part of that $20,000,000—

Mr. KNIGHT: We allow them to use $20,000,000 of credit.

Mr. DOTY: You use the term mortgage bonds right in here.

Mr. KNIGHT: If the gentleman will read the proposal carefully he will find there is no such provision here.

Mr. DOTY: Section 11?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: If it has $20,000,000 margin it may issue those $20,000,000 as general bonds for which the entire municipality is liable?

Mr. KNIGHT: But if it takes twenty-one millions, the last one million is a lien only upon the entire public utility.

Mr. DOTY: Then it is on account of my inability to understand language.

Mr. KNIGHT: Or the committee has not used proper language.

Mr. DOTY: "Any municipality which acquires, constructs or extends any public utility and desires to raise money for such purposes may issue mortgage bonds therefor."

Mr. KNIGHT: Read the next six or eight lines.

Mr. DOTY: "beyond the general limit of bonded indebtedness prescribed by law". But a mortgage bond is not as good as a general bond, is it?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is not the intent. It is not undertaking to be so secure—

Mr. DOTY: But is a mortgage bond—

Mr. KNIGHT: Just a moment. You and I are of the same opinion, only you read the thing one way and the committee means it another way. What the intent of the proposal is—and if it does not so provide it is the fault of the language and not done wittingly—the intent is if there is a margin of $20,000,000 the city of Cleveland may use the entire $20,000,000 for the purpose of constructing or acquiring the electric light plant. Further than that, if it costs $25,000,000 to construct that plant, the last $5,000,000 can only be raised upon mortgage bonds, which mortgage bonds shall constitute a lien upon the entire public utility.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DOTY: I can see out on the latter part, but not on the first part, where you say to raise money for such purposes you can issue mortgage bonds.

Mr. KNIGHT: Read a few lines further, read through the section.

Mr. DOTY: "provided, that such mortgage bonds issued beyond the general limit of bonded indebtedness prescribed by law shall not impose any liability upon such municipality".

Mr. KNIGHT: Go on, you are doing first rate.

Mr. DOTY: "But shall be secured only upon the property and revenues of such public utility, including a franchise stating the terms upon which, in case of foreclosure, the purchaser may operate the same, which franchise shall in no case extend for a longer period than twenty years from the date of the sale of such utility and franchise on foreclosure."

Mr. KNIGHT: Now the security for the last five millions—

Mr. DOTY: I can understand that. That is plain. I am talking about the security for the first twenty millions.

Mr. KNIGHT: The general liability of the city.

Mr. DOTY: It does not say so. It says mortgage bonds.

Mr. KNIGHT: Let us go back to line 101. It may issue bonds beyond the general limit. Then up to the general limit it issues bonds for general public improvement, general bonds, and this simply confers additional power to go beyond that, but in going beyond it the additional bonds shall be secured by mortgage upon the utility alone and upon nothing else.

Mr. ROCKEL: This entire section is a section of limitation.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Suppose a city is up to its bonded limit, as Cleveland is. What is your opinion as to whether the mortgage bonds would be readily saleable?

Mr. KNIGHT: My opinion is where a municipality undertakes to acquire a public utility and it has no power to issue general bonds because up to the limit, it would not be able to float the bonds.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: So that this provision in that sort of a case automatically defeats municipal ownership?

Mr. KNIGHT: The limitation is a limitation to that extent.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: It makes it impossible for the city to acquire title because it has not money to pay.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Reversing the figures used in the colloquy with Mr. Doty, with respect to issuing twenty millions of bonds and having an indebtedness of five millions over, suppose they could issue within the limit of five millions and the other twenty millions must be secured by the mortgage bonds and the lien on the utility itself, then in the event the property representing the loan depreciates is it fair to the man whose property has been appropriated to require him to have his redress only as a lien?

Mr. KNIGHT: What do you mean by his property appropriated?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The man from whom you got the property.

Mr. KNIGHT: You pay him in cash, not in bonds.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Then the people who buy the bonds—

Mr. KNIGHT: Where there is on the face of the bond a clear statement of what the mortgage covers, and in the mortgage a clear statement of what the bond covers, both sides are amply protected. I do not believe that we can in a constitution or by law accomplish the rather difficult feat of making men who have not ordinary business sense have extraordinary business sense.

Mr. LAMPSON: Will the gentleman yield for a question? Do you think that any reputable bond house or any honest man would recommend that kind of a bond to a woman or person unacquainted with such matters?

Mr. KNIGHT: It would depend on the proportion of the value of the utility that was covered by the mortgage bond. Neither you nor I would under any circumstances recommend a person with a small amount of money to invest to take a real estate mortgage equal to one hundred per cent of the supposed value of the farm. We would recommend the taking of a mortgage where there is say fifty per cent of the value of the farm or any such matter. I see no reason whatever, nor did the committee see any reason whatever, why, when the municipality undertakes to issue mortgage bonds of even fifty per cent of the value of the utility, including a franchise, the terms and conditions of which are described in advance and are part of the mortgage contract, and the total face value of the mortgage is a reasonable percentage of the value of the utility—I know of no reason under the canopy why a reputable bond house or a reputable individual might not and would not recommend such mortgage or such a bond under the circumstances named. In fact, we are advised in our committee by bond houses that they would do that thing.

Mr. LAMPSON: If you would allow me, I would say as a person who has been associated in the same office with a firm that is dealing in municipal and state bonds all the time, that I would not permit such a thing to be done. I do not believe that any reputable bond house would do it.

Mr. KING: Is it not true that the purchaser of a government bond issued by or under governmental authority takes it always subject to the conditions prescribed by the law under which it was issued regardless of what may be printed upon its face, and this law expressly exempts the municipality from liability?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is true as to the latter part, and as to the first part I have no knowledge.

Mr. DWYER: Suppose a city buys an electric light plant which has a franchise from the city. The moment the city buys it that franchise merges. The city gave the franchise and when it gets the property back the franchise comes to it and the whole thing is merged in the city. Is not that so?

Mr. KNIGHT: I concede that.

Mr. DWYER: Then there is no franchise: it becomes merged and is all in the city.

Mr. KNIGHT: The latter part of the section takes care of that.

Mr. DWYER: It becomes the city's property.

Mr. KNIGHT: The latter part of the section says that whenever a municipality acquires such a public utility and desires to issue its mortgage bonds, it must state in advance the terms upon which, in a case of foreclosure, the bondholders shall acquire not only the physical property but also a franchise under the terms of which they may operate the property when it comes into their possession by virtue of foreclosure. It is a new franchise dating from the time of foreclosure and has no reference to any terms or conditions of any franchise existing before the thing came into possession of the city.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DWYER: Now let us reason that out in a circle —

Mr. KNIGHT: There is not any circle.

Mr. DWYER: Wait until I get through. Say a private electric plant is in the city and the city buys that plant by condemnation or in some other way and it is city property.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. DWYER: There is a bond issue put on that.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. DWYER: Now suppose the indebtedness is not paid, what then? There will be a foreclosure?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, sir.

Mr. DWYER: And it sells for what it brings?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, sir.

Mr. DWYER: There is no franchise. It was merged, and therefore, when you sell it, you sell it without a franchise. I am talking about the legal proposition.

Mr. KNIGHT: Are you through?

Mr. DWYER: Is not that the fact?

Mr. KNIGHT: No, sir; it is not. If you will allow me to make a statement I can dispose of it. I do not want to take the time of the Convention repeating so much. I presume if you had been listening to my last explanation on that line you wouldn't have asked that question.

Mr. DWYER: I am illustrating where it leads to.

Mr. KNIGHT: I would like to answer the question if you would let me.

Mr. DWYER: Let me reason it out. Let me state the facts submitted to the Convention. Suppose the city buys an electric plant that has a franchise for twenty or thirty years. The moment the city buys that by condemnation or purchase the franchise is merged —

Mr. KNIGHT: Good.

Mr. DWYER: — into the superior title.

Mr. KNIGHT: We are agreed.

Mr. DWYER: Now, in course of time the interest is not paid on the bonds issued for that purpose. The men holding the bonds have to foreclose, and what do they get? No franchise at all, and they have to make terms with a city to get a franchise. Is not that so?

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DWYER: What is the point of order.

Mr. WINN: I make the point of order that the member from Montgomery [Mr. DWYER] insists upon asking questions and will not permit answers, resulting in great confusion. Those questions have been asked over and over again and the speaker has not had any opportunity to make an answer.

Mr. DWYER: I will take two minutes and I will be through. I was reasoning this out on the lines of the proposal.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Montgomery has the floor.

Mr. DWYER: Just give me two minutes. I appreciate the position of the Professor. But I think it is clear that if the property is foreclosed the purchasers get the property and there is no franchise, the franchise is merged. Now he has to get a new franchise from the city; and suppose he gets a new franchise from the city. In the course of four or five years the city takes a notion to condemn that plant again, and the city may do it the second time and may go through the same process right straight along. That is the whole thing.

Mr. KNIGHT: I would like to answer the question if the gentleman will kindly listen. In line 105 it is specifically stated that a part of the property covered by the mortgage in the first instance is a franchise which shall date from the time of the foreclosure, the full terms and conditions of which are made and announced and determined before a single bond is issued, and that franchise, which will become operative whenever there is a foreclosure, is as much a part of the property covered by the mortgage as is the physical property itself. Therefore, when the mortgage is foreclosed those who foreclose it and who acquire title under the foreclosure have not only acquired the physical property of the plant, but they have acquired a franchise the full and definite terms of which are described in the mortgage before the mortgage was put to record and before a single bond was issued, and which can not be modified in any jot or tittle by the municipality after the foreclosure. Therefore, the holders of the bonds know in advance, before they purchase or acquire a single bond, just exactly the terms upon which they may operate that public utility in case it ever becomes necessary to foreclose the mortgage. There is no juggling about it. They know beyond any peradventure of doubt just how long they can operate and they know exactly on what terms and conditions.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you think that such a franchise in the hands of miscellaneous bondholders would be very valuable as against a hostile municipal administration?

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not see what the question of the hostility or friendliness of the municipal corporation would have to do with it.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose the bonds were scattered around the country in the hands of small holders, widows and others, in sums of $500 and $1,000. Of what practical value would that franchise be to that class of bondholders as against an administration that might be seeking to get control of the franchise at a low price for the benefit of some of their number or for their city?

Mr. KNIGHT: That franchise is no more subject to subsequent control of the municipality than any franchise under which any municipality is operating any utility. It can not be interfered with.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose the bondholders do not know how to use it?

Mr. KNIGHT: Then they have the physical property, the entire public utility, plus the franchise —

Mr. LAMPSON: Which is worthless to them.

Mr. KNIGHT: Are you through?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: They have not only the physical property, but they have the franchise, which may run for twenty years, and the physical property, which they can operate under this franchise. I do not suppose it is necessary to assume that the bondholders themselves must operate the plant. They have the property, which has value and a decided added value because of the franchise, to-wit, a certain thing with which the municipality can not interfere during the life of the franchise.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. TALLMAN: Under the foreclosure of the mortgage and when the physical property and franchise are sold, is not the prior bondholder relegated to his share in the proceeds of the sale and the widow or anybody else has no longer any interest in the plant or the bonds which he has theretofore bought?

Mr. KNIGHT: Any bondholder has the option to take his or her share of the property covered by the bonds in such form as may be determined, that is, upon partition of the property or upon partition of the proceeds, but as a business proposition we know that under those circumstances a committee of the bondholders takes charge of the whole matter in the interest of the bondholders. It is not necessary to assume that the franchise of the property is worth anything at all.

Mr. TALLMAN: She might take a bond in the new corporation that buys the plant or she might take her interest in money, as she chooses.

Mr. KNIGHT: No question about that part of it.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Did the committee in making these bonds a general liability of the city consider an automatic sinking fund with a fixed or varying tax rate?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not sure of the last proposition, but they did consider making it a general liability of the municipality and were unanimously against it as to the specific feature you have named. I know that was discussed, but I am not certain of the attitude of the committee on that, but this whole question of general liability was discussed.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: If a sinking fund were created and a tax rate made mandatory, would not that be a check against loss?

Mr. KNIGHT: It might be.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Does not that automatically defeat municipal ownership in a large city?

Mr. KNIGHT: It depends on the present bonded indebtedness.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Was that what the committee wanted to do?

Mr. KNIGHT: No, sir; not at all. Now, section 12 has in part already been discussed by the Convention in connection with section 10 and section 11:

The general assembly shall have authority to limit the power of municipalities to levy taxes and incur debts for local purposes and may require reports from municipalities as to their financial condition and transactions, in such form as may be provided by law, and may provide for the examination of the vouchers, books and accounts of all municipal authorities, or of public undertakings conducted by such authorities.

This last clause is especially desirable in order that there might be full and adequate public knowledge of the condition of the municipality operated public utility, and it is practically a continuation or embodiment of what is now provided by the statutes.

Section 13 provides "All elections and submissions of questions provided for in this article shall be conducted by the election authorities prescribed by general laws", and provides a basis and per cent for petitions required.

Section 14 is subject to modification to this extent: That it may be entirely removed or there may be added to it such a statement as will avoid any possible conflict between the new proposed article XVIII and the existing sections of article XIII touching private corporations and which have been incorporated in one or two other features as applicable also to municipal corporations.

Mr. KRAMER: I want to ask a question or two to find out how far the municipalities will be allowed to go into business. Take Cincinnati. It has three hundred and fifty miles of street railway. Suppose Cincinnati should take over that three hundred and fifty miles of street railway and suppose they take in $2,000,000 a year. Does this section mean that the city of Cincinnati could go outside of Cincinnati with a railway to the extent of one hundred and seventy-five miles of inter-urban roads, or does it mean Cincinnati could go outside a sufficient extent to take in $1,000,000?

Mr. KNIGHT: It was intended that the mileage outside of the city in the case of transportation service could not be in excess of one-half of that within the city itself. In the case of water supply it may supply outside of the city its surplus, but in no event to exceed one-half of that actually supplied to the people of the municipality, and the same way with lighting service.

Mr. KRAMER: Take the telephone service. To what extent could the city go out? It is easy to see as to the water supply and as to the electric light service, etc., but take the telephone company or electric railway company and how are you going to decide to what extent the city may go outside of its limit to do business?

Mr. KNIGHT: I just answered about the railroad. Beyond all question it would be on the basis of mileage.

Mr. KRAMER: Well, take the telephone.

Mr. KNIGHT: As there are no municipally owned telephone companies in the state of Ohio at the present time there are three or four possible bases on which that could be done, either fifty per cent of the number of calls or fifty per cent of the telephones, or possibly a length of line.

Mr. KRAMER: Would not that give any municipality in Ohio the right to maintain lines all through the state because of the vast amount of service done in the city compared with the service outside of the city?

Mr. KNIGHT: Possibly, though I doubt it. I might ask a question in turn — what of it?

Mr. KRAMER: Would it not be a whole lot better to limit the municipality in its ownership to such things as water supply and electric light supply and not allow it to go out into business — the interurban electric railway and the telephone service?

Mr. KNIGHT: If we want to stand still, yes — if we want to cut off the field of municipal activity; but a majority of us are not of that opinion. We already have that power on one or two things and the distinct idea attempted to be stated at the very beginning — the distinct idea underlying the whole proposal, the idea, as we believe, of the present time and the future and the thing desired by the municipalities of the state of Ohio, is the opportunity when they please to go into the ownership and control and operation of public utilities, with the limitation upon the power to burden their people with taxes and debt as indicated by the latter provisions of the proposal.

Mr. KRAMER : Will the legislature have to do something in order to make section 6 available, or does section 6 work itself, and if section 6 works itself, without any legislation whatever, what do you mean by the fifty per cent? You say it might be on the service rendered or it might be what calls are made or it might be on the income. Does the legislature have to do something in order to determine to what extent the city can go?

Mr. KNIGHT: As to the basis of determining the fifty per cent there are only two services which you mention on which there might be any doubt. One is telephone transportation service, and there is nothing in this to debar the legislature from enacting a statute as to that.

Mr. WEYBRECHT: Referring back to section 6, is it intended in that section to prevent municipalities from owning and selling those products at less than cost?

Mr. KNIGHT: Not that I know of.

Mr. WEYBRECHT: It could do that under this provision?

Mr. KNIGHT: I suppose so, just as a private corporation can if there is any reason for doing it. It places the municipality upon the same basis as a private corporation with reference to privileges.

Now I am compelled to apologize for taking up so much time. I was not attempting to make an argument, but simply to tell you just what, in the judgment of the speaker, the proposal means.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Mr. President and Fellow Delegates: The chairman of the committee on Municipal Government finds himself in an embarrassing situation. When he left here Thursday it was with the distinct understanding that the proposal on municipal government would be taken up Tuesday morning. He does not know of any member of the committee who had a different understanding. You can appreciate his surprise and amazement on coming here this evening to find that the discussion of the proposal had been taken up this afternoon in his absence.

Mr. DOTY: I would like to ask a question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The speaker does not yield at present. He asks the indulgence of the Convention until he makes the few statements that he is now able to make.

I do not know — not having been here during the discussion — whether proper recognition has been given to the part that Judge Worthington played in our deliberations. If it has not, I now wish to acknowledge in behalf of the committee the deep sense of obligation which the committee is under to Judge Worthington. He was not a regularly appointed member of the committee. He came into the committee at my request, and on the vote of the committee he was made an honorary member. I knew his legal knowledge and his great interest in municipal government. I knew that he would be a valuable member of the committee if we could get his services. I feel that his illness is due in a great part to the amount of work which he gave to our proposal, and it is no more than proper that public acknowledgment of his labors should be made on the floor of the Convention.

In listening to the discussion that we have had since seven o'clock this evening, it occurred to me that possibly proper recognition has not been had of the great difficulties under which your committee labored. There were two conflicting forces in the committee, those whom we shall call "radicals" — without any desire, of course, to be offensive — who demanded that the fundamental basis of this proposal should be complete sovereignty in the municipality, independent of the state. There were others who thought they were progressive, but who would not accept that doctrine. They could not see how there could be a sovereignty within a sovereignty. So the first clash was between those who demanded all powers for the municipality, practically without reference to the state, and those who demanded that the state should be supreme.

It is but fair to say that the most radical in the committee, with a fine sense of their obligations to the Convention, made very important concessions, and there was at no time anything but unanimity in the final consideration of every section. If you will read this proposal carefully you will see that the state is dominant. The great powers of taxation, the great police power, and the great powers of education and of health, all are held with a firm hand by the state. You may liken the power of the state to a bank note, through which the silken threads run strong and firm giving pliability but not permitting disintegration. That is the fundamental underlying principle of the proposal which you have to consider. The state is dominant in those principles in which, in the judgment of the committee, it should be dominant. Municipalities are given the greatest possible freedom, all of course protected and hedged in by these general fundamental principles.

Section 6 of article XIII of the present constitution provides: "The general assembly shall provide for the organization of cities, and incorporated villages, by general laws". As has been ably set forth by one of the best lawyers in the state of Ohio, the general assembly has construed this as a mandate to provide in detail for the organization of municipalities. Now, that rule is completely overthrown in the present form of this proposal. It seems to me that this is of such vital interest and importance that perhaps going over it a second time will not do any very great injury. It may test your patience a little, but just consider that you are legislating on the most vital subject for all the people of the state of Ohio living in cities and villages, and those not living in cities and villages at present, but in places which may later become cities and villages. My reason a week ago, when I first presented the proposal to the Convention, in not asking that it be put ahead of its place on the calendar, was for the purpose of giving every member a chance to study the proposal, and I did not think it ought to be hurried. The more you study it, the more discussion we have about it, the better in the long run it will be, and if defects can be found in it, as the result of careful consideration, the remedies will also be found. With the exception of two clauses, I will say that every word in every section was carefully weighed, not only with reference to its meaning, but in its relation to everything else. That was done by the lawyers in the committee, and in them I include the veteran, Professor Knight, who lent his scholarship to our efforts, without any thought of the time we asked him to devote to it. All of the phrases, and all of the words, and all of the legal interpretations, were considered by this most competent to do it. On a little clause of four words, Judge Worthington went through I don't know how many decisions of the state of California. I know in his desk there is a memorandum of something like forty or fifty decisions of the court, many of which he considered carefully, and gave our committee the benefit of his labors, and it was because of his judgment on that proposition that we discarded those words, although urged very strongly by the Municipal Government League, represented by Professor Hatton and Mayor Baker and others in Cleveland, to retain them. I mention this fact simply to give you an idea of the care that was taken in the consideration of every word, and the committee at one time thought that they would give you as nearly a perfect instrument as the intelligence of the committee could furnish. Now I take the liberty, with this explanation, of again calling your attention to certain sections, and asking you always to bear in mind these two propositions; firstly, that the state must be dominant, and secondly, that it is made so in those things in which the majority of the committee thought the state ought to be dominant.

Section 1 seems to be legislative. It is a division of municipalities into cities and villages. It was thought wise to make this now a constitutional provision. For sixty years this present division of municipalities into cities and villages has been found satisfactory by the people, and in order to take away the temptation from the legislature at any future time, during the life of the constitution, to change those lines of demarkation this was incorporated in the constitution.

Section 2. Now, I call your attention to the fact that our proposal allows for three methods of organizing municipalities:

1. As at present under general laws.
2. Under general laws, plus special laws.
3. By a charter commission.

It is believed by your committee, if the legislature is wise, there will be very few charter commissions named to frame special charters. There will be no occasion for it. Let me illustrate how your committee figured this out. We will suppose that the city of Cincinnati says to the legislature, "The general laws now applying are very good in the main, but there are certain conditions applying to large cities not now covered and which cannot be covered by general laws, we submit half a dozen special laws, and if you will enact them, we shall be glad to work under the general laws and the special laws." The legislature after careful scrutiny sees the wisdom of it and enacts those special laws. But those special laws cannot immediately be placed in effect in the municipality of Cincinnati. They can only become law there if that municipality adopts them by a referendum vote.

Now the city of Cincinnati, we will say, adopts these special laws by referendum vote. The city of Cleveland, the city of Columbus, the city of Toledo, the city of Youngstown, and a dozen other large and prosperous cities in the state find out that those special laws, or some of them, will suit their case exactly, so they by referendum vote adopt such special laws as suit their peculiar conditions and needs, and work under the general laws, plus such special laws as they have adopted. The great advantage of that is that all temptation is taken away from the legislature to enact special laws in the interest of any political party, or for any particular reason, or for any special interest, because the enactment of the special law by the legislature will do no good until the municipality has accepted and adopted it by a referendum vote. We consider that of great importance, and there was some discussion in the committee and some objection in the beginning because we insisted on making it mandatory for each municipality to adopt the special laws before it could act on them. We were told that we were increasing the number of elections and increasing the expense of elections. Our conclusion was that the hardship caused by the number of elections and the expense of the elections was far outweighed by the general good done to the community for it to become educated on the special law, for a referendum vote means discussion; hence this was made mandatory.

The mere fact, as I tried to explain to you, that it is a limitation on the general assembly, shows that the incentive for an abuse of those powers is taken away from the general assembly.

Of course, you will readily see, as a municipality expands, it would naturally take advantage of certain special laws which would have been sought for by the larger municipalities, but which the smaller municipalities would not need; the elasticity enables the smaller municipality to act at any time under the special law and the referendum election had thereunder.

Section 3 gives municipalities such police, sanitary and other similar regulations as are not in conflict with general laws affecting the welfare of the state as a whole. I assume there is no disagreement in reference to the enactment of the "local police, sanitary and similar regulations." I understood some days ago that there was considerable dissatisfaction with the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." In justice to myself, as chairman of the committee, because I had distinctly stated when I assumed that position—and the report was given to the newspapers, so as to give it the widest publicity—that so far as I could control, the wet and dry fight should not be put into the municipal government proposal, I wish to state that we were absolutely neutral, and I believed we had succeeded until my attention was called to that phrase, "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." That phrase was put in at the very urgent request of one of the most radical homerulers I ever met, namely, my colleague from Cincinnati, Mr. Starbuck Smith. He intends to leave a sick wife tomorrow morning to come to this Convention and explain his reasons for the use of those words, because I had called his attention to the necessity for so doing. Mr. Smith had repeatedly urged upon us that the limitation of the words "general laws," was most dangerous. Now, bear in mind that he is a radical homeruler. He believes in independent sovereignty. He was as radical as the Cleveland delegates, and that is saying a great deal, and he took this line of argument—how much merit there is in it, I do not know, but I do believe he is absolutely sincere: He stated that the general assembly might enact any number of laws that really fitted individual communities, and yet call them general laws, when as a matter of fact they would not be general laws in their application and effect, and he insisted upon those qualifying words going into this section 3. We made that concession the last evening, at the very last meeting held by our committee before instructions were given, or rather at the time instructions were given, to report out the proposal. I regret that he is not here to defend his position, but if he gets here tomorrow I am satisfied he will be able to do so.

In view of the dissatisfaction on the part of a certain element of the Convention to those words, and the insistence on the part of another element in the Convention that they should be there, it seems to me that the Convention may properly, and ought to, consider fully and carefully the merit of those words, and if there be anything "concealed in the woodpile," the Convention will know what to do. As chairman of the committee I do not feel justified in accepting their elimination as a voluntary act on my part, notwithstanding the fact, as I said, and as every member of the committee knows, they were inserted at the last meeting the committee held, when they instructed the chairman to report out the proposal, and use the words "local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as are not in conflict with the general laws, affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." It was urged, and I believe properly, that it would in principle reverse the general law in the state on the subject, namely, that the law now presumes that no function not distinctly enumerated by the general assembly can be exercised by the municipality. This section, if I am correctly informed, would reverse that principle entirely. It would assume that all functions not specifically denied—local functions I refer to—could be exercised by the municipality, and, of course, that is the essence of home rule.

Section 4 confers power to acquire through purchase, lease or construction any and all public utilities, and the power is given to condemn for public use any existing private utility.

Section 5 covers the method of procedure under section 4. Of course it is inconceivable to imagine home rule without carrying with it the right of municipal ownership, and that without any regard whatsoever as to the individual opinions as to the advisability of municipal ownership, but home rule without the right of municipal ownership is the empty husk; the kernel has been removed.

Section 6 gives to the municipality the right to sell an amount of its surplus product or service in any public utility equal to fifty per cent of that supplied to the inhabitants of the municipality.

Now, we took a great deal of time in getting the correct phraseology for this section. The members will recall how every word was weighed, what its effect was in relation to what we had in mind, and it was found an absolute necessity in order to make municipal ownership feasible, because if you were going to stop a traction line at the city limits frequently you might as well have no traction line, but, to prevent that, the limit of fifty per cent excess product or service was determined on, which seemed very reasonable. Of course, the question asked by Mr. Kramer as to how that fifty per cent would apply in a public utility like a telephone, would be a question for the courts to determine. The question of supplying water would be a very similar one. The question as to supplying fifty per cent of transportation might be and probably would be a question of interpretation. Would the unit be the number of miles occupied by the transportation service in the city, or would the unit be the horsepower generated? We recognize that these are things that must be left to the interpretation of the courts.

Section 7 gives the right to any municipality to adopt a charter, and I would ask you to bear in mind that no charter could grant or give one iota of power additional to that which the municipality would have under general and special laws without any charter. A charter might give the municipality a commission form, or any one of a dozen different forms of government, but it could not and does not give increased powers over those granted to any municipality not adopting a charter. The object was not to encourage charter government, but to give the city the right to exercise it if conditions justified.

Section 8 is the method of procedure under the charter. You will notice that throughout the proposal there is a great deal of what is called legislative enactment. This is absolutely necessary. We start out with the proposition that the municipality shall be given home rule. We did not want to curtail or dwarf or deform that cardinal principle in any manner by leaving to the legislature the right to make the form of procedure, for the legislature might be very slow about it and do any number of foolish things and therefore in the proposal itself are embodied those legislative features absolutely proper and essential for the rational carrying out of the scheme of government.

Section 9 provides the method of amendment to the charter, which, of course, is exactly the same as the method of adopting the charter.

Section 10 is something that is entirely new in American municipalities. There was not brought to my attention, nor do I believe to the attention of any member of the committee, a single instance of any American city having what we call "excess condemnation." It has been for fifty years one of the agencies of municipal government or power in London, Paris and Berlin. I have received from Mr. Herbert Swan, of New York City, who I believe is the leading authority in America on excess condemnation, the advance two or three hundred pages of his book on that subject, and I gave the committee the benefit of a resume of it. He showed by statistics from those great cities the large sums of money which the cities had made by reason of the use of excess condemnation. It ran up into the millions. I think London and Paris showed something like $30,000,000 to 40,000,000 of profit in a period of fifty years by the use of excess condemnation. Broadly it is this: When a municipality finds it necessary to extend a street or acquire land for park purposes, it may also find it advisable to condemn and secure by purchase other property adjacent to or in the neighborhood of the proposed thoroughfare or park lands, which in the opinion of the municipal authorities will be likely to enhance very materially in value within a few years on account of the improvement contemplated. Of course there is danger of speculation in land on the part of the municipality to guard against which your committee attempted to make as reasonably difficult as it was reasonable to do, at the same time leaving it a practical working proposition by making the limitation of bonds for the payment of this "excess condemnation" conditioned upon certain things stated in the proposal, the limitation of bonds and the method of paying for the property.

Section 11. I call your attention to lines '95 to '98, which should have been a separate section. It has no bearing whatsoever upon the remainder of section 10, and it was an oversight on our part that we did not make it a separate section. Those lines revolutionize the existing laws in the state of Ohio on this subject. It was a matter of great concern to me, because some of the legal members of our committee were strongly opposed to the acceptance of the principle embodied in this section. So in order to get a clear understanding, and thinking it would be not only of interest to me, but of greater interest to the lawyers in the Convention, I went to my own attorney and asked him to write a short brief on the subject, and to furnish some leading authorities. I shall now read it to you because I think you will find it very interesting. I am now referring to the proposition on reversing the present law in the state of Ohio on the subject of appropriating private property for public uses. I want to say before reading this letter that I referred it to Judge Peck and Mr. Halfhill, whose opinions as lawyers I know will be acceptable, and they both approved so thoroughly of it, that I think I am justified in submitting it for your consideration:

Office of
SIMEON W. JOHNSON
Attorney-at Law
Cincinnati

HON. GEORGE W. HARRIS,
*Chairman of Committee on Municipal Government, Constitutional Convention, State House,
Columbus, Ohio.*

DEAR SIR:—At your request I have given consideration to the following provision as adopted by your committee:

"Any municipality appropriating private property for a public improvement, may provide money therefor in part or in whole, by assessments on abutting property not in excess of the special benefits conferred upon such abutting property by the improvements."

The above provision radically changes the existing law on the subject in this state. Chamberlain v. City of Cleveland was decided by the supreme court of Ohio in 1878, 34 O. S. 551. That case involved the opening of a street and an assessment for the land ordered to be appropriated for that purpose.

In the language of the court in a later case, Dayton et al. v. Bauman, 66 O. S. 379, 394:

"The case of Chamberlain v. Cleveland was decided in the light of Cleveland v. Wick, 18 O. S. 303, and the question as to whether money could be raised by assessments to pay for private property taken for public use was not raised and was not argued or decided but was conceded by counsel and assumed by the court."

The bar of the state, however, regarded the Chamberlain case as holding in effect that an assessment could be properly made against abutting property for the cost of appropriating the necessary land for opening a street, and many ordinances were passed making such assessment. This continued to be the course until 1902, when the case of Dayton et al. v. Bauman, 66 O. S. 397, was decided. In that case it was held:

"The limitation of section 19 of article I of the constitution on section 6 of article XIII as to assessment goes to the full extent of prohibiting the raising of money directly or indirectly by assessment to pay compensation damages or costs for lands appropriated by the public for public use."

Since 1902 in all municipal corporations the public has paid for the land appropriated for a public use, such as streets, etc. Is the amendment proposed, however, in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution providing that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws? In other words, to adopt the reasoning of our supreme court in the Bauman case heretofore cited, would a taking of private property for a public use, such as streets, confer any special benefits whatever upon the owners of abutting property? If not, then no assessment could be enforced. If no benefits were conferred then the levying an assessment for such an improvement upon abutting property would be the taking or the confiscation of such property to the extent of such assessment.

It was so held in Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, decided in 1898, wherein the supreme court of the United States said:

"The exaction from the owner of private property of the cost of a public improvement in substantial excess of the special benefits accruing to him is, to the extent of such excess, a taking under the guise of taxation of private property for public use without compensation."

The decision in the Baker suit led to the bringing in the federal tribunals of hosts of assessment suits invoking the decisions of these courts on all possible phases of assessment law.

In French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 181 U. S. 321, 344, the United States supreme court in the year 1900 explained the Baker case as follows:

"This array of authority was confronted in the courts below with the decision of this court in the case of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, which was claimed to overrule our previous cases, and to establish the principle that the cost of a local improvement cannot be assessed against abutting property according to frontage unless the law under which the improvement is made, provides for a preliminary hearing as to the benefit to be derived by the property to be assessed.

But we agree with the supreme court of Missouri in its view that such is not the necessary legal import of the decision in Norwood v. Baker. That was a case where by a village ordinance, apparently aimed at a single person, a portion of whose property was condemned for a street, the entire cost of opening the street, including not only the full amount paid for the strip condemned, but the cost and expenses of the condemnation proceedings, was thrown upon the abutting property of the person whose land was condemned. This appeared both in the court below and to a majority of the judges of this court to be an abuse of the law, an act of confiscation and not a valid exercise of the taxing power. This court, however, did not affirm the decree of the trial court awarding a perpetual injunction against the making and collection of any special assessment upon Mrs. Baker's property, but said:

'It should be observed that the decree did not relieve the abutting property from any liability for such amount as could be properly assessed against it. Its legal effect, as we now adjudge, was only to prevent the enforcement of the particular assessment in question. It left the village in its discretion to take such steps as were within its power to take either under existing statutes or under any authority that might thereafter be conferred upon it, to make a new assessment upon the plaintiff's abutting property for so much of the expense of the opening of the street as was found upon due and proper inquiry to be equal to the special benefits accruing to the property. By the decree rendered the court avoided the performance of functions appertaining to an assessing tribunal or body, and left the subject under the control of the local authorities designated by the state'.

In the same year and in the same volume of reports the supreme court of the United States passed upon many assessment cases. Some of them are as follows: White v. Davidson, 181 U. S. 371; Tonawanda v. Lyon, 181 U. S. 389; Webster v. Fargo, 181 U. S. 394; Cass Farming Co. v. Detroit, 181 U. S. 396; Shumate v. Heman, 181 U. S. 402.

In White v. Davidson, supra, the federal supreme court held that no provision of the federal constitution was violated by the making of an assessment by the District of Columbia for the opening and extension of a street, which assessment was made under an act of Congress, providing that of the amount found due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the opening of said streets, not less than one-half thereof should be assessed by the jury in said proceedings against real estate situated and lying on each side of the extension of said streets, and also on the adjacent real estate which would be benefited by the opening of the same.

It is my opinion that the proposed provision is not in any way in contravention of the constitution of the United States and would be sustained by federal courts. Should there not, however, be a limitation upon the amount of the assessment authorized to be made for the appropriation of private property to a public improvement? It may be urged that such a limitation should be left to the legislature and not made the subject of a constitutional provision; but in a practical making of assessments it has been found that legislative enactments limiting assessments to special benefits have been in effect ignored by the action of municipal legislative bodies in placing the entire cost of the appropriation upon the abutting property by the front foot, although the assessing ordinances recite that the assessments have been made by benefits.

As our supreme court now holds that the taking by appropriation of private property for a public use confers a public and not a private benefit, it would seem that the clause in question in effect declares that such taking of private property confers a private benefit. This may be true in view of the fact that the making of the improvement will enhance the value of the abutting property, but there can be no doubt that the public in the long run gets an equal benefit from such improvement.

The public, therefore, should pay fifty per cent of the cost of the appropriation, and I would therefore suggest an amendment covering this point of view. I would also suggest that the assessment for the appropriation of private property should not be confined to the abutting property alone, but may be made upon the property adjacent thereto, or in the immediate neighborhood of the public improvement, giving authority to the municipal authorities to levy such assessments upon the abutting, adjacent and other property in the district affected by the improvement, in such proportion as the municipal authorities may, in their discretion, determine.

Very respectfully,

SIMEON M. JOHNSON.

Mr. WATSON: Will the gentleman yield for a motion to recess?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It will not take me more than ten minutes to finish.

Section 11, on the method of raising funds to pay for public utilities, has created a great deal of discussion. I believe that the method which your committee has suggested will be found most practicable and equitable, and at the same time the greatest possible safeguard to prevent extravagance and debauchery in the construction and leasing or purchasing of public utilities. In my judgment it gives the municipality all the power it ought to have. It gives it no more power than it should have; and at the same time the limitations which your committee have put upon it are to greatest possible safeguards to prevent the squandering of public funds in the reckless building or purchasing of public utilities. Starting with this theory, it would necessarily follow that the general powers of taxation are held firmly under the control of the state. The state has an interest in seeing that the municipalities should not become bankrupt, because the credit of every other municipality might be and probably would be affected by the bankruptcy of any large municipality. So the state says, "You may build, may buy public utilities, but our limitations are at present two and a half per cent of the tax duplicate without a referendum vote, and two and a half per cent additional by a referendum vote." Now, the moment that you have reached the maximum limit of five per cent of the tax duplicate for general bonds unless you can persuade the general assembly to increase the limit, then your credit must be based on the value of the utility which you propose to construct or purchase, and every buyer is cautioned that those special bonds issued against that utility have for security only that utility and by a franchise limited to twenty years only. So it seems to us that it was a most wise provision to make this limitation, and it is all that the municipalities have a right to expect or demand. If the municipality is foolish enough to use up all of its credit by general bonds for the purchase or construction of public utilities, and it has nothing left for the building of new sewers, the building of new streets, or the purchasing of parks, etc., then the municipality must suffer for its indiscretion in not making due allowance for these other necessities that every municipality demands.

Municipal Home Rule.

The objections I heard raised while Mr. Knight was on the floor, did not appeal to me as sound, in either public morals or in sound finance.

Mr. LAMPSON: Will you yield for a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will you wait a few minutes until I get through? Then I shall be glad to answer any questions. My remaining notes are very few, and I want to get my views as chairman of the committee on Municipal Government before the Convention.

Section 12 gives authority to the general assembly to limit the power of any municipality to levy taxes and incur debts, and makes provisions for an examination of the vouchers, books and accounts of all municipal departments and of public undertakings.

You can see the wisdom and the necessity of that. As the law is today the limit of taxation allowed to a municipality is fifteen mills by a referendum vote. You can readily see that the municipality must not be given the power to levy fifteen mills, because in that fifteen mills there must be provisions for a school levy, a county levy and a state levy; as a matter of fact, the same provisions that practically exist now are really incorporated by us, and it will limit the power of the municipality to levy taxes and incur debt, which in my judgment is proper. There is also provision for an examination of vouchers, books and accounts of all municipalities and public undertakings.

Of course your committee was met by the demand of the state auditor that the state should have practically supreme authority, and the demand of the municipal authorities on the other hand for a limitation of this power. I received four or five letters from very able men, even the mayor of my own city, stating we had given the state too much control on this subject, but we did not waver, we did not change what was originally suggested by the League of Ohio Municipalities, because we thought it struck a happy balance. So I call your attention to the fact how reasonably conservative we have been. There has been no attempt to encourage debauchery and riot in public funds. There have been the greatest possible safeguards thrown around all of the matters that are of the gravest concern to the people of the state.

In section 13 elections are to be conducted under the supervision of the election officials as prescribed by law. The state controls with a firm hand the conduct of elections. The whole proposition might be summarized in the very incisive language used, I think by the reporter for the Cleveland Leader, who said that the principal of our municipal proposal could be stated thus: Under the old order of things that govern our municipalities now the general assembly has said "Thou shalt not do anything unless we give you specific authority to do it. Under the present scheme the general assembly says "Thou mayest." That is the sum total and practically the meat of this whole proposal.

Before I surrender the floor I shall offer an amendment in lines 97 and 98 carrying out the suggestion made by my attorney:

Strike out the word "property" in line 97, insert a comma and add the following: "adjacent and other property in the district benefited." In line 98 add: "Said assessments, however, upon all of the abutting, adjacent, and other property in the district benefited, shall in no case be levied for more than fifty per cent of the cost of such appropriation."

The reason for this is based on public morality. I will say that I asked Mayor Baker, when he urged us to incorporate this principle in our proposal, if he did not think it wise and proper and just that in revolutionizing the law in the state of Ohio on this subject of appropriating private property for public use, we ought not to limit the assessment to fifty per cent of the cost of the improvement. My theory was that the municipality has behind it all power. It has its local officials. So the great burden always falls upon the individual owner whose property is appropriated, and he must prove at great expense to himself that the benefit as stated by the municipal authorities is less than they claim. And it seems to me that, as the state of Ohio says now—remember that the present law is that the sum total of all assessments of whatsoever kind for streets and sewers in the period of five years shall not exceed thirty-three and a third per cent of the value of the property—it seems to me that when we say in the constitution that a municipality may appropriate the private individual's property for public use, and we limit the assessments that may be made for the improvement to not exceeding fifty per cent of the cost of the improvement we are very just and very fair. Before I surrender the floor I would like to answer the gentleman from Asthabula [Mr. LAMPSON].

Mr. LAMPSON: Did you not think it would be quite as wise to require the municipality to provide a sinking fund to take care of the utility bonds for which the municipality is not responsible, as it is to require the state to provide a sinking fund to take care of the road bonds for which the state is responsible?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not think there is the slightest analogy between the two cases, and I will show you why I do not think so. Roads are a subject of expense, always a subject of expense for repairing and maintaining them.

Municipal Home Rule.

The new roads constructed this year at a cost of $10,000,000 require next year possibly an outlay of $100,000, or a quarter of a million of dollars to keep them in order.

A public utility is an income-bearing asset, and so recognized today by the laws of the state of Ohio to such an extent that they specifically exempt the bonds of an income-bearing utility from the limit of indebtedness. Why should a sinking fund be established by a municipality, thereby enhancing the cost of the service or the product to the people, on the theory of the sinking fund, that it is to take care of the bonds, and therefore pay all the debts of cost of construction of that municipal utility—why should the people living in Cincinnati, say between the years 1912 and 1932, pay for the entire cost of construction, and turn over to the people who live in 1932 an asset which brings to the municipality an annual income? Where is the justice in it?

Mr. LAMPSON: May not such a public utility become a burden instead of a profit-earning asset?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It may, but the bankers who buy the bonds will determine whether the proposition in their judgment is a safe one. They are doing that right along.

Mr. LAMPSON: Right there, one more question: Do you think that the federal government or any state government would accept that class of bonds as security for its funds deposited in bank?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The federal government, under the Vreeland act, is willing to accept bonds of any railroad company with anything like a history. Why, under the Vreeland act, the federal government will accept in an emergency the oddest kind of bonds as security for public funds.

Mr. LAMPSON: You would not think that was a good acceptance?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I would not, and that is the reason I am very much opposed to the Vreeland act.

Mr. DOTY: I desire to offer an amendment upon the same point. The reason I would like to have it offered tonight is to have it go along with the one that is pending.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the amendment and insert:

In line 96, strike out "the abutting", and insert "benefited".

In line 97 strike out "abutting".

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I call attention to the fact that I have not surrendered the floor. I am holding it only in the event any person wishes to ask a question. If anybody desires to ask a question I am willing to answer.

Mr. WATSON: Does the gentleman yield the floor for a motion to recess?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON: I move that we recess until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. DOTY: Let us get these amendments in shape so that they can be printed during adjournment.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM [Mr. STOKES]: Does the gentleman from Guernsey yield?

Mr. WATSON: Yes; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I offer the following amendment [the amendment heretofore offered by Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, which had been reduced to writing]:

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the word "property" in line 97, and insert a comma and insert the following:

"adjacent and other property in the district benefited."

In line 98 add: "Said assessments, however, upon all the abutting, adjacent, and other property in the district benefited, shall in no case be levied for more than fifty per cent of the cost of such appropriation."

Mr. DOTY: I offer the amendment which I just sent up.

The amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] was again read, as heretofore.

Mr. ANDERSON: So that we can get it in, I offer an amendment now.

The amendment was read as follows:

In lines 18, 21 and in lines 49 and 50 strike out the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole."

At the end of line 22 change the period to a semi-colon and insert the following: "provided, however, that this article shall not be construed to confer any power upon municipalities to regulate, or prohibit, the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

Mr. WATSON: Now I insist on the motion to recess.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM [Mr. STOKES]: The delegate from Clermont is recognized.

Mr. DUNN: I would like to bid you a very kind farewell in the matter of proposals. I have one I would like to offer.

Mr. DOTY: There is a matter pending, but I will move that further consideration of Proposal No. 272 be postponed, and that it be placed at the head of the calendar, so that the gentleman from Clermont [Mr. Dunn] can introduce his proposal.

By unanimous consent the following proposals were introduced and read the first time.

Proposal No. 338—Mr. Dunn. To submit an amendment to article I, section 5, of the constitution.—Relative to trial by jury.

Proposal No. 339—Mr. Dunn. To submit an amendment to article I, of the constitution.—Relative to the silence of the defendant in murder in the first degree.

Leave of absence for Monday and Tuesday was granted to Mr. Norris.

On motion of Mr. Watson the Convention adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

SIXTY-FIFTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

TUESDAY, April 30, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. A. J. Wagner, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. COLTON: I introduce a resolution.

The PRESIDENT: By unanimous consent the resolution may be introduced.

Mr. COLTON: I introduce this resolution because Judge Worthington, who is a member of this committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, is ill at his home and will probably be unable to serve, and we would like some one in his place.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 112:

Resolved, That the president is hereby authorized to appoint one additional member of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. COLTON: I move a suspension of the rules, and that the resolution be placed on its passage at once.

Mr. PECK: I saw Judge Worthington's law partner yesterday, and he said that the judge was quite ill.

By unanimous consent the rules were suspended and the resolution was considered at once.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. PECK: I move that the debate on the pending proposal be limited to fifteen minutes to each person on the main question, and five minutes to each speaker on each amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: Last Thursday Proposal No. 25 was up for consideration and the minority report was disagreed to. The roll call disclosed the fact that I voted with the prevailing side, and in view of the fact that at that time thirty-five or forty members were absent, and that there was a spirit of inattention abroad in the Convention, I do not believe the subject had a fair consideration, and I therefore move its reconsideration. It was Mr. Bowdle's divorce proposal.

Mr. DOTY: The member making the motion at this time saves the situation so far as the proposal is concerned, and as we now have a program that we are trying to work to I therefore move that further consideration of the proposal be postponed until tomorrow and that it be placed on the calendar.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The president will announce the appointment of the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] as the new member on the committee on Phraseology. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the member from Mahoning to Proposal No. 272.

Mr. DOTY: And on that I demand a division when it comes to a vote.

Mr. LAMPSON: I would like to have the secretary read that amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ANDERSON: Gentlemen: If you will examine

Proposal No. 272 you will find that municipalities have a right to make all laws of all kinds except and save only when the legislature in express terms prohibits the municipality from making such laws.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Does not the member know that under this no municipality can fall short of what the statute requires, but that it only has power to go beyond the statute, that only when it is additional restriction is the ordinance legal?

Mr. ANDERSON: All I know is that the section reads as follows:

Section 3. Municipalities shall have power to enact and enforce within their limits such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as the welfare of the state as a whole; and no such regulations shall by reason of requirements therein, in addition to those fixed by law, be deemed in conflict therewith unless the general assembly, by general law, affecting the welfare of the state as a whole, shall specifically deny all municipalities the right to act thereon.

In other words, if this proposal becomes a part of the constitution, the present order in things pertaining to the police power of the state which the municipality can not now exercise, except by authority of the general assembly, will be reversed, and the municipality will have the superior and supreme right to act in all things pertaining to the police power unless it is specially taken away from it, or unless the legislature in express terms has prohibited all municipalities from acting on that particular thing. There is no doubt at all that the question of the regulation of the liquor traffic comes within the so-called police power. Therefore, if this becomes the organic law of the state of Ohio and the legislature fails to prohibit the municipalities from acting in that particular, then the municipalities can make laws affecting that subject as such municipal authorities or lawmaking bodies see fit.

Mr. KING: Would they have the right to repeal the state law on the same subject having general operation throughout the state affecting all municipalities?

Mr. ANDERSON: In reference to the police power, I am very much of the opinion, and I am not alone of that opinion, for I have not been responsible for it, but it is the opinion of some of the best legal minds in the state that have passed upon this question, that in reference to the police power the municipality would have full right to act, unless inhibited by the general assembly, and that inhibition would have to be clear and certain, because these advocates of home rule for cities want that very thing. The thing they most complain of is that the city as such has no right to make any laws or exercise any power unless the legislature clearly gives them that right. They want clearly to reverse the proposal, and they want the right to make all laws and to do all things that the municipality wants to do under the police regulations, save only as the legislature has prohibited. Now, say that Proposal No. 151 is ratified and this policy is ratified, then what is the situation? Each municipality can regulate the liquor traffic as the officers of the lawmaking body of that municipality may see fit, and they can continue to do so until the legislature in clear and express terms prohibits the municipality from acting. Therefore, what would we have? We would have Proposal No. 151 null and void in reference to every municipality in the state of Ohio unless the legislature sees fit to put it in power and in working order with reference to that municipality by saying to each municipality that in all things with reference to intoxicating beverages the state reserves the right to act.

Municipal Home Rule.

The PRESIDENT: The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOODS: I move that his time be extended.

Mr. DOTY: That is the beginning of the end.

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not care for any more time. I would suggest that one section of the initiative and referendum proposal should be read in connection with section 3 of Proposal No. 272. Please do that, and it will give you food for thought. Section 1f should be read with Proposal No. 272.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: If the Anderson amendment which strikes at the essence of home rule shall prevail and no substitute is provided the municipalities in Ohio will have no measure of home rule. The committee put in those words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" for this reason: If any police, sanitary or other regulation passed by a city may be limited by state law, we are no further along the road to home rule than today. If any act of the city can be rendered null and void by a law of the state, where are we? Only where we are today.

Mr. ANDERSON: What in your opinion would be the effect, provided this were the law, and Proposal No. 151 also the law, and the legislature failed to inhibit the municipalities from making laws in reference to the liquor traffic? Would it nullify Proposal No. 151?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: It would have no effect whatever. The only effect of the clause you refer to, that the state is required to specifically deny the municipalities the right to act, only applies, in lines 19 and 20, to those provisions which the city council may pass in addition to those passed by the general law. Take the automobile city ordinance. The state may have a general law which provides that automobiles cannot go faster than six miles an hour. Suppose the city comes along and provides by ordinance that they cannot go faster than four miles an hour. Under this proposal the city has the right to so legislate. They increase the limitation on automobile speed which the state has provided, and so, unless the legislature says by general law specifically that no city in the state has a right to do this, the city ordinance controls.

Now take the Anderson liquor proposal. The state may pass a law that there shall be but two saloons on one block. Suppose the city says that there can be but one saloon on one block. The state cannot interfere with that limitation unless the state says specifically or denies specifically all municipalities the right to act on the question. We want in Ohio to be as far along the road of home rule as California, and unless we have these or other qualifying words we are nowhere. For example, the city cannot by city ordinance establish a police force or a fire department, cannot regulate the width or grade of a street and cannot say where the trees shall be planted, if you take those words out, because the state by general law can say cities shall have their streets just so wide, and cities shall have the tree-boxes so far from the sidewalk, and nothing whatever that the city can do is safe from interference by the state unless you put in the words that the municipality shall not be interfered with by general laws unless those general laws are on a matter affecting the welfare of the state as a whole.

Take the great health regulations—the flow and pollution of streams, for instance, and the height of the buildings and the number of cubic feet of air space in tenement houses. I say the state should not have any right to interfere with those matters peculiar to certain localities. The cities ought to have a chance to work out their own problems in their own way if it does not interfere with the general welfare of the state.

Why are we behind the great European cities in the matter of municipal government? Is it because democracy has fallen down in our cities? No, it is because the city is not a democracy; because we have never had democracy in American cities. We have never had representative government in our cities in Ohio. We have not been free from outside domination. Take Cleveland or Springfield or Cincinnati. They want something that they think will be a reform in their local government, and the municipal bosses of Cincinnati and Cleveland, and the smaller bosses in the state, come here to the legislature and so change the reform measure that it is really no reform. We in Ohio cities are not allowed to make progress; we are not allowed to solve our own problems; we are hampered by the state legislature. I tell you the state of Ohio and all the other states have treated their cities much as Great Britain treated the colonies before the revolution. We want and need some measure of home rule. I am afraid this won't do much. I am afraid the courts may say to cities you can't legislate on this or that matter because this is a matter that concerns the welfare of the state as a whole. It is hard to think of something that does not concern the welfare of the state as a whole, but your committee felt that those words ought to go in to be a notice or warning to the court, so that when they come to interpret it they will say, "We think the Convention meant that the city should have some freedom." I hope, therefore, you will give us this much home rule. I want the members of this Convention to see justice done to the cities. The farmer is just as much interested in good city government in the cities as the citizens of cities themselves are. The good of the cities is the good of the whole state. I know the bugaboo of Wet vs. Dry is raised. In the committee there was a proposition made to insert after "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" the words "in application, in effect, and in execution," but the committee thought that would be going too far, and that it would raise a great wet and dry fight on this floor. I do not know what the courts will say, but I want to give the courts a chance to say that the cities have some right to control themselves.

Mr. ANDERSON: These words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" were not in the original draft of the home rule proposal?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I am glad you asked that question. They were in the Worthington proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON: I mean in the Cleveland draft?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Yes; a similar qualification was in Mr. FitzSimons' draft. The legislature was free to interfere with cities in all matters "except in municipal affairs," and we objected to the words "municipal affairs," because the state of California has had such endless litigation relating to a definition of words similar to these.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not a fact that the so-called wet lobby—the gentlemen here representing the wet side—have been insistent on getting that term in?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: What words?

Mr. ANDERSON: "Affecting the welfare of the state as a whole."

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I believe the liquor lobby would like to have the words remain, and every patriotic citizen interested in the welfare of our cities would like to have the words or some other limitation in the proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON: Why do they want them in?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I assume you refer to the wets again. They may feel they are getting a little more than if the words are not in. I am not going to stand here and say that the courts of the state might not say that with those words in that the city might have a little more freedom, and might say that the city could pass a Sunday baseball ordinance for example. I am not going to say that I know that the courts could not say that cities would have a right to allow outdoor amusements on Sunday with these words in. But what I am afraid of is that without these or similar words in that all local laws, such as Sunday baseball, the regulation of traffic in the streets, the way the streets are built and even the question of determining the different departments that the city may have—I am afraid that the courts may hold that these are all matters that affect the welfare of the state as a whole. But nevertheless, let us try to make some headway in home rule for cities. Let us put the cities of Ohio on a plane with the cities of Europe. Let us place the cities in a position where they may work out their own problems in their own way, where they may reach the goal that they want to reach. Let us put the cities in a position where they are self-governing communities, where they may solve the great and intricate problems of local government for themselves. Let us give them a chance to so manage affairs as to give a square deal to every man, rich and poor; let us make it possible for them to regulate big business and little business, so that every man shall have all those rights and only those rights, shall have all those privileges and only those privileges which in the clear light of truth and justice he ought to have.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: If my colleague will permit me, I would like to answer the question of the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] as to whether the liquor lobby is speaking for these words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." If they are, the liquor lobby has not advised any member of the committee of the fact. No member had the slightest intimation of it, and we would never believe that the liquor lobby has had anything to do with the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." What we did believe was that the liquor interests were very much interested in those four words in the letter from the attorney in Cincinnati of high character to wit, "in their application, operation, effect and execution." We have thought that there was something concealed in those words, and therefore we refused to let them come before this Convention. I make this statement as the best practical evidence of the good faith of the committee.

In reference to section 3, I shall now take the liberty of reading to you from the brief prepared by Professor Hatton and John H. Clarke, both of Cleveland, the latter an attorney whose name needs but to be mentioned to the attorneys in this Convention or elsewhere in the state—to be recognized as a man of great ability and integrity, and we are further informed in the letter from the Municipal League that a half dozen others of the best attorneys in Cleveland and Toledo carefully considered these various sections.

In original section 3 the words "affecting the general welfare of the state," were omitted and they were inserted because in the judgment of Mr. Smith, of the committee, they give us real home rule. The committee feared that a great many statutes might be passed by the legislature under the guise or name of general laws which would bind the municipalities as they have been bound in the past and are bound now.

I read to you from the brief sent down to our committee, with respect to section 3:

Attention has already been called to the fact that the police power is not considered a local function and that there are many other powers, not strictly local in character, which municipalities should be permitted to exercise subject to control by the state. Many such powers are granted to municipalities, by enumeration, in the ordinary statutory municipal code. The intention of the above proposed section is to confer upon municipalities the right to exercise all such powers except where municipal action would come in conflict with state laws, or had been specifically forbidden by general laws.

Mr. ANDERSON: Was not that the point I made, that the municipality had a right to exercise to the full all of those things carrying out the police power unless prohibited by the laws of the state, or unless they came in conflict with the state, but under the wording of section 3 cannot come into conflict with the state laws unless they clearly inhibit?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I think you are correct. Let us see if we cannot agree on the general statement that all local police power not particularly denied by the state is clearly within the province of the municipality.

Mr. ANDERSON: But notice, under Proposal No. 272 each municipality has all of the police power that any political subdivision or the state as a unit can exercise. Therefore, the police power of the state becomes local by reason of Proposal No. 272, and therefore, according to your wording, unless the general assembly prohibits each municipality from using the police powers, the city has the natural right to use them.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Is it not true that a brief was sent down with the original draft and the limitations were less than in the draft we adopted?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Unquestionably. But even taking Mr. Anderson's statement, and there is practically no disagreement between us on that, and assuming that Mr. Anderson's statement is correct, and his interpretation is correct, the moment that the municipality exercises any power which the general assembly thinks beyond the province of the municipality, the general assembly would enact a general law forbidding the municipality from exercising that particular power.

Mr. ANDERSON: Assuming that Proposal No. 151 is the law, if this is passed would not Proposal No. 151 be nullified all over the state of Ohio so far as municipalities are concerned, unless the legislature would act and say to the municipalities, "You shall not exercise police power with reference to selling intoxicating liquors within your borders?"

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As a layman my legal logic is probably very bad—

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; it is not—it is better than that of most of the lawyers.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: My contention is this: You assume that Proposal No. 151 is adopted by the people, and it then becomes a constitutional provision. Now how in the world can a municipality do something contrary to that constitutional provision, assuming there is a conflict between the two powers, the powers granted in Proposal No. 151 and the powers granted in Proposal No. 272?

Mr. ANDERSON: There will be no conflict for the reason that unless the legislature speaks Proposal No. 151 remains inactive. After the legislature speaks and puts it into life, by designating the power that grants the license, then that part becomes a law of the state, and unless in that law they inhibit municipalities from exercising police powers under Proposal No. 272 each municipality in the state of Ohio will have a right to do as it pleases with reference to the liquor traffic, and it puts up to the next legislature a fight between the Anti Saloon League on one side and the foreign brewer on the other to determine whether the legislature will write that inhibition in or not—

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is too hard a nut for me as a layman to crack.

Mr. ANDERSON: And we simply transfer from this Constitutional Convention to the general assembly the right to say whether Proposal No. 151 amounts to the paper that it is written on.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: According to this draft of Mr. Clarke and of Professor Hatton, I should not think so, but I make that statement with all due deference and humility, for I appreciate the fact that the fine questions of law do not penetrate the layman's mind. Here is what they further say in that brief:

The intention of the above proposed section is to confer upon municipalities the right to exercise all such powers except where municipal action would come in conflict with state laws, or had been specifically forbidden by general laws. The language used is substantially that of the California constitution (art XI, sec. 11), with the addition of a provision giving a constitutional status of the interpretation placed upon the California grant by the courts of that state. Should this action be written into the constitution of Ohio any municipality in the state could make all necessary police and other regulations without the power to do so having been conferred by statute. As to these powers, it would reverse the presumption which now lies against the municipality in any case where a specific grant of a particular power is not found in the municipal code. It would introduce the principle which has so long been applied on the continent of Europe, that cities are granted full power of action in all cases not denied.

Mr. ANDERSON: Of course you know that the cities of Europe have absolute control over their municipal affairs?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I think the cities of the United States ought to have the same power.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is not that true of the cities of Europe?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: According to those gentlemen, you would have the same conditions here as in Europe. I agree that this is a very good brief.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton [continuing the reading]:

This grant of power to cities would not preclude state action on the same subjects. Indeed, statutes would supersede municipal regulations when in conflict therewith. Conflict could not be held to exist, however, if the municipal regulation merely went beyond that required by the state unless the state had denied to municipalities the right to act on the particular subject involved.

That covers the point made by Mr. Smith, of Hamilton, that the state might pass a law saying that no buildings should be more than one hundred feet high, and the city might come along and say, "We don't want any building one hundred feet high; we won't allow the buildings to be any higher than sixty feet," and if this particular inhibition is less than the inhibition by the state, then under this proposed section it would be legal for the municipalities to so regulate this and kindred matters.

Mr. LAMPSON: As a matter of fact if it is not intended at all by section 3 to give municipalities the power to nullify the local option laws, what possible objection can there be to that part of Mr. Anderson's proposed amendment, which limits the exercise of that power?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I would consider it criminal to introduce into this home rule proposition any word or words relating to the liquor traffic.

Mr. LAMPSON: But that would not affect the home rule proposition at all upon any subject other than the liquor subject.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Whether it affects the home rule proposition or not, I would still consider it criminal, because in my judgment there is not a word in the present home rule proposition which has any bearing whatsoever on the liquor question.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. LAMPSON: But that is the bone of contention.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I know the bone of contention is on those words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole," and you must always bear in mind that while I am pretty positive in some of my opinions I have the knowledge that I am only giving an opinion of a layman, but lawyers on the other side, who are dry as summer's dust, do not hesitate to say to me that in their judgment the phrase would not have the effect charged by the dries. Of course, I recognize the right of the Convention to strike those words from the proposal and so end the whole controversy, but I do not think it is wise for the Convention to do so. But what I am trying to keep out of this discussion is the bitterness that the mere raising of the ghost of the liquor question seems unconsciously and unintentionally to invite.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you not think that words should be used which would dispose of the ghost at once and remove all objection?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The point I am making is that the words "affecting the general welfare of the state," are words which can be used and are used properly to dispose of that ghost. If we can possibly do it, I appeal to the Convention to leave out all reference to the liquor fight. Do not let the wide divergence on the liquor question appear in this proposal, so that this can go out from this Convention, signed by delegates representing fifty-three municipalities and representing two million people, as a proposal not from the Municipal Government committee especially, but from all the people who have sent us here, as well as representing the mature judgment and wisdom of the entire Convention on this proposal.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose you leave the words in there, and still adopt something like the Anderson proviso, which makes it perfectly clear that it is not intended and does not in fact grant the power to municipalities to nullify local option or other temperance laws of the state. Would not that greatly strengthen your home rule proposal and get you almost unanimous support?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not think so. I object strenuously to the liquor fight, either in favor of the wets or the dries, being brought in here and incorporated in our proposal. For three months your committee refused to let the fight creep in. There were two proposals covering everything that we thought was proper to be covered in the municipal scheme. There were dozens of proposals which had merit, but we finally considered two, one from Cleveland and one from Cincinnati. The mayor of Cleveland asked me to introduce their proposal. Cincinnati thought that I should bear the authorship of theirs. I refused to do either, because I did not want to lend the influence of my official character as chairman to either proposal, but as chairman of the committee I did use my influence to have the committee consider only the Cleveland proposal, and swept aside the natural pride of citizenship of having Cincinnati given the credit for the proposal on municipal home rule, a proposal which I think your children's children will glory in and refer to the fact with pride that one of their parents or grandparents took part in the Convention which gave home rule to the cities and villages of the state of Ohio. I surrendered that personal pride because I knew that one of the gentleman very active in municipal affairs happened to be closely identified with the liquor interests and an attorney for the liquor interests, and fearful that this fact might have some weight in the Convention and that the impression would be that perhaps the liquor interests were gaining some foothold deftly, I refused to consider the Cincinnati proposal and urged the committee to build on the Cleveland proposal.

Mr. LAMPSON: Does the gentleman not believe as much in state rights as he does in home rule?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I am a democrat, and I believe a great deal in state rights. I believe in it so much that throughout this proposal we have made the state all powerful in things concerning the state, and the municipality all powerful in things concerning the city and village.

Mr. LAMPSON: Would not the gentleman be willing to make it so certain that the right of the city to home rule does not nullify the right of the state over this matter that we can all see it?

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order. The member from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] has spoken twenty minutes. I want to know this for the benefit of future guidance—

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As chairman of the committee I was under the impression that the limit did not apply to me.

Mr. WINN: I asked the president for information.

The PRESIDENT: The president was afraid if he enforced the rule it would be repealed.

Mr. KERR: I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The motion was seconded.

Mr. DOTY: How long?

Mr. KERR: Fifteen minutes.

Mr. DOTY: I think the member's time should be extended, because he has been laboring under the disadvantage of having many questions put to him.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I move to amend by giving ten minutes.

Mr. KERR: I accept that.

A vote being taken the time of the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] was extended ten minutes.

Mr. ELSON: You acknowledge that you do not wish a liquor ghost to be raised on this question, and you also acknowledge that there is no intention on the part of the committee to nullify Proposal No. 151 by this proposal. Is that true?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It is.

Mr. ELSON: Then why should we not prevent all possibility of raising the liquor ghost by inserting at the end of the paragraph these words that the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] has put in? Let me ask this question: In what possible way could it be criminal to put in such words?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: First, the municipal home rule proposal cannot be carried in this state except by the vote of the large cities. Second, by the insertion of any words in this proposal referring to the liquor question, even though there be no merit in their contention, the wets throughout the state, dominant in the large cities, will destroy this proposal, and I do not propose to be placed in any such position.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then it is your idea that by making no change the wets over the state will believe that Proposal No. 151 is nullified and will vote for this?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is a presumption on your part which I specifically and emphatically deny.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not know that Professor Knight said that he did not believe the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" added anything to this proposal?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I have a great deal of respect for Professor Knight's construction of law, but Professor Knight took care to say that he was speaking for himself alone.

Mr. ANDERSON: Did you not say that the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" were put in at the last moment, and it was not in the original draft from Cleveland, and that you didn't care much about it?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is partly accurate. Of course, during the discussion of that question, in section 7 the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" were passed upon. It was discussed by Judge Worthington, Professor Knight and Judge Rockel. I remember the discussion back and forth, and the effect of those words was weighed in an apothecary's scale by Professor Knight, who is here to answer whether I have stated the fact correctly. In section 3 the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" were, as you correctly state, put in at the last meeting, because we were afraid to take the phrasing from the original Cleveland proposal, but Mr. Smith, of Hamilton, insisted as the words were agreed on in section 7, they could and ought properly to go into the other section in question.

Mr. ANDERSON: Did not some of the members refuse to sign it unless that was put in?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: No, sir; one of the members refused to sign, but there was no objection to those words. I want the Convention to bear in mind that the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" were weighed by Professor Knight and Judge Worthington as carefully as gold dust is weighed. The words that we refused to insert, because we did not grasp the full meaning of them, were "in their application, operation, execution and effect," which were to follow "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole," and one of the members refused to sign because we would not put in those four words.

Mr. DOTY: If those words had been weighed in the apothecary's scales word for word by experts like Professor Knight and Judge Rockel and Judge Worthington, why is it that their meaning cannot be explained in such simple terms that even an obtuse person, such as I am, can understand it? I understand that I am pretty dumb, but you might at least try to tell me what they mean.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The committee are responsible only for furnishing you the words. They are not expected to furnish you with the brains to understand them. I would like to finish. My time is brief—

Mr. DOTY: I would like to have you answer one further question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I have not the time. I want to finish this [continuing reading from the brief]:

This is a valuable agreement, especially in matters of police regulation. In legislation of this character it is the duty of the general assembly to enact laws, general in form, which will apply to all parts and sections of the state. In doing so it can do little more than set a standard below which no locality must fall. To enact a general police code which would provide the requisite regulation and protection for communities widely different in character and population is an obvious impossibility. The true solution of this difficult problem is found in the section proposed above. Under such a provision the municipalities of the state, building upon the foundation laid by the general assembly, could provide themselves with a system of police and other regulations which would fit their peculiar needs. (See in re Hoffman, 105 Cal. 114; Cuzner v. California Club, 155 Cal. 303; Mayor v. Craig, 109 Pac. 842.)

It should be noted that this section grants these powers to all municipalities, and not merely to those framing and adopting their own charters.

Mr. REDINGTON: I am not in favor of the amendments because I do not believe they are necessary. If Proposal No. 151 should pass and be adopted it would become part of the constitution of the state of Ohio, and wherever territory is wet it is expressly stated that no license shall be issued except under certain conditions and the business is regulated absolutely by the organic law of the state, and where territory is dry we have in Proposal No. 151 expressly reserved the regulatory statutes to the state, and they are a part of the organic laws of the state and so recognized. Now, if Proposal No. 151 should be adopted I cannot see the object of this Convention in asking for the amendment, for where the territory is wet, where they have saloons, the constitutional provision will control, co-ordinate and equal to this constitutional provision, and it takes the business specifically out of the police regulation of the state and makes it a part of the constitution.

While it is now a police regulation, we put it in the constitution, and no legislature can add to it, and if Proposal No. 151 should not pass and this provision (Proposal No. 272) should pass we have been very careful to make the police power of the cities at all times subservient to the state laws. If the state makes a general law, and the state has a right to so far as police and sanitary regulations are concerned, and makes the regulation more stringent, in that particular city the stringent state law will be the law of the city. If the state passes a general law more stringent than the city ordinance, then the city ordinance is nullified and the state law takes effect. While you are in this proposal giving to the city full police and sanitary powers, at any time they may be stripped of some of these powers by the state, the supreme authority. The city has to go at all times to the state for power. In case the state neglects to pass proper police and sanitary regulations, the city may do so, and if the state then passes laws beyond and more strict than the city laws, the city laws are nullified.

I think it is unnecessary to adopt these amendments

Municipal Home Rule.

because if Proposal No. 151 passes and the regulation of saloons, being a police regulation, is put into the constitution, so that no city and no legislature can change it, it must follow that such regulation will be upheld to be the mandate of the constitution, as provided therein for wet and dry territory. The constitutional provision in Proposal No. 151 expressly reserves all the regulatory laws of the state and says other similar laws may be passed. In case Proposal No. 151 should fail to become a law and Proposal No. 272 should pass and become a part of the constitution, we have provided for this in Proposal No. 272, expressly in section 3 and elsewhere—we have taken great precaution, where we are going to give the city rights to pass the police and regulatory measures, that the state can control and pass laws beyond those of the city, and the object of putting that in was that, as was stated, oftentimes laws are passed pretending to be general laws, but they are not so, and therefore it was insisted that the city should not be controlled by a general law unless it was a law that affected the state as a whole.

The only idea I have in arguing the matter is that the amendment is unnecessary, and that it simply calls attention to this part of the liquor proposal by putting in the liquor clause, and if Proposal No. 151 is passed it cannot add to or take from the other, and we do not want the liquor proposal mixed up with the municipal proposal. We do not want any fight in the city on this matter with regard to wet and dry questions. We believe the city should have home rule, and if we can give it home rule without entering into the liquor fight we would like to do it. I do not believe putting the amendment in would weaken or strengthen it one iota, because I think the whole proposition is plain and fair, so that if Proposal No. 151 should fail the cities are still subject to the sovereign powers of the state. Nobody is undertaking to do what he has no right to do—to take that power from the state—and no matter what police or sanitary measure is passed for cities they would be subject to the state. The city cannot be over or bigger than the state. The city can make stronger and more stringent laws than the state, if the state neglects so to do, but when the state goes beyond anything that the city has done the state laws take effect. I think the amendment should fail.

Mr. WINN: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: If this proposal meant just what the member from Lorain has stated it means no one would have any objection to it. But it is because some can not see it that way that there is more or less confusion. There is such uncertainty about it that the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DORV], who generally is able to see through ordinary propositions, is unable to understand this one; and I may say in this connection to the member from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] that it is not a sufficient answer for him to say to the member from Cuyahoga that the committee put the words in the proposal but is not responsible for the lack of brains to understand them. That is not a good answer to the citizenship of Ohio. If this proposition goes to the electors of the state what will be the attitude of the member from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] or of the committee if the electors ask us what is meant by this? Will the answer be, "We put the words there but we are not responsible for the lack of brains in the electorate to understand them?" Now, Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, is not the only one who would regard it as criminal to see these words taken out. I can tell you of others who would look upon an act of that sort as being a crime. They are the men who constitute the liquor lobby, who crowded the halls of the Convention the first day we came together; who, after the passage of the liquor proposal went to their homes, and who came back here yesterday, and who were here last night and are here this morning. I have seen them with their arms around the necks of members of this Convention yesterday and last night and this morning, until the Convention was called to order. They are here to assert that they believe it would be criminal if we would take these words out. There is no use in attempting to conceal the fact that those words were put in the proposal at the behest of the liquor interests of the state.

Mr. REDINGTON: I deny that.

Mr. WINN: I weigh every word I say and I say them knowing when I say them that they are true. I say these words are in this proposal at the behest of the liquor interests of the state. I am not here to say that the liquor interests of the state came to the committee and requested any member to put those words there. That probably is not a fact, but I say that those words are here for the very purpose of nullifying so far as possible the effect of Proposal No. 151. Let me show you how it can be done. Proposal No. 151 provides, among other things, that upon the conviction for violations of any liquor law of the state the licensee shall forfeit his license and not again be eligible to secure a license. One of the laws of Ohio is that saloons can not be opened on Sunday. Pass this proposal and every city can throw its saloon doors open on Sunday. Now can you see why the liquor lobby wants this?

Mr. CROSSER: Do you contend that in spite of the fact that provisions of Proposal No. 151 say that the existing laws shall remain in full force and effect?

Mr. WINN: Proposal No. 151 does not provide that. Do you undertake to say that if this is placed in the constitution the legislature could not repeal the Rose law?

Mr. CROSSER: No; if they want to repeal the Rose law they can do it, but that is not our fault.

Mr. WINN: I can point it out in a moment so that anybody can understand it. I will read the amendment:

And no such regulation shall by reason of the requirements therein in addition to those fixed by law be deemed in conflict therewith unless the general assembly by general laws specifically deny the municipalities the right to act thereon.

So that unless the general assembly by specific law shall deny the right to municipalities to say that the saloons may be opened on Sunday they might do it, and when they have done it they have nullified that part of the liquor proposal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Don't you know that that requirement or statement "specifically deny" applies only to those municipal requirements put in in addition to those fixed by the general law, so it would only apply in case the city said saloons should not open Saturday as well as Sunday, and then the only way for them to become operative would be to deny the municipi-pality specifically the right? Don't you know that is only where the city makes an additional requirement?

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. WINN: There are others besides the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] who have not brains enough to understand it in that way. Must we have this committee going around over the state with this proposition, and carrying brains with it to make the electors understand it? I say that unless the general assembly by specific enactment shall say to the municipalities of the state "You shall not carry in your charter any provision respecting Sunday closing of saloons, or any other similar question," it may be carried into their charters and become a part of the municipal law.

Mr. REDINGTON: Do you overlook line 18?

Mr. WINN: No, sir; I have not overlooked line 18.

Mr. REDINGTON: I would like to put a question for my own information: "Municipalities shall have the power to enact and enforce within their limits, such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as are not in conflict with general laws affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." Would you call Sunday closing laws passed by the general assembly general laws?

Mr. WINN: Yes, I would, but down in the latter part of the proposal it is especially provided that those things shall not be deemed in conflict with general laws unless the legislature specifically says so. Now this does not apply only to liquor traffic, but to everything else. We have in Ohio a department of workshops and factories. There is an officer of the state who looks over the public buildings and all sorts of buildings to ascertain whether they are in sanitary condition and whether the fire escapes are put up properly, etc. There has been enacted a state law regarding certain other safety devices, as you know, and you probably know how much trouble has been encountered by officers of that department, who have gone over the state requiring owners of buildings to put fire escapes on buildings.

Now it is proposed that by the charter of any municipality that it may control those matters, as well as sanitary matters, unless the general assembly by some specific law shall say that the municipality may not enact an ordinance regulating such matters. Then the municipality may go ahead and have full control of it.

I am not ready to agree with the member from Hamilton [Mr. SMITH] that the whole world is pointing a finger of scorn at the state of Ohio. Indeed, while it has never been my privilege to visit the cities of the old world, I have heard of them, and read the histories of some of those cities, and I am here to say that I never want to live to see the day when the affairs of the cities of this state shall sink to the level of the cities of the old world if the things exist there that have been recorded in history. The strongest argument I can offer against this proposition is that those who favor it so earnestly were against Proposal No. 151.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, no.

Mr. WINN: I mean those who have spoken. In other words, Mr. Harris, of Cincinnati, says he would regard it as criminal to take these words out and put the amendment in, because it would inject into the proposal the disagreeable liquor question and we should not do it. But it is here, it is in the proposal, and now you ask every man opposed to it to stultify his conscience by keeping his mouth shut for fear there may be some debate injected into it. I can not support this measure unless it is amended so it may be made reasonably certain that all of the efforts of the friends of Proposal No. 151 have not been defeated by its enactment. I can not support it here or at the polls. I would feel like thousands and hundreds of thousands of others, obliged to go out, on the stump and elsewhere, and combat it. If the friends of this measure—and I am a friend of home rule for cities—would have something submitted to the people which would meet the approval of the people at the ballot box, let the proposal be amended so every one will know it does not contain these dangerous sleepers it is now suspected of having.

Mr. HURSH: Gentlemen: I have the greatest respect in the world for the learning of our professional brethren—and that includes the legal fraternity—but I want to say as one who comes from the rural districts that we have our problems to solve as well as the cities have theirs, and when I find the gentlemen learned in the legal profession can agree on any proposition, when I find that they write a proposal and pass it and say it is good, when they say it will carry and can not be defeated and is good constitutional and organic law and very popular, I conclude that probably they have as lawyers gotten somewhere, but here is Proposal No. 151 with specific provisions stating what shall and shall not be and what can and can not be done.

Why, until yesterday, nobody doubted that that was good organic law. It deals specifically with the saloon problem. I thought all liquor questions would be solved by that because in explicit words it tells how to regulate the saloon, and here this home rule proposition for cities comes up and it tries to say what powers the cities can have. It says absolutely nothing about the liquor traffic, and then certain gentlemen here have injected this liquor proposition into this discussion. I for one resent it, and I believe there are many others who resent it. We are not all lawyers, so I am going to talk to you a little while and appeal to my brother farmers and other laboring men. Let us consider this question. We of the country have our problems and you of the city can not understand them as we do, yet we need your help to solve them. You of the city have some great, grave, serious problems in your great congested centers of population that we do not understand, yet through the daily press, I think we do know a little, in a general way, as to your problems. I came here with some ideas of what the cities wanted. If they knew what they wanted, and we were able to give it to them, if we succeed in giving you something that will give you a better condition, it will help our condition. We realize there are certain conditions and certain interests that have grown up in your cities that must be corrected, and by giving you larger opportunities we are helping ourselves by giving us also larger liberty. Now we were hoping, and I hope it is yet the sense of this Convention, that you will confine yourselves to those problems and confine yourselves to a consideration of home rule for cities.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Mr. President—

Mr. HURSH: I refuse to be interrupted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Are you speaking for farmers?

Mr. HURSH: Yes, and I refuse to be interrupted. I have been noticing the proceedings of the Convention and I have noticed that the interruptions have not been alone for information, but for the purpose of confusing the speakers, and for that reason at present I refuse to yield.

Municipal Home Rule.

Now I wish to say that I believe this is a good proposal. I have at different times, when not too busy, attended the meetings of this committee. They have labored seriously, honestly and earnestly to give a proposal to this Convention that would give relief to the cities. Assuming that these gentlemen understand what they want, I think it is a pretty good proposition on general principles to adhere pretty close to this proposal, and I am sorry this liquor question has been injected here. As I said in the beginning, Proposal No. 151 covers that liquor proposition entirely and well, and I can not see, in the light of organic law, how Proposal No. 272 can in any way infringe upon the right of Proposal No. 151, and I hope you will brush aside this matter injected into the discussion and consider this question upon its merits alone.

The cities of the state have a right to home rule. We can not solve their problems and they can not solve ours, and we owe it to the toilers of the cities who are trying to work out their salvation to ignore the matter that has been injected here and exclude it from our consideration and give these people the right to home rule. I, as one of the middle-of-the-roads upon the liquor proposal, insist that we refuse to consider that matter in connection with the home rule proposal, for when you inject this bitter contest of the wet and dry question into this measure you are going to lose sight of its merits and you are going to decide and determine the angle by which you reach your conclusions from an entirely biased standpoint. I say it is unfair. I say we have surely advanced enough in our civilization to give the cities a chance to work out their salvation. As one gentleman said, it is remarkable that the cities have done as well as they have. I want the time to come when the people of Cleveland and of Columbus and of Cincinnati, who know their own problems, can work them out themselves. I do not want their big businesses to be able to send lobbyists down here and work something through the legislature and tie their hands, and for that reason I hope the conservative men of the Convention will not inject this liquor project into this proposal.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to ask a question. I want somebody who is in favor of letting section 3 stand as it is—I will say frankly I have not made up my mind how to vote on it—but I want somebody standing sponsor for this, Mr. Harris or someone else, to tell the Convention why you cannot end section 3 with the words "general laws" in line 18, and mean everything you want to cover? Tell us why.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am astonished that the member from Auglaize should be at all in doubt or be unsettled after the very lucid explanation of the member from Hardin. It seems to be clear to the agricultural fraternity in so far as Hardin county is concerned. Now I want to call attention to this, that there need be no doubt about the fact as to the purpose of this amendment. That is settled. We farmers have agreed to it and it ought to go. The suggestion has been made here that there was some difference between the legal brethren on the floor as to what it meant. Certainly the members of the committee do not seem to be altogether clear. I have a great deal of respect for the clear-headedness of the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT]. If Professor Knight will get up and say that he knows exactly what this will do I shall be a great deal relieved. In other words, I think I shall know a good deal more definitely what it means than I do now. Of course, as a farmer I ought to know off hand, but I do not, and when a question so pertinent as the one put here, that refers to the uncertainty that obtains in the minds of some men without brains in regard to this proposition, when you can relieve that uncertainty so easily by putting in a few words supplementing this third section, it is criminal, they tell us, to do it. That is the reason it can not be done. We do not want to do anything criminal here, even if the cities want it done, and in this case they do not want it done. I think the whole thing is settled and we ought to be able to vote for it right away.

Mr. JONES: This provision applies to municipalities. That does not mean only the big cities of the state. It means the smaller cities and the villages as well. Now the rule, as already stated here with reference to municipalities, big or little, in the state of Ohio, is that they can exercise such powers and such powers only as are conferred upon them by legislation. The proposition here is to reverse that rule, under which we have been living for sixty years, and establish the rule that municipalities, big and little from the merest village of one hundred or two hundred population in the state up to the larger cities, can do anything they want to do that is not prohibited by the legislature or the fundamental law. Now I make that statement advisedly and I think upon reflection. The statement as a general proposition is that if this proposal passes the ruling of the state of Ohio will be that every municipality, big or little, can do anything and everything that is not denied to it by law. That is clear, because under this proposal you first provide that they are to be subject in their legislation and in their action to general laws, but in addition to that you say to them they may exceed the general law upon any particular subject and go as far as they want to, and the only way then of checking or interfering with their action is for the legislature to pass a new special act denying them the extra authority which they have sought to exercise. So, after all, it comes right down to the bald proposition that the rule must be established in Ohio that municipalities shall be permitted to do anything they want to do that they are not specifically denied by the legislature from doing.

Do we want to adopt that rule and apply it to municipalities in the state of Ohio with reference to all the matters contemplated by this proposal? For one I say if this proposal is submitted to the voters as it now stands I shall be compelled to vote against it for that reason, and I heartily agree with the suggestion in the question of the gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. Hoskins] that the whole of this matter in section 3 after the word "laws" in line 18 ought to be stricken out, and then you would have this matter resting in the position that the municipalities in the state of Ohio may do whatever they are not prohibited by general law from doing. The term "general law" is one that has been the subject of interpretation for many years. Courts have thoroughly well settled the construction of that term and we need have no doubt about what the future rule will be. Therefore you are not launching on any untried sea. You simply open the doors and lay down the bars for the municipality, big or little, to do everything it is not prohibited from doing by general laws.

It only takes a little illustration to show the evils that would follow from what is contemplated by the latter clause of this section 3 and I do not care to take the time to cite authority. It is clear to every member of the Convention. Why should a municipality of three hundred population be granted any different rights from those a township of a thousand population has? The county has its problem and the township has its problem to solve just as the cities and villages have theirs, and why any different rule applying to the county and township than apply to the municipality? Let them all be subject to the same general law without any special legislation applicable to either one of them.

Mr. FACKLER: The townships have no housing problem, have they? They do not have any problem of crowded districts.

Mr. JONES: There are many problems in the county and township that do not arise in the municipality and you can not make a law of a general nature that will apply to all of those details, but the proposition as a general one that there is no reason for a different rule applicable to cities and villages than is applicable to townships and counties is sound. In other words, we are all people of Ohio, we who live in the small villages and in the counties. We, who are near to cities are just as much interested in the laws that shall regulate the life of a community as the city is. We are just as much interested in the police regulations as the people in the city are. A man who is rearing a family on a farm in the neighborhood of a city is just as much interested in the question of saloons in a city as a man in the city. There can be no difference in that situation. You will assume the people in the city are entitled to have some different laws with reference to police regulations—I mean in its broadest sense, including health and the general welfare of a community—from those the people living in the country have, but I submit there can be no excuse for the latter clause of this section 3, laying down the bars for the municipalities to do everything they desire to do except as prohibited by law and then requiring those who want a different rule to obtain to go and get an act of the legislature. Why not let the application be made to the legislature in the first instance for authority to adopt certain regulations in the municipality? There are those who desire those things; let them be put to the bother of securing things from the legislature, while if this rule is adopted those who are opposed to them will be driven to the legislature to get legislation to prevent or nullify the action of the municipality.

Mr. DOTY: It seems to me there is a habit in this Convention on all big questions to have extremes on one side and extremes on the other. Heretofore I have always been one of the extremes and I have never had the pleasure of being in the middle of the road. It appears in this I am the only one who is in the middle of the road. There may be some who will get with me, but at present I am alone.

It appears from the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] that the liquor lobby was very active last night and this morning on this particular thing. I want to say to this Convention that I had the pleasure of conferring with the liquor lobby last night and this morning at some length and this was never mentioned, so I think we can take with a grain of salt the rest of the gentleman's remarks. I have been trying to find out from both of the members from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS and Mr. SMITH] very able men, but I have not been able yet to find out what these words are there for. The member from Fayette has called attention to the fact that the words "general laws" have been adjudicated, as they call it, that they have been talked about by the courts—

Mr. MAUCK: Construed.

Mr. DOTY: Construed "de novo," I suppose it should be. If that is true what is the use of putting in the rest of this language "affecting the state as a whole?"

A DELEGATE: To "safeguard" it.

Mr. DOTY: Yes; to safeguard it. A safeguard you know is a little jigger put in to make trouble. I expect that is what this was intended to do and it will do it. Now at the first opportunity I want to offer an amendment and I will read it now as part of my remarks so that you may know what I would like to do if I have a chance. I would like to strike out all of section 3 after the word "laws" in line 18, and insert a period. Strike out in lines 49 and 50 the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole."

Mr. ANDERSON: I understand you wish at the proper time to submit that amendment in place of mine?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: And I further understand the objection of those men who are in favor of home rule to the words of my amendment is because it mentions intoxicating liquor?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Which it does not.

Mr. DOTY: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: I ask unanimous consent to let the Doty amendment be substituted for my own.

Mr. DOTY: Do you withdraw yours?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Then I offer this:

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of section 3 after the word "laws" in line 18 and insert a period. Strike out in lines 49 and 50 the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole."

Mr. DOTY: Now, I do not know that I am competent to discuss this whole question, but I am competent to discuss the removal of these words, the meaning of which we can not find even after they have been weighed in apothecary scales to the fraction of an ounce. The amendment I have offered, if it carries, will make section 3 read as follows: "Municipalities shall have power to enact and enforce within their limits such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as are not in conflict with general laws." Now why ought they have that power and why ought they not have any other power?

Mr. REDINGTON: If the section is amended as you suggest that leaves the cities as they are now and gives them only the same power that they now have.

Mr. DOTY: If all there was to this proposal was

Municipal Home Rule.

section 3 you would be right, but we are attempting to put some other things in this proposal which would make quite a change in municipal government, so I would answer that your assumption is not right.

Mr. REDINGTON: Do you not understand that section 3 is a section that gives home rule and gives power to cities to pass ordinances for their own benefit for police, sanitary and other similar regulations?

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; relying entirely upon my general ignorance, I would have to say I do not understand that.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Do you know that the cities can not have home rule under your amendment?

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; I have been utterly unable to find anybody who can show me that they won't. It appears that my brain has become an issue. I am glad something has become an issue, even as small as that, but I do not understand why the whole of the home rule principle must stand or fall on section 3 as in the proposal book. As I understand the home rule proposal it is a proposition that allows cities to frame their own charters and make for themselves such laws as they deem wise, provided those laws do not conflict with the general laws of the state. In a general way that is my understanding of home rule. Is there anything else than that in this home rule proposal?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: You admit under your amendment the legislature could by general law take away a license next door—

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; in section 2 it is provided that they can not pass any law applicable to the municipality unless a municipality accepts it by a vote of the people.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: But section 7 says it is subject to general law.

Mr. DOTY: What is the theory of passing a general law excepting that it is a law that affects the general welfare of the state? Can there be any other reason for the passage of a general law?

Mr. CROSSER: Have you not in mind a special law which the city can accept?

Mr. DOTY: That is true; I did have that. But come over to section 7, and what is there in the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" that makes general laws any more effective than if those words were not there?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I call your attention to original Proposal No. 272 in your proposal book, which came to the committee on Municipalities. In line 32 of the original proposal we have the words "except in municipal affairs." Those four words were almost demanded by your local people and those words are taken from the California constitution and they were cut out of that draft for the reason stated on the floor and the qualifying words that you now want to eliminate were substituted in their place. I suggest to you that if you are going to cut out everything after the words "general laws" you should add the words "except in municipal affairs," or you will be stoned to death when you reach Cleveland. I tell you you are destroying municipal home rule.

Mr. DOTY: I have no objection to putting in the exception if we can understand what it means or if we have any fair chance of understanding it. I want to say that the words the member called attention to will be found on page 2 of the regular proposal, the next one after the one you are looking at in line 32. The words are "except in municipal affairs." They have been stricken out, and the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole" simply amount to the committee inserting one set of words instead of another. You strike out something and put in something that is not germane, and for the life of me I can not get anybody to answer what they mean. We tried to get Judge Rockel last night to answer the question, and after pinning him down he didn't answer, but afterwards I went to him and got him to answer the question. I would be glad to have Judge Rockel answer the question now publicly.

Mr. ROCKEL: I will answer. I said to the committee that it didn't make any difference whether you put the words in or not.

Mr. DOTY: I tried to get you to say that last night and I couldn't do it, but better late than never.

Mr. KNIGHT: I had not intended to speak any further on this lest I be considered as discourteous to the chairman of the committee. I want simply to make the inquiry whether I did not say last night that in my judgment those words added nothing to the proposal.

Mr. DOTY: I guess you did agree with me all right last night. I understood the chairman of the committee to say these words did not add much, but he reserved the right to hear from his colleague from Hamilton [Mr. SMITH]. Now if I understand this home rule proposal—I made a mistake four or five weeks ago and this may be another one—but as near as I can find out this home rule proposal is to allow cities and villages to run their own government under any scheme they choose, provided their plan and their laws do not interfere with general laws. Is not that definite and certain and specific? How are we missing anything by simply stopping there? You can shake your head all you want to. Of course that disconcerts me for the moment, for I am not against home rule, but when men as able as the gentleman from Hamilton, who have given much more study than I have, charge me with being against home rule because I am in favor of this amendment, I will say it takes more than a shake of the head to answer my question, and I put the question over and over again. I put it last night and the member from Franklin very frankly answered it. The member from Clark answered it today, and if anybody else has answered it it escaped my attention.

Mr. CROSSER: Suppose a legislature should pass a law saying that all municipalities should do certain things. Under your proposed change would not that be binding on the municipality?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. CROSSER: Where is your home rule? It is gone, provided it affects municipal affairs only.

Mr. DOTY: Can they not do that with this language in?

Mr. CROSSER: No, sir.

Mr. DOTY: How can you have a law that is not for the general welfare of the state as a whole?

Mr. CROSSER: The legislature might pass a law applying to municipalities which would be a special law and not affect the state as a whole.

Mr. DOTY: But it has to be on the theory of affecting the welfare of the state as a whole or it is not a general law?

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. CROSSER: In all the history of the state laws have been passed applying to all municipalities and they have been construed as general laws.

Mr. DOTY: I am laboring under the disadvantage that my legal training stopped at page 40 of Blackstone.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman yield while I read an authority?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; I need all of the authorities I can get.

Mr. ANDERSON: The constitution of California was passed in 1879. They say this Proposal No. 272 is largely copied after the constitution of California, so much so that the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] had an extensive brief made by his legal representative on this question. I can clear up just why these words were put in that proposal and it grows out of a decision of the California supreme court in 155 California, page 304, right on the liquor question, and I want to read it:

A municipal corporation, in the exercise of the power to regulate traffic in intoxicating liquors that is a part of the police power conferred upon it by the constitution, may enact prohibitory laws applicable not only to those engaged in the business of selling intoxicating liquors to the public, but also to such transactions of a bona fide social club, and may regulate, by license tax or otherwise, any and all kinds of dealings with relation to such liquors, including such dealings of a social club with its members.

In other words, California under the liquor provision provides that each municipality in California may do just as it pleases with the liquor traffic notwithstanding what the state laws may be, because that right was given in the constitution.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move the previous question on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Cuyahoga has the floor.

Mr. LAMPSON: I thought you had yielded?

Mr. DOTY: No; I yielded to get some legal help. Now I agree with Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, in some things that he contended for, and I agree that the insertion of words relating to the liquor traffic would be a mistake. I deprecate the bringing of this question in here at all, and I do not believe the question would have been brought in if the proposal had been used as sent from Cleveland.

These three words have precipitated this unfortunate debate so far as the proposal is concerned, and I regret very much that the question has come in at all. As to the liquor lobby the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] is much mistaken, or else I am not in the confidence of the liquor lobby.

Mr. LAMPSON: I now move the previous question on this amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I would like an opportunity to answer the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty].

The PRESIDENT: The question is shall debate close on the pending amendment?

Mr. DOTY: I move that we recess until half-past one.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question is shall debate close upon the pending amendment?

The main question was ordered.

Mr. WINN: I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty].

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 66, nays, 41, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Harbarger,	Miller, Ottawa,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I move that the Convention recess until 1:30 o'clock, p. m.

The motion was carried.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess.

Mr. Watson rose to a question of privilege and asked that his vote be recorded on the amendment of Mr. Doty to Proposal No. 272. Permission was given and his name being called Mr. Watson voted in the affirmative.

Consideration of Proposal No. 272 was resumed.

Mr. DOTY: The motion pending is an amendment introduced by myself, the amendment I introduced last night. I desire to call your attention to lines 96 and 97. The chairman of the committee explained last night or this morning that part of section 10, beginning with line 95, ought to be a separate section. In other words, the subject matter of those four lines has not anything to do with the subject matter of the remainder of section 7. Bear that in mind, because it is important. It is important that you keep your mind clear on the two things attempted to be done in the one section. I think before the matter is concluded Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, will offer an amendment to make that a separate section, as the last four lines have nothing to do with the section.

The object of the last four lines is to reinstate and bring into existence again what was the constitution of Ohio from 1851 until about eight years ago—that is to say, the supreme court of Ohio interpreted or construed the present constitution of Ohio to do that which these four lines attempt to do provided the amendment is adopted. That constitution, construed as it was for forty years, provided that in the appropriation of property for public improvements, especially like the opening of a street—the opening of parks can be handled under bond provisions, and is often handled that way, so it is not as important as the matter of opening streets—the supreme court interpreted the constitution for forty-one years to the effect that the appropriation of property for the opening of streets should bring about the distribution of the cost of that improvement upon the property benefited by the improvement, a perfectly fair, square proposition, because when you open a street and thereby enhance the value of somebody's property you are giving them what they do not possess, and, therefore, if you take a part of that which you give them to pay for the improvement you are providing you are really taking nothing from them they ever had; you are simply keeping from them a part of that you are giving them. In the city of Cleveland we are in a particularly unfortunate position on account of that decision of eight years ago. The city of Cleveland is what we may term a fan-shaped town—that is, the big thoroughfares run from the center in every direction. We have certain arteries that run from the east, like Euclid avenue and Superior avenue—those are the only two that come down to the center of the city. When you get out a little way there are some avenues like Chestnut, Carnegie, Cedar and Central that come down part way and stop a little short. When those streets were laid out it did not make much difference, because with a town of from only fifty thousand to one hundred thousand people those arteries were enough to care for the people. Now there are living east of this center not less than three hundred and fifty thousand people, two-thirds of whom have to come into the center of the city through these two arteries, and the congestion is becoming intolerable. It is impossible for us today to put enough street cars on our streets between five and six o'clock to carry the people home. We are up to the limit and we must have more outlets. Now the people who are interested in those four avenues—there are other minor avenues—but the people directly interested are going to get a direct benefit, for their property is going to be enhanced, and they are quite willing for the streets to be opened, but under any law we have it is impossible to provide that they shall pay for thus opening the streets. If it is not done that way we have to issue bonds and levy taxes upon the whole city, so that the two-hundred and twenty-five thousand people living in the western part of the city have to contribute to the opening of these streets that are only useful to the eastern end of the city. Maybe they are willing to do it and maybe they are not. If they are willing we could get past that problem, but when you get to the minor problems it would be different. The problem is not of sufficient importance for the rest of the city to help out and the result is they don't make the opening. I presume there are one hundred street openings in the city of Cleveland that should be made for the good of the city. As my colleague reminds me, these four openings—Carnegie, Cedar, Central and Chestnut avenues; we call them the four C's—will cost $2,000,000. The people who get the benefit are willing to pay that amount as it is estimated by conservative men in the city of Cleveland that the opening of those four streets will add $15,000,000 to the value of the land benefited by the opening of those streets. Now all we ask is a legal way for compelling those people who get the $15,000,000 to pay the $2,000,000 to have it done, and that is all my amendment provides.

The gentleman from Hamilton says the word should be "adjacent" instead of "benefited." I would be satisfied with either, but mine is simpler and more direct, and is in fewer words. He has submitted his full amendment to me and I do in one word what he attempts to do in eight words.

Now the other part of the Harris amendment, line 98, at the end of what is now section 10, he proposes to add "said assessment, however, upon all abutting, adjacent and other property in the district benefited shall in no case be levied for more than fifty per cent of the cost of said appropriation." Just see what that would be in the very case I am telling you about. Here we have four street openings that will add $15,000,000 to certain property and as I understand the Harris amendment we can only assess $1,000,000 of that $2,000,000 against the persons who get the $15,000,000 benefit. I think we should be allowed to assess all of it, for the benefit is greater than that which we attempt to assess. In other words, when they get the benefit of $15,000,000 those people ought to be willing to pay the $2,000,000.

Mr. ULMER: If your statement is true, does not that $15,000,000 that is added in value go on the tax duplicate?

Mr. DOTY: Technically it will. What has that got to do with the question?

Mr. ULMER: Now another question—

Mr. DOTY: Yes; that will be all right, but I want to ask another question right there. What difference does it make if that $15,000,000 does go on the tax duplicate?

Mr. ULMER: The point is that the community will receive some benefit from that.

Mr. DOTY: They ought to do it. Mind you that $15,000,000 of value does not exhaust tomorrow with the opening. It continues to exist. Who produced that $15,000,000? The people of Cleveland by opening the streets. Who gets the benefit? A few of the people. Now all we contend for is that the people who get the $15,000,000 of benefit shall pay the bill, amounting to $2,000,000.

Mr. ULMER: That is all right, but if the streets are open do not the people receive the benefit?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ULMER: Ought they not pay some too?

Mr. DOTY: Absolutely not. If the gentleman had heard a while ago or understood—which probably was my fault—all I said was that we should take a part of what the city creates, a thing which does not exist before and which the private owner does not have, but I claim a man who sits still and lets the community give him $15,000,000 is getting off lucky when he is asked to only pay $2,000,000 for the $15,000,000. I think he is getting off easy.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. ULMER: After this value is created does not the city have a constant income from it in the form of taxes?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ULMER: Does the city lose anything by the transaction?

Mr. DOTY: Absolutely not, unless they have to pay a part. If the city of Cleveland pays fifty per cent of that it will cost the city of Cleveland $1,000,000 and it is gone forever, and who gets the benefit of it? Comparatively few get the benefit of it. Mind you, these people are not asking to be exempted from paying the fifty per cent. They are willing to pay the whole of it, but if you fix it so they can not pay but half the city will have to pay the rest.

Mr. ULMER: Is it not true that under the present law the city has to pay all?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, and that is what is wrong and that is what has congested the city of Cleveland and the city of Toledo. Toledo can't make a street opening any more than we can, and the city of Toledo up to eight years ago was in the habit, under the old interpretation, of opening streets from time to time. The last one they opened was the straw that broke the camel's back. They opened Bank street one block and I think the property cost $100,000 or $200,000 and they attempted to assess that on the property benefited. The owners of some of that property carried it to the supreme court and the supreme court overruled its decision of forty-one years' standing and decided it could not be done. From that time to this the city of Cleveland has not opened a street. We have one hundred or one hundred and fifty streets that require opening, and the worst condition we are in now is about the four street openings that lead toward the heart of the city from the east. On the west of the city there are some that I have not touched upon, but those four are the worst that we have. This amendment of mine seeks to restore conditions as they existed prior to the decision of the supreme court and make it possible for the assessment of all or any part of such improvement upon the benefited property.

Mr. ULMER: Whom do you blame for the situation now existing?

Mr. DOTY: The supreme court.

Mr. ULMER: I blame the city council that adopted the plats.

Mr. DOTY: The trouble is that those men have been dead for fifty years and we can't get at them. We can't even recall them.

Mr. REDINGTON: You assume in every case that a benefit would be derived for the property owner, but can you not imagine a place where it would operate in such away as to hurt the property?

Mr. DOTY: It is conceivably possible that that might happen. I don't think it ever did, but if it ever did the part that is benefited is the only part that should be required to pay. If you have a house and lot worth

$1,000, and we put an improvement next door that does not add a cent of value to your land, and it is just worth $1,000 after the improvement is put there, I think that that kind of improvement should be made at the expense of the city, because it would never be made except by the city. There is no local benefit there.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] ought not to ask this Convention, acting for the whole state of Ohio, to enact a constitutional provision for the sole benefit of Cleveland. The situation he names may exist in the city of Cleveland. It may be that he is mistaken as to the amount of benefit to be received by the abutting property holders in Cleveland, but if he is right it would not make a particle of difference. What the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] fails to take into consideration is the sacredness of private property. Now let us see what the present constitution has to say as to the inviolability of private property. Section 19 of article I reads as follows:

Private property shall ever be held inviolate, but subservient to the public welfare. When taken in time of war or other public exigency, imperatively requiring its immediate seizure or for the purpose of making or repairing roads, which shall be open to the public, without charge, a compensation shall be made to the owner, in money, and in all other cases, where private property shall be taken for public use, a compensation therefor shall first be made in money, or first secured by a deposit of money; and such compensation shall be assessed by a jury, without deduction for benefits to any property of the owner.

As stated last evening, and as read from the brief prepared by my own private attorney on this proposition, these four lines, 95 to 98 (which by the way ought to be a separate section) revolutionize the law in the state of Ohio. It says, "Private property may be taken for public use," but I go one step further in my proposed amendment and that step is taken in the interest and for the protection of the individual as against the public. I say that while the municipality may take private property for public uses, it may not put upon the private owners of that public property more than fifty per cent of the cost of making improvements. The present laws of the state of Ohio also carry out the same idea of equity and public morality in the very proposition I have advanced. Under the present laws of the state of Ohio the aggregate assessment of all kinds within a period of five years for improving streets and laying sewers, etc., can not be assessed against the abutting property in excess of thirty-three and one-third per cent of the value of the property. Now in my amendment I have increased that limit to fifty per cent, and I go on the theory that wherever private property is taken for public purposes it must necessarily be also for the benefit of the public. The benefit to the individual is secondary for it is a sacred proposition of law that no private property ought to be taken for public purposes unless the needs of the public are greater than the rights of the private individual. As an illustration, no improvement in the extension of roads through a farm is made save and except on the theory that the public demands, the public requirements, the public uses, imperatively demand the improvement, for otherwise there would not be any occasion for condemning this private property. It sounds well to cite this isolated case of Cleveland, but we are not adopting fundamental laws for the benefit or protection of one particular municipality, where the working of the law in all other instances might bring great hardship.

Mr. ANDERSON: Have you not in your amendment made a mistake in that you have not distinguished between the words "abutting property" and "benefited property"? I have just read your amendment and there is a good deal of difference between distributing the cost upon property that is benefited and property that is abutting.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The intent of the amendment is to say that the total cost shall not be in excess of fifty per cent of the improvement. Now it may be provided that total cost may be assessed, twenty per cent on the abutting property and thirty per cent on the non-abutting property benefited in a certain district; the council would determine how this was to be distributed.

Mr. ANDERSON: But you do not distinguish between the words "abutting" and "benefited". There is quite a difference between "abutting" and "benefited"?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The idea is to take in all the property benefited.

Mr. ANDERSON: You should not say abutting.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Cuyahoga that the cost upon all the property benefited shall not exceed fifty per cent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Is not that question of "benefited property" very indeterminate?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Very hazy and very indeterminate, and that is the reason why there should be a safeguard to the poor man with his house or farm. Of course I can see what might happen. Here is the state or the municipality with its legal department and all of its experts to conduct such affairs as against the individual, who in event of a controversy, would have to employ his attorneys and try to keep the town from confiscating his property. There is all the difference in the world between what real estate experts say is the value of the property and what the property will actually sell for.

Mr. DOTY: The only difference between you and me on this awful thing of confiscating property is not a matter of principle. I want to take all of it and you only want half.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is not a fair statement.

Mr. DOTY: It is as fair as for you to say that I am attempting to confiscate property. I never said any such thing.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Then I withdraw the statement, but the proposition I am urging upon you and which you ought to consider is whether the cost of the improvement may all be put upon the property benefited; in my judgment it should not, because I could readily see if the city of Cincinnati extends a road and it goes through Brown's farm and Brown's farm becomes more accessible and it is very much easier to reach the main road, then Brown's farm is benefited and the city may say to Brown that he must pay a large share of the cost of the improvement, but Brown answers "My farm is not worth that much." Your idea of the pecuniary benefit is too great. You always fail to take into consideration the benefit to the public. If the public is benefited the question of the increase in value to the individual may also be considered to some extent. From my point of view I say the public is benefited to the extent of not less than fifty per cent, otherwise, why does the public appropriate that individual's private property?

Mr. DOTY: Why fifty per cent?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It is absolutely arbitrary, just as a great many other things are. It is some point between nothing and one hundred per cent.

Mr. DOTY: Now I want to ask you about Brown's farm. Suppose Brown's farm before that road or street is made is worth $10,000, and after the road or street is put in it is worth $50,000 and the street cost $10,000. We ask Brown to contribute the $10,000. Wherein are we asking Brown for any of his private property?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I will show you.

Mr. DOTY: You will have a good time doing it, but go ahead.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Brown has not asked the community to open the road on his farm. Brown himself may not want a road through his farm, but the community by reason of this law takes Brown by the throat and says, "The road will be put through your farm whether you wish it or not, and we further think you ought to be grateful because we have increased your property $40,000," but Brown is not grateful and does not want the road open and he answers, "You are not opening the road for my benefit; I don't ask or want you to do it; you are opening it solely for the public's benefit."

Mr. DOTY: But the point is the measure of damages.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There is no question of the measure of damages.

Mr. DOTY: But what is the measure of damages?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You can not measure it.

Mr. DOTY: You can measure his damages by the amount of the property you have taken away.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: If you put a road through his farm, from his point of view the beauty of the farm may lie in the fact that it is not divided and if there is a public highway driven through it he may figure it that it is greatly damaged; that his privacy has been invaded and the æsthetic enjoyment and mental pleasure have been lost.

Mr. DOTY: You are enough of a lawyer to answer my question — what is the measure of his damages?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Neither you nor any other man can answer that. The legal measure may be one thing, but there may be an entirely different measure.

Mr. HALFHILL: The measure of damages is how much less valuable it is after the improvement than before.

Mr. DOTY: We have assumed we have taken the man's property?

Mr. HALFHILL: The value of the property taken —

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DOTY: But the measure of the damages is less than nothing.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The measure of damages would be how much less?

Mr. DOTY: Assuming he was benefited to the extent of $40,000? Is it fair when you give a man $40,000 to ask him to give you back $10,000 of it?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: No; he is not asking you to do that. I am simply asking you to pay him the damages you are putting him to.

Mr. ANDERSON: A point of order.

Mr. DOTY: I am down.

Mr. HALFHILL: Don't your amendment proceed upon the theory that the opening of the street is of value to the entire public?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Absolutely, and therefore the entire public should share the cost of opening it.

Mr. HALFHILL: And that has been the law of the state of Ohio and of every other civilized state in the world that anybody knows anything about, and further there is one class of cases in torts where a city is always held responsible for obstructions to streets because streets are for the general public. That is fundamental and can not be gainsaid.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It goes one step further. My amendment will help hold back extravagance. There will not be reckless opening of streets and reckless extension of roads through farms.

Mr. DOTY: Or reckless benefits to the public.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Or reckless injuries to the public, perhaps. There will not be any of these. It will not be done carelessly or recklessly when the public knows that at least fifty per cent of the cost of the improvement must be paid by it. So there is a question of morality and a question of sound business sense in the management of your municipal affairs, and it rests with you to determine which you will adopt.

Mr. ROCKEL: I think the amendment of Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, ought to prevail. I have no doubt some of the lawyers at least are perfectly familiar with the provisions of the present constitution and the debate that occurred upon the insertion of those provisions in the constitution of 1851. Previous to that time property was appropriated and the entire cost of the property was assessed back upon the abutting owners. That became such a great abuse that property was practically confiscated prior to 1851, and that convention was so much impressed with that that they safeguarded against it in two separate provisions of the constitution of 1851. One of these provisions has been read by Mr. Harris. The other is in another section and is substantially the same. Now if that was the subject of great abuse prior to 1851 I do not believe that this Convention, in order to protect Cleveland perhaps, or any other city, ought to violate the rules that those people in 1851 saw were absolutely essential to protect people's property in the state of Ohio. I think we are going far enough when we give them the privilege of assessing back one-half of it, so I am very much in favor of the provision of Mr. Harris's amendment. I think it will be an abuse if you give the city the privilege of assessing back the full value. They will do as he suggests. They will put out streets in a number of directions. They will say "it doesn't cost the city anything; we will assess the cost back on the adjoining property." It seems to me it is a very dangerous provision to put into this constitution, to allow any man's property to be taken for the public use and assess the cost back on him. Remember you can not take it for private use, and when you do take it for public use the public ought to pay something for it. I think we are doing very liberally with the cities of Ohio if we permit them to make excess condemnation or any condemnation and permit them to assess back even fifty per cent.

Mr. KNIGHT: At the request of the chairman of the committee I am glad to speak for a moment on this amendment. It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory] and the amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] may readily be combined into a single amendment covering substantially what is wanted by both, with the exception that one proposes that the city shall stand fifty per cent of the cost of improvement contemplated and the other contemplates that the city shall pay nothing, but the entire cost shall be put upon benefited property, and it seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] is the one that ought to be incorporated into this proposal in that regard. I agree with the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] and this is seemingly acquiesced in by others, that it is impossible to open any streets where and when they ought to be opened without a benefit to the entire community resulting from that opening. Every street in the city, unless it has been opened purely for speculative purposes, is and can not help being a benefit in a greater or less degree to the people in all parts of the city, and is not a special benefit solely, although it may be in a larger degree, to the mere local district through which the street runs. For example, in Cleveland there is congestion in certain parts. It is for the benefit of the entire city to have the streets opened there so that congestion in that part of the city can be relieved. It is not a benefit solely to that part of the city to have the streets open, to have the congestion relieved. It seems to me, as stated by the gentleman last on the floor, that it is the taking of property for public use, and it is absurd to talk about taking property for public use and not having the public pay for it in part at least. It seems to me that this proposed amendment is wise and liberal and goes as far as it ought to go in providing that fifty per cent of the entire cost of the improvement should be levied on the specially benefited property and the remaining fifty per cent upon the municipality as a whole. If the municipality as a whole must stand fifty per cent it serves as a check upon the municipality itself in the indiscriminate opening of such streets, whereas if it can mulct the property owner for the entire cost of the improvement it is a matter of no concern to the municipality as a whole, for, as stated a moment ago, it costs the municipality nothing. I hope the change will be made from "abutting" to "benefited" and that we make this further change "not to exceed fifty per cent of the cost."

Mr. DOTY: Take the illustration which I used as an illustration and not applicable to the necessities of Cleveland more than any other city, that the improvement will produce $15,000,000 of value for the mere making of the improvement. What is it that makes that $15,000,000?

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. KNIGHT: I will answer that question by asking another.

Mr. DOTY: Any way you choose.

Mr. KNIGHT: If in case it would really make that much value, if it would increase the value of the proverty $15,000,000, would not you regard the property owner foolish not to make it himself?

Mr. DOTY: They will not do it because they can not do it. There are five thousand of them. Can you get five thousand citizens to spend two million dollars on a thing like this? You might get them to build a Y. M. C. A. or something like that, but you can't get them to make a street. Now I wish you would answer my question.

Mr. KNIGHT: I will if you will keep still a moment.

Mr. DOTY: I have given you a lot of chances, but you don't seem to do it.

Mr. KNIGHT: Have you run down yet?

Mr. DOTY: No, I have just started.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not going around with the dog-in-the-manger principle that lest somebody may get something for a little less than it costs the rest of us, therefore he must be "soaked" by the rest of us.

Mr. DOTY: Is that an answer to my question?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: I thought that was just about as good an answer as you could give. You are about four miles away.

Mr. FESS: There are two amendments, one by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] which is opposed by some, and the other by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] which strikes out "abutting" and puts in "benefited," and there is no serious objection to that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I will accept the word "benefited" instead of "abutting".

Mr. DOTY: For the purpose of facilitating the vote, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I will withdraw my amendment, and then I will offer another amendment.

The second amendment offered by the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] was read as follows:

1st Division. In line 96, strike out "the abutting" and insert "benefited."

In line 97, strike out "abutting".

2d Division. In line 98 add: "Said assessments, however, upon all the abutting, adjacent, and other property in the district benefited, shall in no case be levied for more than fifty per cent of the cost of such appropriation."

Mr. FESS: I now demand the previous question.

The PRESIDENT: The question is "Shall debate be closed on this amendment?"

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is upon the adoption of the amendment, and a division having been heretofore called, the vote will be on the first part.

Mr. KING: There is something the matter there. You say that you will assess the whole in one place, and now you say you will assess fifty per cent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Would not that mean that they could provide part of the money in bonds, but not more than fifty per cent by assessment?

Mr. KING: They could provide the whole of it.

The PRESIDENT: The amendment can be amended later if desired.

The first division was agreed to.

The question being "Shall the second division be agreed to?"

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 65, nays 37, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

The second division was agreed to.

Mr. KING: Now I offer the following amendment: The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of lines 95, 96, 97 and 98, as now amended.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. The motion to amend is out of order, in that the Convention has already amended these four lines in two particulars, and therefore the amendment to strike out is out of order.

Mr. KING: That would be a queer rule. It is now a part of the proposal adopted so far, and it is now pending, and I offer an amendment to strike out all that the amendment added, and I make that motion because I do not believe it has any place in this proposal. I do not believe it serves any useful purpose in there, as appears from the argument of those gentlemen who have explained its benefits, because I do not believe it adds anything whatever. All that it pretends to do could be done now by the legislature, and therefore I am opposed to having it in this proposal.

Mr. PECK: That is to strike out all relating to the assessment for benefits?

Mr. KING: Yes.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. PECK: I am opposed to anything of that sort. It has been in the constitution since 1851. Someone has some property, and they think it will be a great benefit to open a street. The thing is rushed and it goes through with a whoop, the man's property is taken—a hundred feet of it—and they say that his property has been greatly benefited, more than to the extent of the property taken, and they simply confiscate his property. It may be a very grave question whether he has gotten any benefit or not. It is estimated that he has gotten or will get some future benefit, but his visible, tangible property is taken, and all that he gets for it is some estimated future benefits. I say that is a right of property that is protected by the constitution of the United States that no man's property shall be taken except by due process of law. I have here a statement about that which was made by some of the lawyers in the constitutional convention of 1851, and I shall read some of the debate. There was an amendment put in there just like this. I have myself probably participated in the trial of as many condemnation cases as any lawyer within the sound of my voice. Over and over again I have tried cases, and the jury has always been instructed:

Gentlemen of the jury, you will appraise this property, and give the man its fair value in money—what it is worth—and you will not deduct anything for any supposed benefit to that property. You give him the amount of it in money. This is the law, and that ought to be the law if you are going to take the property. But this is also the law, and should be, that as to any damages to the remainder of the property, by reason of the appropriation, you may offset those damages with the benefits, if any, to the property. The damages are hypothetical, and so are the benefits, and you can set the one hypothetical side against the other hypothetical side, but as to the ground which is really taken, you must pay him for it at its full, fair, marketable value, and that is the constitutional rule.

Mr. Groesbeck, in the convention of 1851, said on this subject:

If the public necessities demand it, my property may be taken, and I must submit. But there is still a right resulting to me out of the transaction. What is it? I am entitled to payment for the property taken. But, sir, is it right in that case for the state to say, I will take your property, and I will assess—not the damages—but I will take into consideration the damage that is done, and the benefits that are to accrue to you from the use to which I put your property, and I will pay you the balance? No, sir; that is not right. It is not consistent with the rule that private property shall be inviolate.

The first part of this section begins with the proposition that private property shall be inviolate, and the end of it is that the benefits shall not be considered. Mr. Groesbeck says further:

Now, what is the rule? Go through my land—take whatever you want, whether I desire to part with it or not, and pay me exactly what it is worth. Under that rule I shall get all that I am entitled to; under the other, I may get nothing. My property must be taken, and I have no right to complain. All that I can ask, and all that I have a right to ask, is that at the hands of a jury of my countrymen, I may receive for compensation the full value of that which has been taken from me. If in going through my land, with a public work, damage is done to other land beside that which is taken, doubtless the benefit which I receive may be set off against this injury, but where the land itself is taken, there is no basis for such a commutation.

There is a longer and more powerful argument by Rufus P. Ranney right alongside of it. And it is the judgment of every lawyer familiar with the subject that it is not proper to try to pay a man for his ground in the supposed benefits assessed by a jury that may or may not accrue. They speculate on what he gets, but the public gets his concrete property. I submit that it is not a just rule, and that it is the last thing that should be put in the constitution.

Mr. DWYER: I can corroborate very fully what Judge Peck has said. I remember further back probably than any gentleman in this hall. I remember prior to the constitution of 1851, in the early days of railroad building in this state, when they would go to a man's farm, and they had a commission to fix the valuation. They didn't have a jury trial then, but they had a commission. They would go to your farm, and they would say, "We will take so much of your land for this railroad," and then they would say the benefit to the rest of the land is equal to the value of the land taken, and they would not pay anything. That was the rule prior to the constitution of 1851. I know one person in the city of Dayton from whom they took seven acres, and they never gave him a penny. They said the benefits to the rest of his land were equal to the value of the seven acres and that was why in the constitution of 1851 the Convention was so careful to guard against anything of that kind. They put in the provision that in all cases of condemnation the party should get the full value of the land taken irrespective of any benefits. They cut out the clause that before that time allowed them to take benefits into consideration and pay the man for his land with those benefits, and in the constitution of 1851 said that the party must be given the value of the land, irrespective of any benefit from the improvement. I have been in a number of those cases, and the law provides that when you take the land you must give full cash value, irrespective of any benefits, but if you come to incidental benefits that are not shared by the community, if there is any damage, offset the damage by the incidental benefits. But first they must give the cash value of the land, irrespective of any benefits to the remainder of the land, and then they may consider the damages to the rest of the land, and if there are damages, they can offset incidental benefits against those damages. I think that is a fair way to have it. Every man whose land is taken should get the full value of the land taken.

Mr. FACKLER: It seems to me that the community should have a right to levy upon benefited property a part of the cost of making an improvement. As a member of the council several years ago in an outlying section of what is now the city of Cleveland I recall that the council was confronted with this proposition: Two streets had been opened some years before by real estate dealers. The people from one part, in order to get to the business section of the city, had to go several blocks around a truck farm. We desired to put a street through the truck farm. It was getting to a time when it would have to be lotted, but the owner of the property, knowing there was a demand for the opening of the street, would not do anything to assist the village in the matter. It had to open the street, and it paid full cost to the owner of the truck farm. He immediately laid out his lots on either side of the street. He was benefited by that, and the community had to pay the whole cost.

Municipal Home Rule.

I think putting the whole cost on the abutting property is going too far, but I think we should go as far as attempted here—we should permit the municipality to levy not exceeding one-half of the improvement on the benefited property.

Mr. PECK: If you own a lot next to a neighbor in the city of Cleveland, and assume that the street is not much improved, and you erect a valuable building on your lot, does it not improve the value of your neighbor's property?

Mr. FACKLER: That is a mere incidental benefit.

Mr. PECK: Exactly. Do you have any right to assess him for any of the cost that you have expended?

Mr. DOTY: If you—

Mr. PECK: I am asking Mr. Fackler—you don't know.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, I do. You don't know what I am going to say.

Mr. PECK: Yes, I do. I am asking Mr. Fackler.

Mr. FACKLER: On the other hand, he has no right to stand in the way of my improving my property, but sometimes men own property that will be greatly benefited, and refuse to open streets and compel municipalities to buy their property when at the same time it is a benefit very largely to them in the enhancement of the property they have remaining.

Mr. PECK: They simply refuse to give away their property.

Mr. DWYER: I want to ask the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] if he is in favor of the rule in the Cameron case?

Mr. FACKLER: No; I am not. Now I move to table the amendment.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I would like to offer an amendment to cure an error.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the beginning of line 95 insert "Section 10a."

Mr. DOTY: That divides the section that we have been talking about, and it would be better to have it done.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 96, strike out the words "or in whole".

Mr. KNIGHT: The object of that is to reconcile that with what we have done. It would then read "Any municipality appropriating private property for a public improvement may provide money therefor in part by assessment," etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the word "special" in line 11, and insert the word "additional". In line 12 strike out the word "special" and insert the word "other".

Mr. KING: There has been considerable miscellaneous discussion of these words "special laws," and all I have heard upon that subject has treated them as general laws. A special law would apply to but one place in Ohio. That has been determined over and over again. Now, if you pass a law that can be adopted or accepted by more than one municipality, or by all if they want to, it is a general law, and has uniform operation throughout the state, and I do not think the word "special" ought to be put into a constitutional provision when you mean something else than special. It was explained by the chairman of the committee that upon application, as he illustrated it, by the city of Cleveland for a certain law or laws that law or those laws would be submitted to the people and would be adopted. Then he afterwards said that other municipalities, if they saw that they worked, could pass under the provisions of these laws by simply submitting them to a vote of their people. If a law is so broad that that can be done, it is not a special law at all, but it is a general law, because if you can use it more than once it is not a special law. It is merely optional.

Mr. KNIGHT: Do you think that the insertion of the word "other" adds anything?

Mr. KING: It seems to emphasize that you mean an additional law to that described in the first clause of the section.

Mr. KNIGHT: Would it not be clearer by striking out the word "special"?

Mr. KING: Probably it would.

Mr. KNIGHT: Would it not be better if you would insert the word "additional"?

Mr. KING [reading]: "No such law shall become operative in any municipality until it shall have been submitted." Are you distinguishing that from "The general assembly shall by general law provide for the incorporation and government of cities and villages; and it may also enact"—

Mr. DOTY: Additional laws—

Mr. KING: Well, "additional laws" would do. But I don't like the word "special". You make it necessary to pass a special law for each city, whether they want something or not.

Mr. DWYER: A special law applies to one.

Mr. KING: Yes.

Mr. DWYER: And the general law applies to the class.

Mr. KING: Yes.

Mr. DWYER: But as to a special law, you will have to go to the legislature every time you want to get one passed?

Mr. KING: Yes.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. DWYER: I believe you are right, and that we don't want any meaning of that kind to apply to it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is there any objection to changing that amendment by inserting the word "additional" instead of that word "other"?

Unanimous consent was given and the amendment thus changed was agreed to.

Mr. KING: Another amendment.

Mr. DOTY: Do you make them over there?

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the period at the end of line 30 in section 4, and insert a comma and these words: "but any such public utility shall be subject to any regulations provided by law for a public utility of the same class owned or operated by any person, firm or corporation."

Mr. KING: I submit that amendment because in my judgment if the municipal corporation enters into the operation of public utilities, either in competition or as the owner of the whole of the utilities in that particular corporation engaged in furnishing for toll, or for a price agreed upon by itself, the particular thing manufactured and furnished or given by the utilities, it should be amenable to such laws as the state has passed or may pass regulating the administration or operation of that particular utility, and that, being so amenable, it should be required to make such reports of administration as by our laws the state demands of all others operating similar utilities.

Mr. FACKLER: That would place the issuance of bonds with which to purchase utilities under the public utilities commission.

Mr. KING: I think it would, and I make it for that reason, that every utility in the state would be brought under its domination and control, and that it is a protection not only to the public who use the utilities, but to those who own them.

Mr. MAUCK: With or without your amendment, if a public utility sells its service to a private property owner will that utility be the subject of taxation?

Mr. KING: Not in the state; that is my understanding.

Mr. MAUCK: I would call attention to the fact that it has been held that where a municipal corporation owns a city hall and rents out part of it for a cash rent, that so far as it is rented, it becomes subject to taxation. Why not a municipal plant of any other kind?

Mr. KING: If that is so, I am wrong in my abrupt answer. That is only an additional reason why a public utility that can sell one-half of its output shall be under the control of the most important board we have in the state.

Mr. DOTY: Is not the object of your amendment to prevent the public utility from cutting under the price of other service?

Mr. KING: No; I didn't have that provision that you refer to in my book, but—

Mr. DOTY: Is not that the primary purpose of your amendment?

Mr. KING: No; this makes them report like any other corporation.

Mr. DOTY: I call your attention to section 12: "The general assembly shall have authority to limit the power of municipalities to levy taxes and incur debts for local purposes, and may require reports from the municipalities as to their financial condition and transactions,"—that takes in public utilities—"in such form as may be provided by law, and may provide for the examination of the vouchers, books and accounts of all municipal authorities, or of public undertakings conducted by such authorities."

For all you are after you don't need your amendment, because it is in there, but if you want to head off any rate matter, all right.

Mr. KING: I want the provisions as they exist now, or as the law may be hereafter.

Mr. DOTY: As to rates?

Mr. KING: Anything that the law covers.

Mr. DOTY: We have taken care of everything but rates in this section 12.

Mr. KING: I don't think so. We have passed upon the amount of the mortgage, and we have talked recently about privately owned public utilities—

Mr. DOTY: Your amendment doesn't touch that.

Mr. KING: The public utility law does.

Mr. DOTY: But your amendment doesn't cover it.

Mr. KING: Certainly it does.

Mr. DOTY: I will read it—

Mr. KING [reading]: "All regulatory laws that apply to privately owned public utilities shall apply to municipally owned public utilities."

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: This amendment should not be considered for one moment if the Convention favors home rule for municipalities, because with the amendment of Judge King there is no such thing as home rule or public ownership of public utilities. It says to the municipality, you may build, you may operate, you may purchase, all subject to the public utilities commission of the state of Ohio, and the public utilities commission may determine that you cannot issue the bonds, you cannot put such a mortgage, or that you cannot do one of forty different things. This is as diametrically opposed to home rule as it is possible to be. There is only one thing to do, and I move now to lay this amendment on the table. It is not worthy of discussion.

Mr. KING: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 85, nays 18, as follows:

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CROSSER: As I have not thus far inflicted myself upon the Convention with any long statement, I feel that now is a pretty good time, when we are all in good humor. By way of commiseration of the member from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS], who feels that a discourtesy was done him in entering upon the discussion of this matter in his absence yesterday afternoon, he should remember that it is not those who drive along difficult highways who are heard, but rather those who are on the tallyho as passengers and blow the silver bugle. So, if it will do him any good to have sympathy, I can give him some, having been there myself.

Every amendment that has been offered here to this proposal is clearly intended to destroy the principle of home rule as involved in this measure. The struggle for municipal home rule which has gone on in this country for so many years is actuated by the same motive as that which has advanced the cause of direct legislation, direct primary, and every other democratic measure which has agitated this country for some time, namely, the desire to control the machinery of government by those who are subject to that government.

Direct legislation is an attempt to restore to the people control of their political destinies and welfare further than that of merely changing their rulers every year or two, as is the case at present, for after all that is the only democracy which they have had so far in this country.

The advocates of home rule merely insist that municipalities be allowed to solve their own problems and control their own affairs, independent of outside authority, whether that authority be a monarchy, an oligarchy or the people of a whole state. In short, the cities merely ask that the principle of self-government be extended to them. At the present time they find themselves in the predicament of the women, the only other beings in the state denied the right to self-government.

In order to have real self-government all those, and only those, who are appreciably affected by governmental activities should have a voice as to what that government should be. In other words, if there be a problem which affects the city of Cincinnati or Columbus or Toledo particularly, it is not home rule in any sense of the word if the people of the whole state of Ohio undertake to decide that question, merely because those outside of the cities have more people to vote upon it than the particular municipality.

It is difficult to understand by what reasoning the framers of our constitution and some other constitutions justified the taking away from municipalities the right of self-government, since this has been the principle of which the United States was supposed to be the best example. Such constitutions have reversed the natural order of things.

I contend that the natural and correct method proceeds upon the theory that municipalities exist first and provide for a government suited to themselves, and that for their own mutual welfare, and also for the welfare of the intervening territory, general governments should be established, but which should exercise authority only in regard to matters of a general nature. As the federal government in its relation to the states has only such powers as are specifically granted to it by the people of the states, so it should be with the state in relation to municipalities. The state should have only such powers as the people specifically grant to it.

This is the view taken by Judge Cooley, and it has been held in many cases outside of Ohio that this is the only authority which the state has: People vs. Hurbut, 24 Mich. 44; People vs. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50; People vs. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228; Commrs. vs. The Mayor, 29 Mich. 343; People vs. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15; Allor vs. Wayne, 43 Mich. 76; State vs. Denny, 118 Ind. 382; Evansville vs. State, 118 Ind. 426.

Judge Cooley used this language: "A written constitution is, in every instance, a limitation upon the power of government in the hands of agents".

Of course, I have not quoted enough here to show what he really meant, but his theory is that a state legislature should only have such authority as the people of the state grant to it, not the converse, the situation as we have it in this state, that they have absolute authority, and that the subdivisions have only such authority as the legislature doles out to them. If you stop to consider a moment, you will realize that the municipalities, the village communities, as they are sometimes called, were the first forms of government in the history of any civilization. There was no need for a general or central government until there were a great many municipalities and cities. The villages and cities are simply aggregations of people who have congregated in some particular part of the earth. They found it necessary to have governmental machinery of some kind to regulate their affairs, and it was only natural that all powers of government should remain in them when they established a general government, except such as was necessary to discharge the government functions arising from the interrelations of the municipalities.

But some gentlemen have said that that is neither the natural order nor historically true. I have investigated the question, and I find that even in this country, in the state of Rhode Island, that is exactly what happened.

In an article in Harvard Law Review, vol. 13, I find this language by A. M. Eaton:

The original towns of Rhode Island existed before there was any colony or state, with well defined self-instituted powers, legislative, judicial and executive, that were not surrendered when they agreed to unite. * * * They derived no powers from any charter, and no title nor any authority to any land from the crown, except from the Indians by purchase.

In 1640 a union was brought about between Portsmouth and Newport, but the two towns were not fused together, and each continued its separate existence, "forming a union only for their common object, but leaving to each one the management of its own local affairs."

Municipal Home Rule.

So not only in theory but in fact that has been the natural growth of all governments. They grow from the smallest unit up to the community or village, and from that on to what is known as the state, and from the state to the nation, and at the present time it might be well to call attention to the fact that in our analogy we must remember that the United States government, the federal government, has not all the power of government over the states of the Union, which it may dole out to the states as it may see fit, but the converse is true, the theory which I am advocating here for municipalities in relation to the states is true, namely, that the United States only has such power as the people have specifically granted to it, and wherever problems can be handled by the people of any locality, where they affect the people of that locality more than some other locality, that locality should be allowed to do as it sees fit, not because of any sentimental feeling, but for the most practical reason imaginable, namely, that the people being on the ground and having the problem facing them every day, the people knowing their resources, wants, and the exigencies of the situation, are better able to control by governmental process the difficulty involved in that particular case. It is a practical proposition. It is real self-government, that those actually affected by any law shall have the right to enact and enforce that law. The state should have control over certain functions of government. For example, not even I would insist that cities and municipalities should regulate intrastate railroads or canals, for the very simple reason that the railroads enter a number of different municipalities and the canals pass through a great part of the state. Therefore, if one municipality were allowed to regulate or manage a canal or railroad some other municipality would suffer an injustice. So there is a clear dividing line between the case where the matter affects more than one municipality, and therefore requires control by a general government, and the case where it is properly a local problem and can be regulated by the municipality. In the latter instance in order to have real self-government the people of the municipality should control. Now, what are some of the difficulties that have resulted from an infraction of that principle?

I read the other day of a case where, down in Boston, it was necessary to go to the state legislature of Massachusetts to get authority from the legislature to enable the city of Boston to run an electric wire from the city hall to the old court house so that they could use their dynamo in the city hall to supply the old court house with electric light and power. What was the amusing result of the effort to get that through? The electric light company got busy with the state legislature and prevented the passage of that bill, so the city of Boston was compelled to install another plant for the court house, do without light or buy electricity from a private company.

Why, in the state of Ohio I find that a few years ago the city of Cincinnati made application to the legislature, through a member of the legislature, for the passage of a bill giving cities of the first grade of the first class a grant of power to open a street called Gilbert avenue, and the bill provided that the street should be of a certain width. Think of it, going to the legislature to get authority to open a street in Cincinnati or Cleveland!

I was talking the other day to a gentleman who was once a senator from Cuyahoga county. He told me that when he was in the legislature a few years ago all he did when he wanted any legislation for Cleveland was to go to the Cincinnati crowd and say, "We have a bill that doesn't affect Cincinnati; I want you to help it through." And it would go through. They would each have bills providing for bonds for park purposes and all sorts of things, and they each helped the other through. This gentleman said that one day an old gentleman came to him and said, "Senator, don't you think you had better stop for a little while? I hear a good deal of growling that these bills are vicious and rotten in every particular." And he said, "Old man, do I bother you when you want something for Cincinnati? Don't I come to you with my delegation? Don't you think we had better handle this matter just as we have handled the rest of them?" And the old man went on and voted the rest of the session in the same way, and had all of his friends in Cincinnati do the same thing. What naturally results, therefore, is not only a great detriment to the cities, but also to the country, because it results in the system of trading votes. You vote for this bill which affects my city, and I will vote for something that you want. The result is you get a lot of confused laws on the statute books, obnoxious to the whole state, and probably most of them wrong in principle.

Mr. PRICE: I rise to a point of order. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KING: I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. CROSSER: I don't care to have it extended if any gentleman is tired of hearing what I have to say. The motion to extend was carried.

Mr. CROSSER: But I think the worst result of this centralized form of government which regulates cities from Columbus is that the people of the cities are left in a position where they have absolutely no control over their own destinies, and they are blamed for not taking an interest in the city government and for lacking in civic patriotism and righteousness. I tell you that the members of the legislature and of past constitutional conventions have been entirely responsible for that condition. Does it lie in our mouths to say that the people of Cincinnati or Cleveland or Columbus have been derelict in their duties when really they have had no control over their affairs at all? In order to stir up civic pride and political activity must there not be placed some feeling of responsibility upon the people of the municipalities? At present all they do practically is to vote for a mayor and councilmen occasionally, and then the mayor and councilmen are herded in by a lot of legal restrictions which say what they shall do or shall not do. Put the power in the hands of the municipalities so that they can govern themselves, and they will have no such excuse. They will know then that whatever ills they suffer are due to their own neglect, but at the present time they can conscientiously say that it is not their fault, that they have no control over their own destinies, and that is the reason I was so much opposed to the amendment offered by my friend, Mr. Anderson, this morning, which struck out really what seems to me to be the very thing we have been striving for. If this proposal is passed in its present condition, all we can get is a right to own a few more public utilities than we now own. I think I can prove that this is true. What is there to stop the state of Ohio, as the proposal now stands, from passing a general law saying that every policeman employed by any municipality in the state shall get $50 a month, no more and no less? Would not that be a general law? Certainly it would be so construed. Suppose the state should go farther and say, there is a civil service regulation which shall affect every public officer in the state of Ohio and the employment of every public officer in the state of Ohio, would not that be a general law? Couldn't they pass such a law? I cannot see it otherwise.

Municipal Home Rule.

So I feel about cutting out the words "affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." If you have that language in the proposal you are certain that a regulation passed by the city of Cleveland in regard to a local condition would not be one that affected the general welfare of the state of Ohio, but as it now stands you can pass such a regulation and the legislature can nullify it so that home rule is destroyed. I propose therefore to offer an amendment a little different in language, but which is the original language of Professor Hatton, contained in the proposal of Mr. FitzSimons, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the word "laws" in line 18 strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following: "but such regulations shall be subject to the general laws of the state, except in municipal affairs". In line 49 after the word "laws" strike out the period, insert a comma and "except in municipal affairs."

Mr. CROSSER: It seems to me that if we are to have any home rule whatever we should have some language of that kind in the proposal. Personally I have no objection to striking out the matter relating to liquor. I have no patience with either side of that controversy. I have a contempt for those who can see nothing else in all the deliberations of this body but the wet and dry question. It seems to me the principle of self-government is ten times more important than this wet and dry question, which is eternally being flaunted here every time any kind of question is brought up. Let us be broader. Let us give citizens by the initiative and referendum real self-government, and let us also give the municipalities real self-government. We have already given the women the right of self-government. Now, let us go a little further. Let us strike the shackles of political serfdom from municipalities.

Mr. KNIGHT: I offer a substitute for the amendment just offered.

The substitute was read as follows:

"Amend the amendment to Proposal No. 272 by substituting the following: In line 16 strike out the word "power" and in lieu thereof insert the word "authority to exercise all powers of local self-government, and".

Mr. KNIGHT: That substitute just read undertakes, and I think succeeds, to cover the same thing intended by the amendment of the gentleman from Cuyahoga and avoids the phrase "in municipal affairs". These words were given a very careful research by Judge Worthington, and they constitute a phrase which has been given varied interpretation by the courts of California, where the very same words are used in a provision with reference to municipal home rule. I regret that the report which Judge Worthington made of his examination, and which he brought before the committee, is not available at the moment, but it became entirely obvious to the committee at that time that the words "in municipal affairs" were not susceptible of a single definite and unvarying interpretation, and that at least in one case the court in California, composed of seven judges, differed very widely on it. Three of them held that the term "municipal affairs" meant one thing, three others held that it meant something else and the seventh judge differed from the other six, which seems to be fairly good evidence that the phrase was not a definite and certain one.

The substitute I offer places in section 3 the same phrase that occurs in section 7. It is already in section 7. Section 7 deals with those cities which choose to frame charters for themselves, while section 3 deals with the municipalities which choose to remain under general laws, and this puts both kinds of municipalities upon the same footing, so that those who shall operate under general laws shall have authority to exercise all powers of local self-government, and enact and enforce within their limits such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. The same provision is in section 7, with reference to charters of cities framing their own charters, that any city or village may frame, adopt or amend a charter for its government, and exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government, but all such charters and power shall be subject to general laws. We have here identically the same provision. The language may vary a word or two, but it does not vary at all in sense or substance. It is my belief that the insertion of these words restores to section 3 a vital feature which was by the last action of this Convention before recess today stricken out; that is, in our effort to get away from the question which I am certain we all want to get away from, a good deal more was stricken out than was helpful to municipal home rule, and more than was intended, and it is with a view of restoring to the proposal that which ought to be there in our judgment, without breaking into anything which anybody can by any possibility term a sleeper.

Personally I feel that this goes far enough to give us in the cities of this state an adequate measure of municipal home rule, and that it does not in any way raise any controverted question such as we had the flurry over this morning. I am not attempting to insert anything except what is attempted to be accomplished by the amendment of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Crosser], but his amendment does contain language which the courts of California have held to be language of uncertain meaning.

Mr. DOTY: The gentleman's amendment has the first part of the Crosser amendment, but I want to ask the gentleman if that part of the Crosser amendment ought not to prevail in which he says that all such regulations shall be subject to the general laws of the state, except in municipal affairs?

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. KNIGHT: You have the wrong proposal. You must have the original proposal.

Mr. DOTY: No; I have not. I will read his amendment to get it straightened out. It would then read "But all such charters and powers shall be subject to general laws except in municipal affairs." Do you not think, while your amendment ought to prevail in place of Mr. Crosser's first amendment, that his second amendment ought to prevail, and if not, what is your view on that?

Mr. KNIGHT: I see no reason why it should go into section 7, unless there is a reason why it should go into section 3. The object of my amendment is to place all classes of municipalities, whether those which shall operate under general laws, or those which shall operate under additional laws, under section 2, or those which operate under charters, that they shall all be under the same provisions. Personally I feel that the provision now does accomplish all that it is necessary, or, in my judgment, that it is desirable to insert in the constitution on the subject of municipal home rule. I think it goes far enough to satisfy the most ardent homeruler, whose zeal for home rule does not run away with his judgment and discretion. I do not think, therefore, it is wise to insert language which the courts have held to be indefinite and uncertain and which is not capable of interpretation.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I understand that sometime yesterday I was called a radical homeruler. I am justified in saying, unless one of these amendments or some similar one is adopted, that this Convention is radically opposed to home rule. I hope the Convention will adopt the Crosser or the Knight amendment. I prefer Mr. Crosser's, although Mr. Knight's will give local power of self-government.

In section 7 it is provided that "Any city or village may frame, adopt or amend a charter for its government, and may exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government," etc. The action of the Convention therefore makes even the adoption of a city charter subject to general state laws. This is all wrong. Suppose, for example, that the legislature by undue and evil influence might say that there shall be no commission form of government in Ohio for cities. Even if some of the cities might want a commission form of government, the state could forbid them under this proposal as it now stands. The real fact, I think, is, and if you will study it you will agree with me, that you have gone too far in changing this proposal. There is nothing under the proposal now to give a city any home rule. There is no matter upon which the legislature might not pass a law, and prevent the city from legislating along the same line. The city would be blocked by the general act of the legislature. So I hope you will do something to relieve the situation, because some relief should be given.

Mr. ANDERSON: Personally I am in favor of the fullest home rule for the cities of Ohio, but I do not want so much home rule for the cities of Ohio that they may nullify a work that we have already done in reference to the licensing of intoxicating beverages. The court of California may have differed as to the interpretation of the words that were offered here in the proposal as sent down from the committee at Cleveland, but be that as it may, the supreme court of California has agreed in reference to the fact that if the proposed amendment of Mr. Crosser, or that for which Mr. Smith is contending, is put into Proposal No. 272, it will give to each municipality absolute authority to do absolutely as it pleases with reference to all the things concerning the regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. They can abolish it, they can give it a degree of prohibition or they can regulate it in any way that they please, and I have the authority here in my hand. I found it by an examination of Mr. Harris' brief. It is 155 California, page 304.

Mr. FACKLER: What is the provision of the constitution of California with reference to the liquor traffic?

Mr. ANDERSON: I waited and allowed the discussion to proceed. I really tried to inform myself on the situation, so that I might be understood. The home rule proposition is in the constitution of California, and it is in there in practically the same language as suggested by Mr. Smith and by Mr. Crosser, and by the language employed before we struck out part of Proposal No. 272.

Mr. FACKLER: Was there any general law in the state of California that conflicted with the authority attempted to be exercised under the home rule provision?

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not know; nor do you.

Mr. FACKLER: Is it not a fact that your case would not be in point unless there were such a law?

Mr. ANDERSON: Absolutely in point, because the court in this volume holds that by reason of the constitution of California giving municipalities home rule such as you want to give, no matter what law they have passed, each municipality may do as it pleases in reference to the liquor traffic.

Mr. FACKLER: That could only be done in case there was not a general law, and that would not be a case in point unless you can say that there was an absence of a liquor provision in the state of California.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am stating it awkwardly. I mean this, largely following the logic and the words of the supreme court report: The constitution of California gave to each city certain rights. Therefore, that municipality could do as it pleased, in introducing an ordinance to throw out or to allow the uncontrolled sale of liquor within the bounds of the municipality. It could license any saloon at any place. An attempt there was made to license a business club to sell intoxicating liquors. I believe the Knight amendment preserves home rule in its purity, and therefore—and in this I believe Professor Knight will agree with me—there is no need of going any further, except to obey the demands of the "wet" lobby. I want to say that the liquor proposal, Proposal No. 151, has met with praise all over the state of Ohio, with the exception of two classes—first, the third party, the prohibitionists, and second, the foreign brewery representatives. The report from the home counties to the delegates is that there has been nothing but praise for that proposal, and what is the use of allowing it to be nullified? What is the use of trying to permit, as I am beginning to believe Mr. Smith, of Hamilton, is attempting, the wet lobby of the foreign brewery representatives to have what they want? I am afraid that the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. SMITH] is more in favor of the brewery than he is in favor of home rule. I am only influenced by the evidence. I may be mistaken, but it does seem strange that when the brewers have anything they want done here, any kind of amendment to Proposal No. 151, it comes in from the same delegate and the same city, and we have it from the mouth of the chairman of the committee that all amendments that were made in the committee to amend this home rule proposition to let the brewery have its sway came from Cincinnati. Because I am in favor of home rule in its purity, I am in favor of the Knight amendment, and because I am opposed to having a collateral attack made upon Proposal No. 151, I am opposed to the Crosser amendment.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. PETTIT: It seems there are certain gentlemen, who in the discussion of this question are very fearful that the whisky question will be lugged in. Who has lugged it in, I would like to know? The same slimy serpent that has been here all the time, wriggling around among the members of the Convention. A gentleman from Cuyahoga came to me this morning, because he knew I was a dry, and asked me to see that this provision, limiting section 3 was stricken out. He was willing that that matter should be stricken out.

Mr. DOTY: What part was that?

Mr. PETTIT: About the welfare of the state as a whole.

Mr. DOTY: What gentleman was that?

Mr. PETTIT: Mr. Fackler. I will name him. He didn't want the whisky question brought in here. He said he was satisfied if those words were stricken out.

Mr. FACKLER: Yes.

Mr. PETTIT: Well, why have you changed?

Mr. FACKLER: Mr. Knight has pointed out the reason. If section 3 is changed as we have changed it, and section 7 is left alone, under section 3 municipal corporations which do not adopt charters are left in the same position as now.

Mr. PETTIT: That is not the reason. I tell you you were not in good faith when you voted for the amendment. I came to you and cautioned you—

Mr. KNIGHT: A point of order. I think this unseemly discussion is out of order.

Mr. PETTIT: Now you are satisfied with the amendment offered by Mr. Knight.

Mr. FACKLER: I am.

Mr. PETTIT: Mr. Crosser is not.

Mr. CROSSER: Mine was in first.

Mr. PETTIT: You are trying to lug in what we struck out this morning. I see through it all. This is very much favored by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. SMITH]. He is one who gave notice of an amendment to Proposal No. 151. He tried to cram that down the throats of the Convention, and he saw he couldn't do it and withdrew it, and now he is trying to lug this thing in here, and as long as you let this thing bob up we will be ready to hit it. Why do you not enforce your law against the saloons? You can shut them up, but you won't do it. If you would shut them up you wouldn't have to have so many police regulations, and wouldn't have to have half as many evils as you have now, and you wouldn't have to have half as many workhouses.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I rise to a point of personal privilege.

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order. I think this matter should be confined to the question before us.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I was out of my seat and I heard my name mentioned on the floor of the Convention, and I want the privilege of making a statement. When a man finds that he has no argument—

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has not stated any question of privilege yet. He has to state that first.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Don't you know it?

Mr. DOTY: No; I do not.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I was going to say when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory] that when a man fails to find any sound arguments for his cause he descends to insinuation and innuendo. Now, the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] virtually accuses me of representing specifically the liquor lobby in this Convention. That insinuation is absolutely false. It is only due to the Convention and to myself to say this. I am strongly in favor of a proper license provision, but am not fighting for home rule because of any profit the liquor interests may get out of it, but for the reasons that I have tried to state to the Convention. I believe the Convention understands my strong convictions. I want the cities of our state to be free to work out their destinies. I am president of an organization composed of thirty-five local welfare and civic organizations, organized to discuss and handle for the people of the city the big problems of government that come up in Cincinnati. This organization, called The Federated Improvement Association of Hamilton county, has gone on record in favor of home rule. So I am here striving to secure for them and for all the people of Ohio a reasonable provision for the self-government of cities.

Mr. WINN: I would like to ask the member from Hamilton [Mr. SMITH] a question: If you could have your way about it, you would prefer to have this proposition so written that each municipality could have absolute power to determine for itself all questions respecting the sale of intoxicating liquors, would you not?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: No; I am not prepared to say that. What I do believe and have already said is that the cities themselves are best able to solve the great problems arising in the city. Only one of these problems is the abuse of the liquor traffic and its remedy. You must admit that our present methods have not been so successful that it might not be a wise plan to give to cities some measure of control over the situation themselves.

Mr. PETTIT: You think they cannot have home rule unless they are entitled to control the whisky question?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: No, sir; that is a mere incident in my mind. I believe the city should have some measure of control over that business in the city, but I have many bigger questions than that in my mind. When I speak of home rule the liquor question is never a part of it. For one thing, I think of public ownership of public utilities. For another, I think of the advantage of letting a city decide its own form of charter.

Mr. PETTIT: But you only pander to that element whenever they get scared and demand something of you?

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: You may think so; I do not. As I said before cities have many problems. The liquor question is only one of many. I trust the Convention will not be fooled and allow this kind of talk to cloud the important issue under discussion.

Mr. FESS: On the fourth day of our session I introduced a proposal designed to give home rule to cities. It is one of the questions that is of interest to me, and has been for a great many months, if not years. I do not want to speak to the amendment that is pending, but I would like to speak briefly in regard to the principle of home rule. Here is a proposal that has come in after a long and elaborate study, both by men who are experts along the line of local self-government and men in the committee. I have understood that committee held many, many meetings and the matter was threshed out very thoroughly, and I have wondered whether when the proposal has come, consisting of twelve articles, if we are not likely in our enthusiasm upon the police power in the proposal to lose sight of the thing we are trying to get here. I am wondering whether the most important thing we have is this section 3 and part of section 7. I believe that we should keep in mind the eighty-two cities which will fall under this proposal, and which may utilize it to get what this Convention wants to give them.

I think every man here would like to have the city have the power to organize itself with the power of determining its functions. We would like to have the administrative functions not disturbed in this state house or interfered with by exterior power from the cities. It seems to me that what we are concerned about is that each city may determine its own powers of government and powers of administration. In trying to reach that we have a long proposal that is somewhat legislative, and on that score there will be some objection, but at the same time it will appear that this is the best thing that can be done. This has been a work of collaboration that represents no political party, that represents no city, that represents no industry or interest, that represents no locality, but represents our state; and being a representative proposal, with no particular or local interest in it, it merely gives to every city in this state what other cities in other states have profited by. That being the case, I appeal to you not to lose the main thing we are trying to get here. I do not want to minimize the importance of this amendment. I do not want to say that any amendment is offered to defeat the proposal. I believe the amendments are being offered to clarify the proposal, and thus far we have profited by the discussion of the amendments, but I would hate, in our efforts to get what the cities of the state ought to have, to do something that would be a detriment to the proposal. This is the police power you are discussing. It is an important part of it, but the most important part is the right of the city to govern itself. The police power exercised by the city is of less importance. It is true that the greatest problem our state has ever had has been its federal relations, its relations with the power of the government at Washington. Now the same thing is true in Ohio, there is a conflict between the cities and the state and between the cities and the counties.

Therefore, in this proposal, while we recognize the authority of the state in matters pertaining to the general welfare, in school legislation, in sanitation, in the police power that you are now discussing, while we recognize that, we do not want to give the state the power to nullify the power of the cities, nor to allow the city to nullify the power of the state. That is our problem. It is the biggest one we shall have, and I appeal to the men here, let us not jeopardize the larger interests of the government of the city by our fears that something we are constructing will ultimately defeat the regulations that we insert, and it seems to me that the amendment of Professor Knight will cover it all, and without any conflict. As I recall that amendment it provides authority in the city to exercise local self-government, subject, however, to general laws. It seems to me that that covers the whole thing.

Mr. DOTY: How about section 7?

Mr. FESS: That is one of the important sections which gives a right to the city to frame its own charter.

Mr. DOTY: How about the Crosser amendment?

Mr. FESS: The only thing I fear about that is the phrase "except in municipal affairs." Does not that open the door too wide? I would vote for that as a last thing, but I prefer Professor Knight's amendment. We have suffered so very much from being controlled by power in the state house here that it seems to me we ought not to allow those other matters to jeopardize this larger purpose. Therefore, I am going to vote for the amendment of Professor Knight in the hope that it will carry, and it seems to me there will be no suffering either on the part of the city or the state. Let us not jeopardize this very important proposal for self-government by some fear of something that nobody understands.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I sincerely hope the Convention will adopt Professor Knight's amendment rather than the amendment by Mr. Crosser. I believe the amendment of Mr. Knight will cover, so far as can be covered, that which was unintentionally cut out of section 3 this morning.

I hold in my hand some papers taken from the desk of Judge Worthington. There are forty-five decisions by the supreme court of California in their efforts to interpret the four words "except in municipal affairs" which the committee absolutely refused to insert in its proposal. Every member of the committee knows how thoroughly that was discussed. It is inviting lawsuits and litigation for construction of every function of municipal government, and it is most unwise to incorporate it in our proposal. Section 3, as amended by Professor Knight, has this further advantage, that it will agree with the phraseology in section 7, because he has used the exact words, to-wit, "may exercise thereunder the powers of local self-government."

Now, I maintain that there is nothing in this proposal which means to give, or ever was intended to give, a charter-governed city any greater power or authority than a municipality organized and working under the general or special laws. Consequently, when you limit the phraseology in section 3 and in section 7, and make it exactly the same, you are conferring a distinct public benefit. You are removing a great many possible cases for interpretation by the supreme court. I thoroughly coincide with my distinguished predecessor from Greene, who always speaks well and intelligently. We must not lose sight of the general scope of the proposal for the mere egotism of words, and I trust that the amendment offered by Professor Knight will be accepted, and that then the proposal as a whole will be adopted by the Convention.

Mr. WINN: I shall not ask very much time. If any amendment is adopted, I favor the amendment of the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT], and it seems to me that if section 7 can be amended so as to make it harmonize with section 3, we shall have accomplished all that any of us who are deeply interested in local self-government for municipalities could ask. Of course, this proposal, after having eliminated from its provisions those parts that were taken out this forenoon, is still a long way in advance of the existing constitution and statutes. It does not, of course, go as far as those gentlemen who believe, as some do, in local self-government to its fullest extent, would ask. I would amend section 7, and I take the floor for the purpose of making this suggestion. We can study about it a minute. If we adopt the substitute amendment of the member from Franklin, and then make this amendment to section 7, it seems to me it will make the two harmonize:

Strike out all of section 7 and insert the following:

SECTION 7. Any city or village may frame and adopt a charter for its government and may subject to the provisions of section 3 of this article exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government.

Now cut out everything that is left in that section respecting conflict of laws, "but all such charters and powers shall be subject to general laws affecting the welfare of the state as a whole." That can all be stricken out if we say that section 7 is subject to the provisions of section 3.

Mr. KNIGHT: Are you aware that the last nine words of section 7 are eliminated?

Mr. WINN: Take it all out after the word "government." Leave the municipality under a charter to exercise absolute self-government, subject only to the restrictions under section 3. What objection could there be to that? It looks to me as though that gives all that is asked for.

Mr. CROSSER: You don't mean to cut out the word "amend". Sometimes they want to amend.

Mr. WINN: I did cut that out accidentally, but I can add it. I hope the amendment of Professor Knight may be adopted after which I will offer that.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] was agreed to.

Mr. WINN: Now I offer this amendment:

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of section 7 and insert the following:

SECTION 7. Any city or village may frame and adopt or amend a charter for its government and may subject to the provisions of section 3 of this article exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOTY: We have not adopted the substitute offered by the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT].

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir.

Mr. DOTY: The question is on that.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment by way of substitute to an amendment of the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT].

The substitute was agreed to.

Mr. WINN: Now I offer an amendment to correct the phraseology in another part of the proposal.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of section 4 to and including the word "service" in line 26 and insert the following:

SECTION 4. Any municipality may, for the purpose of supplying the product or service thereof to the municipality or its inhabitants, acquire, construct, own, lease and operate, within or without its corporate limits, any public utility; and may contract with others for any such product or service.

Mr. WINN: Under the provisions of section 4, as now written, a municipality may contract for the purchase of a public utility provided the product of such public utility is at the time of purchase supplied to the inhabitants of the city or village. If it is a city or village that has no such service, it is not permitted, under section 4, to acquire the public utility of that sort. This is designed to broaden the terms of that to extend it to any municipality, whether the municipality has the public utility or not, and it may proceed to acquire one. It makes it possible to have just what was intended.

A vote being taken, the president announced that it seemed to be carried.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I think that is a very important amendment, and I do not think an amendment of that kind ought to be rushed through without the Convention understanding the scope of it.

Mr. DOTY: In order to bring it before the Convention, I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. WINN: Let me explain a little bit further. If the members will turn to their books and read section 4, you will see the importance of it: "Any municipality may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility the product or service of which is supplied to the municipality or its inhabitants." That seems that unless the utility is supplying at that time its product to the municipality the municipality cannot acquire it. I suggested that amendment to Professor Knight last night, and he said, that "is or is to be supplied" would remedy it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Would not the purpose you seek to cover be entirely secured by inserting the words in line 25 "which is or may be supplied"?

Mr. WINN: I thought about that seriously, and if I were not particular about the use of the English language I would have put it in that way, but the more I have studied it the more I have thought it was bad English, and I attempted to say it with the better English.

Mr. FACKLER: Do you think it is possible under the construction of your amendment that a municipality would not have authority to acquire a public utility if it were already a public utility supplying service, inasmuch as you say it "may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility"?

Mr. WINN: Certainly not. I offered that to cure what I say is a defect in this.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I say that the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] misunderstood me if he understood me to say that the language of his amendment would cover the matter. I distinctly said that the words "is or is to be" should be inserted, but he misunderstood me very clearly if he understands me to approve the language of the amendment which he now proposes.

Mr. WINN: With the consent of the Convention I will withdraw the amendment. I do not care a snap about it myself.

Mr. FITZSIMONS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I suppose there is nothing that is good in this world that comes into it without having a price and I take it that Proposal No. 272, which was brought into you here, has paid the price of wanting to come into actual use. For the last thirty years I have been looking forward to the day when the people in our municipalities might have the right to govern themselves in their own way, at their own pleasure, in their own time, at their own cost, with due respect for the rights of everything that belongs to the great commonwealth of Ohio. I am pleased to see the disposition shown here to grant to the municipalities of Ohio the privileges that have been accorded to municipalities of Great Britain for thirty years. It shows that we are marching, probably not up in the front rank, but in motion, and when the American people get into motion on any subject they are not long in the rear.

The municipalities of Ireland, that are only subjects of Great Britain, not sovereigns as we are, not kings twice a year, not exercising sovereign prerogatives individually as we are, have the right to serve themselves municipally in everything that may tend to their own benefit. I speak of the Irish municipalities for this reason: We are apt to look upon them as only subjects of Great Britain, but they have their own electric railroads and they have a multiplicity of services they render themselves.

When John Burns was in this country some days ago he was then representing Battersee in the London council. He told me that the county council had taken up the work of reclaiming the slums of Battersee, and in the place of slums they were erecting modern tenement houses with every convenience and utility attached to them. They were renting these to the people of the locality at a price way below what those unfortunates had been called upon to pay for the slums that they occupied. He said to me the rent they pay for these tenements is capable in every way of meeting all the running expenses of the plant and creating enough in the sinking fund to eventually liquidate the indebtedness. That all sounded well to me. I was glad to hear it, but when John Burns went to the limit of the proposition and when I asked him if he thought it would pay—I was only asking him from the American standpoint at the time—I said, "Burns, will it pay?" He said, "Yes, it will pay, but if it does not pay in pounds, shillings and pence, it will pay in this way: It will not cost as much to police those people under the conditions in which they are living now as formerly, for, remember, you can not rear men and women in the slums and have them of any account."

That, my friends, was the foundation principle that permeated them. That is the principle that should permeate us. I can take you to municipalities in the state of Ohio and show you divisions between families in their rooms that have no more resistance than a chalk line on the floor, and how do you expect to rear people that we should be proud of on that basis?

In Glasgow they have gone further. There they own their own slaughter houses. They can afford a premium for choice cattle and butcher them at their slaughter houses and put them in cold storage and sell them to the people at the cost of the service. How could the Beef Trust get their hooks into those people under those circumstances? Even in our cities the trusts have got control of the fish product that we tax ourselves to plant in Lake Erie. They got so arbitrary that they told our fishermen what they should pay and what the consumers should pay. The city took things into their own hands and put up a city dock where the fishermen could bring their fish, and the fishermen got more for their fish than they formerly did from the trust, while the people who were buying the fish are paying only about thirty per cent of what they paid formerly. It shows that with our congested population we have to get away from certain policies that we have been pursuing for years up to the present time. Anything that will tend for the betterment or elevation of the human family should have our best efforts. Gentlemen, from this time forth in this country it is to be men, not dollars. It has come to that. We have tried the other god. We have tried the dollar for a god, and while he is a handy first lieutenant, he is an awful unreliable god.

Now there is no use continuing on this proposition. The work is done, but in conclusion let me say, let at every point our efforts be to secure to the mass of the people, those who through stress of circumstances have not the ability, haven't the disposition and haven't the time to be eternally looking out for self—let us take their task in hand, and let us to the extent of our limited ability do everything in our power to uplift and bring up the column, not to get in advance of it and leave them behind, but to bring the column up so that when all are there, there will be no man or woman or child in this country who will have any plausible, reasonable or logical excuse for being helpless. Our natural resources are ample to meet everything. All that is needed is a change of front on our part and the job is done.

Fundamentally the American is right at heart, but in the past he has been looking out for himself. When the army shouts "Save yourselves," they are ready for the enemy's cavalry and when the cavalry gets in among the infantry there is mischief to pay. I have seen it when the officials of private interests have got up and told me in public that it was cheaper to buy officials than to deal fairly with the people. My friends, when we have gotten to that low level it stands us to take an account with ourselves, and the way to do that is to remove temptation, quit eternally fighting among ourselves and keep the other man from preying on our necessity. I do not care how the interests may come in conflict, the people are the ultimate sufferers. It is up to us; let us enlarge our ability to help ourselves, and the generations that will follow us will call us blessed.

Mr. FESS: I move the previous question.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. DOTY: You can vote it down.

Mr. HALFHILL: Some of us would like to be heard on the matter.

The motion for the previous question was lost.

Mr. HOSKINS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the word "municipality" in line 46 insert: "A municipality owning or operating a public utility shall not sell its service or product at less than the cost thereof."

Mr. HOSKINS: I am offering that amendment solely upon my own authority and without any suggestion or solicitation. It presents a phase of this question that I am satisfied has not been considered by this Convention. If I read this proposal right, there is absolutely no limit on the cost at which the municipality may furnish its service, and there should be such a limitation. I am heartily in favor of municipal ownership of public utilities in a general way and I desire to vote for this proposal, but there ought to be limitations upon the sale of the product so that the product can not be sold at less than cost. There is a reason for that. For instance, a municipality undertakes to acquire and operate an electric light plant. They will have a right to do it under this proposal. Electricity is a commodity that will be produced by the public utility and it will be used by a certain percentage of the citizens, while a large percentage of the citizens will probably continue to use a cheaper method of illumination than electricity. Now if the municipality is permitted to furnish the current at less than the cost of it, the common taxpayer bears part of the burden of the man who is getting the electricity at less than it costs. That cost can always be determined. In my judgment, you will find that we are not going to have the millennium right away. You will still have politics in the management of your public utilities, and you will still have boards of administration who will want to make a showing to other boards of administration, and they will undertake to reduce the cost of their product or reduce the price of their product to secure a favorable comparison. The municipality ought not by reducing to a price below the cost put a new burden on the common taxpayer. That is my idea of it. There ought to be a limitation upon the sale of the product so that it could not be sold at less than cost.

Mr. FACKLER: That would enable the private lighting company doing business in a city which had a municipal lighting plant to put the municipal plant out of business, would it not, by lowering the price below the cost temporarily for the purpose of driving the municipal plant out of business?

Mr. HOSKINS: Well, reverse the rule—

Mr. FACKLER: Is not that the fact?

Mr. HOSKINS: Not necessarily so, and I do not think it would do that. Now let us reverse the rule and put the other proposition. If the municipality undertook to operate and came in competition with a private company that may be operated they would at the expense of the taxpayer drive out or destroy the public utility that was thus being operated.

Mr. DOTY: In all your knowledge and experience have you ever heard of a public ever treating a privately owned utility in the fashion you are now describing? Did it ever happen?

Mr. HOSKINS: I do not know. I am not making a plea from that standpoint.

Mr. DOTY: You are making a plea from the standpoint that the public might do it?

Mr. HOSKINS: That has been done ten thousand times.

Mr. DOTY: Name one. It never happened once.

Mr. HOSKINS: That is an all-fired, broad assertion.

Mr. DOTY: If you know ten thousand just name us one.

Mr. HOSKINS: I have in view one instance that you don't know anything about, but I do. A company went into a city and put in a utility after they had been invited by the city council to come there and put it in, because the opposition public utility was not furnishing the service which should be furnished.

Mr. DOTY: A public utility?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Publicly operated?

Mr. HOSKINS: Sit down—keep your seat. Mr. President, I object; somebody from Cuyahoga county is disturbing the proceedings with his mouth.

Mr. DOTY: I am not disturbing you.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Auglaize [Mr. Hoskins] has the floor.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to give you this instance, if you will just shut your trap. This private company, operating what would be a public utility under this proposal, was invited to come there and invest its money for its own private benefit. The investment was made under the ordinance of the city council. Two or three years passed and one night a reform wave came in all at once, and without warning and without notice and without any indication that they were going to make that bid for public approval, they reduced the right of the operating company.

Mr. DOTY: That doesn't answer my question at all. I knew you couldn't.

Mr. HOSKINS: All right; if it doesn't, keep still.

Mr. FACKLER: I would like to know where that was.

Mr. HOSKINS: Come to me privately and I will tell you.

Mr. DOTY: Sure, sure.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to be understood on this. I am not making this plea, but I believe this proposition is one that the committee has never considered, and without putting this limitation upon the price you are opening up a road by which the ordinary people may be charged greatly by furnishing the commodity at less than the cost of manufacture. You know what may happen in one of these reforms and where one administration wants to make a showing for itself, and you know that in circumstances like that the loss through operating and selling the commodity at less than the cost price would fall on the common people. Now I say this is entirely my own idea of the matter, but I believe a limitation of that matter ought to be incorporated here at the end of line 46.

Municipal Home Rule.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It is sometimes difficult to understand the psychology of things and persons and I know the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] is a staunch home rule man. I know his sincerity and his truth, and knowing all those things I can not understand how his mind can frame the features which are embodied in his amendment. This is absolutely denying the right to the municipality to own or operate its utility. Just stop and consider for a moment. How many injunctions would be filed against the public utility from time to time to determine the cost of that utility's service? How many factors do you suppose would be considered by the attorneys for the complainants in determining the cost of that product? It has absolutely no standing in this proposal. While it is new to him, I will say for his benefit that that very proposal was handed to me as chairman of the committee, and I told the gentleman who handed it to me—he was not a member of this Convention—that I had too much respect for the intelligence of the least intelligent of my committee to even submit it to the committee.

Mr. CROSSER: Do you object to telling who handed it to you?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes; there is no occasion for bringing in personal names. There is one thing the students of history have remarked, and that is the public morality of any community is not immensely higher than the individual morality. When you say a municipality may reduce the price of a product below the cost of production for the purpose of bankrupting some corporation, you are assuming the lowest type of public morality, that public morality which is indulged in by the unscrupulous private corporation, but never by the community as a whole. You are impugning the morality and sense of fairness of the people. I think that this amendment needs no discussion and needs no consideration and the kindest fate I can offer it is to move that it be placed on the table.

The motion to table was carried.

Mr. PIERCE: I wish to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After section 6, insert the following, which shall be known as section 7, and all sections thereafter of Proposal No. 272 shall be renumbered:

SECTION 7. Any municipal corporation is hereby vested with authority to create by its legislative body a city planning commission with authority to prepare plans for the future development of such city and to change, alter and reestablish any part of the existing plat or plan of such city by laying out streets, avenues, alleys, parks, boulevards and other public ways and places within such city and also within limits not exceeding three miles from the existing corporation lines at the time of the adoption of such plan. Such commission may lay out a city plan in whole or in part and may add to, change or alter the city plan from time to time as desirable, but all plans, additions, alterations and changes shall be subject to adoption as herein provided. Any plan proposed by such commission, if adopted at a general election by a majority of the electors, shall constitute an established city plan, and the city shall thereafter be surveyed, laid out and developed in strict accordance with such plan, and all owners of land must conform thereto.

In order to fulfill its powers such commission shall have authority to condemn property; to enter upon property for the purpose of making surveys and plans upon payment of any damages it may cause, and any person claiming to have suffered damages by reason of the plan adopted and followed by such city may be awarded damages by the commission to be paid by the municipality; and if damages can not be agreed upon such person shall have a right of action against the municipality and such commission to establish his damages. All expenses of such commission shall be provided for by the legislative body of the city.

Mr. PIERCE: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I introduce this amendment at the request of the chamber of commerce of my own town. It has been gone over by attorneys there and other citizens and they asked to have it incorporated in the municipal proposal or adopted as a separate proposal, as I could get it. I find that the time is up for separate proposals, so this is the only time I can possibly get it in. I want to say that my amendment does not change the pending proposal in any way. It takes nothing from it, and, so far as I am able to see, there is no reason why any member of the Convention should oppose the addition.

It gives the legislative body of a city authority to create what is known as a planning commission, which will deal with the future growth and development of the city. At present there is no beauty, symmetry or system attempted in the development of cities. Everything is left to chance and accident. Consequently, as the city grows and develops by patches, instead of a thing of beauty it resembles a crazy-quilt.

One party lays out an addition outside the corporate limits, without any reference whatever to any other part of the municipality and as the city grows it is compelled to take in the addition with all its defects and deformities. No regard perhaps is paid to the width of the streets, the size and depths of the lots, parks, drive-ways, boulevards and other necessary details, all of which add to the beauty and permanent welfare of the city. Under such hodge-podge arrangements the city is finally put to great expense and inconvenience in curing the defects; whereas, if it had had control over the matter when the addition was platted, it could have directed the owner how it had to be done and thereby have saved the taxpayers an enormous amount of money.

I am informed there are a number of planning commissions in some of the German cities and in a few cities of this country. It is important that the legislative authority of a city have control over this, because if additions to cities are left entirely to the owners, they try to coin them into dollars for themselves without regard to the future welfare and development of the city. As cities increase in population, to conserve the health and morals of children there is almost a universal demand, at the present time, for parks and playgrounds, all of which may be provided at a minimum cost to the city when the addition is platted into lots. It enables a city to provide for its future growth along definite lines. It enables a city to provide for parks, avenues and boulevards by reason of natural conditions, without being compelled later to acquire them after the enhancement of the value of property. It enables the commission to lay out in an orderly and well-defined manner future additions to the city, instead of waiting until its natural beauty and symmetry have been destroyed. It requires both time and money to change the plan after it has been adopted. The time to do it is before it has been adopted by the city.

According to this plan, a city may be developed along intelligent and progressive lines and home-seekers can determine the locality in which to acquire property, as it will give them an idea of its future surroundings. It enables the city to control its own development without being left at the mercy of those trying to get all possible out of their additions without regard to the beauty and future prosperity of the city. The plan proposed is not compulsory. It must first be approved by a majority vote of the people of the city and then it is up to the legislative body whether it shall carry it into effect or not. All will admit that cities should be developed to bring forth the beauty and utility of their natural situation—parks along rivers, boulevards and driveways along natural ridges and avenues to connect important centers of development. This may all be done by fore-ordained plans with little expense, whereas if it is not done at the proper time, it entails an enormous expense upon the city. The changes must be finally made or the public must always suffer for want of a little care and foresight.

Mr. ANDERSON: If we had had this kind of a provision either in the constitution or law of Ohio it would have prevented the high cost of extending many of the streets in the cities.

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not true that at the present time where properties are platted very little attention is paid to the streets that exist at the time?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: And this would correct all of that evil?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: In other words, it would give a system for our streets in advance?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes; it would prevent conditions like that Mr. Doty talked about and all future conditions like that, and instead of a city becoming a crazy-quilt it would have some uniformity.

Mr. DWYER: Under this could any private owner lay out a plat without getting permission from a municipality?

Mr. PIERCE: If anybody contemplated laying a plat out outside of the city limits he would have to go to the city authorities.

Mr. DWYER: Within the three-mile limits?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to ask a question and my question does not imply that I am opposed to this idea. On the contrary, I think some of it is good. But are you of the opinion there is anything in the way at present of this very thing being provided for—assuming that this proposal is now adopted, have we anything that we couldn't have now? Is there anything in it that is not purely statutory?

Mr. PIERCE: Really, I do not know that there is anything in it except what is purely statutory. I know those having the matter in charge went over it carefully and they were of the opinion that we ought to have constitutional authority; that the legislature could not deal wholly with the question. That was their opinion. Whether that opinion was well founded or not, I am unable to say.

Mr. CROSSER: I have always had the highest regard for anything that comes from the gentleman from Butler [Mr. PIERCE], but there is no question that the authority he grants is fully granted in other sections, and I therefore move to lay this on the table.

Mr. HALFHILL: I think it is very evident, after listening to the excellent exposition of this proposal by Professor Knight, Mr. Harris, chairman, and some others of the committee, that we all have reached the conclusion that they have thoroughly considered and canvassed the question of municipal government. Also, listening to the earnest speech of the proposer [Mr. FITZSIMONS] we realize he has to an unusual degree knowledge of certain sociological conditions in the great centers of population. I think I am as much in favor of local self-government of cities as any man can possibly be, but I want to confess to you that it was a great surprise to me when this proposal came before the Convention. I always supposed, from the consideration I had given this subject, that we could readily and easily grant a large measure of power to the cities by adding a very few words to the existing constitution; and by adding these that we would follow the well-accepted canons of constitutional law. Now, in order to make myself plain, I want to read for the information of the Convention, and if I have an opportunity I desire to offer it at the proper time as an amendment providing what has always seemed to me to be the correct remedy for these evils we now admit exist so far as governing the municipalities is concerned:

Strike out all after the word "follows" in line 3 and substitute the following:

"Municipal corporations are hereby classified into cities and villages. All such corporations having a population of five thousand or over shall be cities, all others shall be villages, and the method of transition from one class to another shall be regulated by law.

The general assembly shall provide for the organization of cities, and incorporated villages by general laws and restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts and loaning their credit, so as to prevent the abuse of such power.

Provided, that subject to general laws affecting the welfare of the state as a whole, any city or village may frame, adopt or amend a charter for its government, and may exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government, which charter or amendment shall become operative when affirmed by a majority of the electors of such municipality voting thereon. Laws shall be passed to make effective the privilege of local self-government for municipalities subject to the foregoing restrictions.

The adoption of the foregoing shall operate to repeal section six (6) article thirteen (13) of the the constitution."

In order to make myself plain on the limitations expressed in that proposition, I desire to call attention to the three provisions of the constitution which would be virtually amended or supplemented if this substitute were passed — in other words, the three provisions of the constitution which now govern and control us in the organization and government of the municipality, namely, article XIII, section 1:

The general assembly shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers.

Article XIII, section 6:

The general assembly shall provide for the organization of cities, and incorporated villages, by general laws, and restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts and loaning their credit, so as to prevent the abuse of such power.

Article II, section 26:

All laws, of a general nature, shall have a uniform operation throughout the state; nor, shall any act, except such as relates to public schools, be passed to take effect upon the approval of any other authority than the general assembly, except, as otherwise provided in this constitution.

As has been referred to here in debate, it is a well-known fact that from the time of the adoption of the existing constitution in Ohio and up to the year of 1902, both the legislative branch and the judicial branch of our state government found it necessary, in order to meet and solve a situation that was presented in the government of municipalities, to give effect to special laws, and that condition was supposed to be so imperative that we have a great number of decisions of the supreme court of Ohio which held that the condition that confronted us in the government of cities could only be met by special laws. Now I call attention as a matter of interest on that point to one or two decisions of our court. You will find in a case reported in 44 O. S., page 139, the State ex rel. Attorney General v. Hudson, as a part of the opinion of the learned judge, the following words supported by authority cited:

Each of the large cities seems to need peculiar legislation, which can be provided only by such general classification. The peace and prosperity of these cities, and the best interests of the state, require that this system of classification be regarded as stare decisis and settled. See Rev. Stat., p 1546. Under the power to organize cities and villages (Const., art. XIII, sec. 6) the general assembly is authorized to classify municipal corporations, and an act relating to any such class may be one of a general nature. See State v. Covington, 20 O. S. 102; State v. Mitchell, 31, O. S. 592; State v. Brewster, 39 O. S. 653, 658.

Recently this court, without a dissent, reaffirmed this principle in the case of Alice D. Scheer v. The City of Cincinnati, on error to the superior court of Cincinnati (15 Week. L. Bull. 66), which case was not reported. In that case the court held to be constitutional the act of April 24, 1885 (82 O. L. 156, sec. 2293a), providing for improving the streets of Cincinnati.

By the same principles and holdings, the act in question here, by the provisions of which Hudson was appointed to his office and now holds and exercises the same, is also constitutional, as not inhibited by section 26 of article II, or section 1 of article XIII, of the constitution.

That was a well-expressed opinion of the existing rule a good many times before that announced by the courts, and a number of times subsequently announced by the court up until the year 1902, when the whole of the former decisions were overturned and we came back to the hard rule of the constitution. That was all well said by the supreme court in the syllabus of the case reported in 66 O. S. 440, where the court held in the case of the City of Cincinnati v. Trustees of the Cincinnati Hospital that the conferring of such power (meaning general power) by a special act is inhibited.

So all of that went out of existence and was overturned by that decision and two others of equal import, which are also reported in the same volume, 66 O. S.

Now we have come to the time where we can get a remedy for an evil that has confronted us, by changing the organic law, and the change that I thought would meet all of the requirements is set forth in this amendment I have read to you. All the rest that is offered here is legislation. I submit if you give full power of local self-government by virtue of a special charter which can be created under act of the very community which is to be governed thereby, you have conferred everything that anybody can ask, in so far as the government of that local community is concerned.

Now I fear and believe that in this proposal as it is before you for consideration, there are vast powers which will eventually lead to a great deal of trouble in the state of Ohio and a great deal of conflict between the cities and the state. I think some of them have been cured by amendments, but I want to call attention to the fact that with the single exception cited of the experiment in the state of California, which has not yet had time to really work out so that we can know what the result will be, there is not another constitution in these United States, or, so far as I know, in any of the English possessions, that has any such theory of municipal or local self-government as is put into this proposal. You have cured it in some respects, but in many it is not cured. Here is the idea that obtains everywhere, so far as municipal corporations are concerned, which I want to state accurately as a legal proposition:

A municipal corporation is a legal institution formed by charter from a sovereign power, erecting a populous community or prescribed area into a body politic and corporate with corporate name and continuous succession, and for the purpose and with the authority of subordinate self-government and improvement and local administration of affairs of state.

The whole theory of the existence of sovereignty in the first instance, to-wit, the state that we are dealing with here, is that it must be greater in all essential particulars, greater in all essential parts than the municipality, and none of you will deny the fact that there are a number of very essential particulars that the state must insist upon and must assert at all times against the municipality.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Are not those very propositions which you have enumerated made fundamental in this proposal?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not consider that they are, and the reason I do not consider that they are is that I understood from the very first, even from the exposition of the chairman of the committee and of the others that have talked representing the committee, that all power except in these very few essential things is conferred in the first instance upon the municipality, and the state can never take that power back except as it goes out and asserts itself and attempts to bring it back by a general law. That is the theory of it, and that is a theory that is absolutely opposed to a logical and well-reasoned idea of a municipal charter, and right upon that point and right at that place I predict there will be conflict between the jurisdiction of the state of Ohio and a jurisdiction that is conferred upon the municipalities which will result in multitudinous litigation in Ohio, because you have changed the theory, absolutely changed the theory of the creation of this power.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will you state for the information of myself as well as the Convention what general power outside of the great powers of taxation and police and health are — what general great fundamental powers are exercised by the state?

Mr. HALFHILL: One of the fundamental powers exercised by the state is police power.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I named that. Are not all the great fundamental powers reserved to the state in the proposal?

Mr. HALFHILL: What line?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Every line.

Mr. HALFHILL: Where is the line of demarkation that is preserved in this proposal? Wherein is there not abundant opportunity for conflict between the powers conferred upon the municipality and the power that ought to be reserved for the state? I submit that the opportunity for conflict in jurisdiction is there.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is indefinite. Point it out.

Mr. HALFHILL: You have in the police power such a multitude of items to be considered, as applied to our complex state society, that you do not know at what place there will be a conflict. Some of the conflicts have been pointed out here, notably control of the liquor traffic. At one time they almost wrecked the proposal, but happily that was averted.

It is incumbent upon the state at all times to enforce the laws of a state and to stand back of the laws. The state is greater than any county or municipality. The state must enforce the decrees of the courts. That is why the cannons are planted on the court house lawns and state house campus, a silent admonition that all the force of the state stands ready to back the courts and enforce the laws. In this exercise of the police power of the state is interested at all times and there is a broad and plain line of demarkation between its powers and those that should be conferred upon a municipality.

In the great question of education, in the police power and in all the great questions that could be enumerated, the city can not at any time be greater than the state and it can not be put upon a parity with the state in the exercise of these sovereign powers. Now the power to limit indebtedness is plainly provided for in any proposal, which I shall seek to substitute for the one that is offered here. I have heard it argued here, possibly not in debate, but by the most ardent homerulers, that the state had no interest in limiting the amount of the indebtedness of a city; that that was a problem of the city and for the city and that the city should be permitted to incur any indebtedness it thought necessary or beneficial. Along the same line of argument when you take away the power of the state to control in that respect, if you follow it up you would find that it was no use to have anything like organized society so far as the state is concerned, and if you would follow it to its logical conclusion you would find that men who contend for that, contend that a constitution is not necessary. They contend that the right of each community to govern itself is supreme. Now I contend that a municipality is simply one agency of a state to discharge some of the functions of government, and a municipal charter can emanate only from the sovereign power which alone can delegate faculties and functions of government, and as heretofore considered, with the single exception of the recent experiment in California, the granting of such a charter is solely an act of sovereign legislative powers to be exercised by the general assembly under grant of authority in the organic laws.

Now, for the reason that I believe that this proposal is fraught with a great deal of difficulty in the future, and that it means conflict between the powers that are granted to the cities and the powers that are retained by the state, I am opposed to it if I can get anything better. I favor the very greatest measure of self-government for cities. I feel that the city ought to have power to control the municipal public utilities of the city and that the city ought to have the settlement of the problems that confront the city if it so desires, but at the same time I believe that we ought to have over it the controlling hand of the state to a much greater degree and with the lines much better marked than in this proposal. Therefore, without further taking the time of the Convention, I now want to offer this substitute and secure a vote on it.

The amendment was read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. HALFHILL: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 77, nays 27, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	DeFrees,	Harbarger,
Baum,	Donahay,	Harris, Ashtabula,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 272—Mr. FitzSimons. To submit an amendment to the constitution.—Relative to the government of municipalities.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE XVIII.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS

SECTION 1. Municipal corporations are hereby classified into cities and villages. All such corporations having a population of 5,000 or over shall be cities; all others shall be villages. The method of transition from one class to the other shall be regulated by law.

SECTION 2. The general assembly shall, by general laws, provide for the incorporation and government of cities and villages; and it may also enact additional laws for the government of municipalities adopting the same; but no such additional law shall become operative in any municipality until it shall have been submitted to the electors thereof, and affirmed by a majority of those voting thereon, under regulations to be established by law.

SECTION 3. Municipalities shall have authority to exercise all powers of local self-government and to enact and enforce within their limits such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as are not in conflict with general laws.

SECTION 4. Any municipality may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility the product or service of which is supplied to the municipality or its inhabitants, and may contract with others for any such product or service. The acquisition of any such public utility may be by condemnation or otherwise, and a municipality may acquire thereby the use of or full title to the property and franchise of any company or person supplying to the municipality or its inhabitants the service or product of any such utility.

SECTION 5. Any municipality proceeding to acquire, construct, own, lease or operate a public utility or to contract with any person or company therefor shall act by ordinance and no such ordinance shall take effect until after thirty days from its passage. If within said thirty days a petition signed by ten per centum of the electors of the municipality shall be filed with the executive authority thereof demanding a referendum on such ordinance it shall not take effect until submitted to the electors and approved by a majority of those voting thereon. The submission of any such question shall be governed by all the provisions of section 8 of this article as to the submission of the question of choosing a charter commission.

SECTION 6. Any municipality, owning or operating a public utility for the purpose of supplying the service or product thereof to the municipality or its inhabitants, may also sell and deliver to others any transportation service of such utility and the surplus product of any other utility in an amount not exceeding in either case fifty per centum of the total service or product supplied by such utility within the municipality.

Municipal Home Rule.

SECTION 7. Any city or village may frame and adopt or amend a charter for its government and may, subject to the provisions of section 3 of this article, exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government.

SECTION 8. The legislative authority of any city or village may by a two-thirds vote of its members, and upon petition of ten per centum of the electors shall forthwith, provide by ordinance for the submission to the electors of the question "Shall a commission be chosen to frame a charter." The ordinance providing for the submission of such question shall require that it be submitted to the electors at the next regular municipal election if one shall occur not less than sixty nor more than one hundred and twenty days after its passage; otherwise it shall provide for the submission of the question at a special election to be called and held within the time aforesaid. The ballot containing such question shall bear no party designation and provisions shall be made thereon for the election from the municipality at large of fifteen electors thereof who shall constitute a commission to frame a charter; provided that a majority of the electors voting on such question shall have voted in the affirmative. Any charter so framed shall be submitted to the electors of the municipality at an election to be held at a time fixed by the charter commission and within one year from the date of its election, provisions for which shall be made by the legislative authority of the municipality in so far as not prescribed by general law. Not less than thirty days prior to such election the clerk of the municipality shall mail a copy of the proposed charter to each elector whose name appears upon the poll or registration books of the last regular or general election held therein. If such proposed charter is approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon it shall become the charter of such municipality at the time fixed therein.

SECTION 9. Amendments to any charter framed and adopted as herein provided may be submitted to the electors of a municipality by a two-thirds vote of the legislative authority thereof, and shall be submitted by such legislative authority when a petition setting forth any such proposed amendment and signed by ten per centum of the electors of the municipality is filed therewith. The submission of proposed amendments to the electors shall be governed by the requirements of section 8 as to the submission of the question of choosing a charter commission; and copies of proposed amendments shall be mailed to the electors as hereinbefore provided for copies of a proposed charter. If any amendment so submitted is approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon, it shall become a part of the charter of the municipality. A copy of said charter or any amendment thereto, within thirty days after adoption by a referendum vote, shall be certified to the secretary of state.

SECTION 10. A municipality appropriating or otherwise acquiring property for public use may in furtherance of such public use appropriate or acquire an excess over that actually to be occupied by the improvement and may sell such excess with such restrictions as shall be appropriate to preserve the improvement made. Bonds may be issued to supply the funds in whole or in part to pay for the excess property so appropriated or otherwise acquired but said bonds shall be a lien only against the property so acquired for the improvement and excess, and they shall not be a liability of the municipality nor be included in any limitation of the bonded indebtedness of such municipality prescribed by law.

SECTION 10-a. Any municipality appropriating private property for a public improvement may provide money therefor in part by assessments upon benefited property not in excess of the special benefits conferred upon such property by the improvements. Said assessments, however, upon all the abutting, adjacent, and other property in the district benefited, shall in no case be levied for more than fifty per centum of the cost of such appropriation.

SECTION 11. Any municipality which acquires, constructs or extends any public utility and desires to raise money for such purposes may issue mortgage bonds therefor beyond the general limit of bonded indebtedness prescribed by law; provided, that such mortgage bonds issued beyond the general limit of bonded indebtedness prescribed by law shall not impose any liability upon such municipality but shall be secured only upon the property and revenues of such public utility, including a franchise stating the terms upon which, in case of foreclosure, the purchaser may operate the same, which franchise shall in no case extend for a longer period than twenty years from the date of the sale of such utility and franchise on foreclosure.

SECTION 12. The general assembly shall have authority to limit the power of municipalities to levy taxes and incur debts for local purposes and may require reports from municipalities as to their financial condition and transactions, in such form as may be provided by law, and may provide for the examination of the vouchers, books and accounts of all municipal authorities, or of public undertakings conducted by such authorities.

SECTION 13. All elections and submissions of questions provided for in this article shall be conducted by the election authorities prescribed by general law. The percentage of electors signing any petition provided for herein shall be based upon the total vote cast at the last preceding general municipal election.

Municipal Home Rule.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. PECK: I want to explain my vote. I vote for this proposal because as I understand it, after considerable study, it contains what seems to be in an awkward, confused way the main proposition that cities shall have the right of local self-government. I regard it as not a very good piece of constitution building, because it is overloaded with details and it is not clear in its provision. I would very much have preferred Mr. Halfhill's substitute with some amendment. I think that could have been made the basis for a much better law.

Mr. DOTY: I move that two thousand copies of Proposal No. 272 be printed for use of the members and for general distribution.

Mr. HALFHILL: I desire to say I voted in the affirmative for this proposal because I could not get anything better.

Mr. DOTY: That is the reason I voted for it.

The motion to print was carried.

Leave of absence was granted Mr. Harter, of Huron.

Mr. WATSON: I move that we recess until 7:30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. ROEHM: I move that we adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

The motion to adjourn was carried and the Convention adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

SIXTH-SIXTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, May 1, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president, and opened with prayer by the Rev. William H. Woodring, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Peters rose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on the motion to lay the amendment of Mr. King to Proposal No. 272 on the table.

Consent was given, and his name being called Mr. Peters voted in the affirmative.

Mr. PECK: I would like to have permission at this time to offer two reports from the committee on Judiciary.

By unanimous consent Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 333—Mr. Peck, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends its passage.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

By unanimous consent Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 334—Mr. Jones, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

In line 6 strike out the word "apparent."

Strike out lines 7 and 8 and the first nine words in line 9 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"or other claims and interests in and to the lands the titles to which are so registered, insured, or guaranteed, and for the creation and collection of guaranty funds by fees to be assessed against lands, the titles to which are registered."

In line 11 after the word "recorders" insert the words "or other officers."

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Peck the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The PRESIDENT: The next order of business is second reading of proposals.

Proposal No. 329—Mr. Knight, was read the second time.

Mr. KNIGHT: I shall take about ten minutes to explain the history and the intent of this proposal. In the original Proposal No. 272, upon which we acted yesterday, section 4, as introduced, proposed to confer upon all cities in the state practically sufficient power as cities over educational matters to make a very serious inroad upon the general system of education throughout the state. As a matter of fact, a considerable number, if not a majority of the municipalities, do not have boundaries coincident with the boundaries of school districts, and consequently to confer upon the municipalities as such this power that was proposed in section 4 of that original proposal would have been fatal, or at least the committee on Education, and from the very start a number of the committee on Municipal Government, believed it would have been fatal, to any great public school system in the state of Ohio. At the same time, however, it was and is recognized that there is a great need that city schools of the state, the independent school districts and other school districts shall have the right to determine for themselves the number of members of the district school boards and the organization of the boards, not, however—

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: This says "section 3." Will this be an additional section?

Mr. KNIGHT: I will come to that in a moment. I am explaining the original proposal now. It is desirable that the school districts shall have the right to determine for themselves the number of members of their school boards, without in any way permitting their power to be independent, but leaving them subject to the general educational system of the state. By a conference between the Education committee and the committee on Municipal Government the agreement was reached that the old section 4 of Mr. FitzSimons' proposal should be dropped out entirely and that this proposal should be introduced here. It merely happens to bear the name of the present speaker. It might just as well bear the name of any other member of the Education committee, as it was ordered by them.

The proposal undertakes to add a section to the present article on the subject of education, which is article VI of the constitution, and to do two things, both of which the committee on Education thinks desirable:

1. In its first three lines it provides that the general assembly shall by law provide for the organization, administration and control of the public school and educational system of the state. It specifically lodges all the power in the lawmaking body of the state to organize, administer and control the educational system of the state. Desirable as this was prior to four o'clock yesterday, it is even more desirable this morning that it should be enacted. This Convention in the judgment of a good many members hastily and unwisely adopted a complete new substitute for section 7, in lieu of the one threshed out for months in the Municipal Government committee, and one of the guarding clauses of section 7 does not appear in the proposal as adopted yesterday, and it is altogether questionable whether under the proposal adopted any city having a charter for itself might not arrogate complete control over the educational system, and deprive the state of jurisdiction over educational matters in the city. It is a matter of great regret that the Convention, in one of those lapses which often happen, should have adopted without debate and without consideration a hastily prepared amendment, when the original section in the proposal was much better than the one adopted. In view of that, whatever else happens to this proposal, the first three lines must be adopted in order to establish definitely that the state shall for all time, until the constitution is further amended, have complete control over the educational system, and that no city, village or part of territory of the state can withdraw itself, under the guise of a charter, from the public educational system of the state. So much for the first part of the proposal.

2. The second part of the proposal wants to do what is practically and subsequently necessary for the jurisdiction of the various districts of the state in order to prevent, or in order to break down, what now exists, the apparent necessity for the same sized school board for all districts, regardless of the number of schools, the amount of money and, generally, the machinery of organization. Therefore, the latter part of the proposal undertakes to embody what was the substantial undertaking between the two large committees on Municipal Government and Education. It says that each school district within the state shall have the power by referendum vote to determine for itself the number of members and the organization of the district board of education. This in no wise touches the power of the district over the school affairs. It matters not what form or size the school board is, the power of that school board over school matters would be just the same throughout the state, and preserve the educational system of the state. Then there is a further clause, that the lawmaking power — the general assembly — shall make provision for the exercise of this right. It was not deemed necessary or advisable to undertake to provide in any such proposal as this the machinery by which the thing undertaken to be accomplished here shall be worked out. As long as the first part of the proposal places in the hands of the lawmaking body of the state the complete power over the educational system, it is certainly wise and safe to leave them to enact legislation necessary to provide for the referendum vote. That is all in the proposal, a unified control over the educational system of the state in the hands of the lawmaking body representing the whole of the state, with the privilege of the school districts of the state to modify or change the size of the organization of their school board as may be suited to their local conditions. I hope the proposal will pass. I think it has merit. I speak not because my name is at the head of the proposal, but simply as one interested in school affairs.

Mr. PETTIT: I was absent when action on the substitute for section 7 was taken, and I desire to ask whether, in your opinion, the substitution of that matter interfered with the school matter?

Mr. KNIGHT: In section 7?

Mr. PETTIT: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: As I said a moment ago, in the judgment of some of us the new section 7, which now appears in the proposal adopted yesterday, is at least open to a construction which might permit municipalities to do the very thing which everybody interested in education in the state does not want them to do, and it is not necessary to municipal home rule. Beyond that I do not care to go into section 7 of yesterday's proposal.

Mr. PETTIT: If that is your opinion, why not reconsider that?

Mr. DOTY: I desire to offer an amendment to Proposal No. 329, correcting the wording.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 8 strike out "The general assembly shall make" and insert after "provision" the following: "shall be made by law."

Mr. KNIGHT: I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: What do you consider a school district?

Mr. KNIGHT: The township is a unit.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Then under this proposal we could go back to the local directors for each district?

Mr. KNIGHT: I suppose it is possible, but I doubt whether in the present state of enlightenment in the state of Ohio there is any desire to go back to that, or that there will be any danger of going back. That was threshed out in the committee, and we thought that while there was power to do so, there was no probability of its being done.

Mr. HALFHILL: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 6 strike out the colon, and insert a period, and commencing with the word "provided" in line 6 strike out all the rest of the proposal and the amendment thereto.

Mr. HALFHILL: Up to the point indicated the proposal is all right, but I think the rest of the proposal has no place in the constitutional law of this state, and does not coordinate with sections 1 and 2 of article VI.

It was the policy of those who established the educational system in the state of Ohio to make some very particular restrictions and provisions in relation thereto, and it seems to me that the educational system of the state, so far as the government in districts is concerned, ought to be left with the general assembly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I trust the Convention will not adopt the amendment of the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL]. In some of the cities the school board proposition is a very serious one. They have been clamoring for authority to regulate the size of their school board. Under the present law in cities containing over 50,000 inhabitants, the size of their school board can be regulated, providing the existing boards of education are willing to vote themselves out of office. We have that state of affairs in Cincinnati and in some of the other large cities in the state. The larger boards in the city refuse to vote themselves out of office, and this proposal now affords us an opportunity to remedy that condition. In Cincinnati we have thirty-three members.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is not that within the absolute control of the legislature?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is so. The legislature could remedy it, but there is always enough influence brought to bear to prevent the legislature from making it mandatory. I speak to you of a condition that exists. Mr. Beatty informs me that there was a great effort to accomplish this very change in the legislature three years ago and it failed, and I know how serious that condition is in many of the larger cities. The committee on Municipal Government struck out section 4 entirely, as it came out from Cleveland, for good and sufficient reasons not necessary to be discussed here, but it was done unanimously, with an agreement of the committee on Education that they would attempt, so far as lay in their power, to remedy the defect by introducing a proposal covering the points named in this one. We have had considerable legislative enactment in many proposals, and there is a sound reason for doing so. You need not fear the criticism that will be raised on this proposition. It has been pointed out by the greatest publicists in this and other countries that the reason for putting legislative matters in the constitution in all the states of the United States—and it is not a matter of recent growth, but it has been developing during fifty years—is based on the fear of the people of undue influence that is brought to bear on the legislature. So certain broad fundamental matters, as we call them, or rather what might be termed statutory laws, that are far-reaching in their consequences are being incorporated by the states as part of their constitutions, this departure being based on lack of confidence in the legislature. I sincerely trust that this Convention will accept the proposal as it came from Professor Knight, with the grammatical amendment offered by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty].

Organization of Boards of Education.

Mr. WINN: Do I understand you to concede that the legislature has full power to do what is sought to be done here as to the number of members?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Unquestionably, and I concede it and I submit to the Convention that when there is a question of sound public policy, as in this instance, there is no valid reason for refusing to make it constitutional just as we incorporated legislative provisions in other proposals.

Mr. WINN: This is one of the matters you are not willing to leave to the legislature?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: From my point of view, yes.

Mr. WINN: You made a very able speech a few days ago deploring our doing anything that the legislature could do. What influenced you to change your mind?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not bow to the correctness of your memory. I have advocated many things legislative in character that should have been, ought to have been, and have been adopted by the Convention as part of the constitution. We have a proposal from the Judiciary committee in which many legislative matters are involved. There is a proposal for the initiative and referendum in which many legislative matters are embodied. Yesterday we adopted by an overwhelming vote the report of the committee on home rule for cities, and there was legislative matter in that, and the question of consistency rests with you and not with me.

Mr. DOTY: If there is any question of government in this state that the people think they know how to take care of better than any other, it is the matter of the schools. Why we should start at this stage of the game to cut off the people from saying what kind of a board of education they should have in their community, is past my understanding. I can understand why the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] should introduce such an amendment, being not particularly in favor of allowing the people to attend to their own business, but why the rest of us should favor such an amendment I cannot see. Oh, Mr. Halfhill is not a reactionary. There are many more reactionary than Mr. Halfhill. Still, I will say for Mr. Halfhill he is just not actually ready at all times to allow the people to transact their own business in their own way. Now the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] has brought up the question of the right of the legislature at present to do what this proposal seeks to provide. I think the legislature has got as much power as ought to be granted here. There has been in the past ten years a continual effort to reform our local school laws. This demand has come from Cincinnati sometimes, and sometimes in spite of Cincinnati. It has come from Cleveland, sometimes, and sometimes not. And also from Toledo and other places. What the legislature attempted to do at one time was to pass a law which would allow, not the people of a school district, but the board of education of a school district, to say what kind of a board of education they should have. A perfectly preposterous situation; but the only thing they could do under the present constitution. Now that fits in with the notion, as I understand his notion, of the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL], that the people shall elect first somebody who shall say what the people shall do. This proposal does not do that. This proposal says that the people of a school district shall say whether they shall have a large or a small board, a board by districts or a board attached to any district. They could have a town meeting under this. Any way they cared to run the business of the board, or any way they cared to make a board, they themselves can decide, and if you go into these larger school districts with which I am acquainted, you will find that the people think they know more and in fact they do know more about their school affairs than they probably do of any other single function of their government, and to most of the people the board of education work is the most important and interesting function they have. Now we are up to the proposition of allowing them to do their own business, with a referendum on the thing that they know more about than anything else. And still I am not surprised at the action of the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL], but I am surprised that the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] did not at once move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] on the table, where it ought to go, but having made a speech, I do not like to make the motion myself.

Mr. ULMER: I move that the amendment offered by Mr. Halfhill be laid on the table.

Mr. HALFHILL: And I demand the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDENT: I have recognized the gentleman from Greene [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS: The situation that this proposal was designed to unravel was stated clearly by the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT]. When the home rule proposition for cities was brought to the attention of the committee on Education, there was one clause in it that did not seem to meet with the approval of the committee on Education, or at least that did not specialize. The subcommittee of the committee on Education was appointed to take the matter up with the Municipal committee, and after a hearing, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS], the committee omitted section 4, with the understanding that there would be a supplemental proposal offered by the committee on Education to fill in what section 4 of the municipal proposal was intended to do, and that is the reason why this proposal was agreed to be heard immediately after the proposal we disposed of yesterday. Now, I see that there is some fear that if you allow the school districts to name the number of its board by a referendum vote, there will be a lack of uniformity. That lack of uniformity can be just the same now as it can be under this proposal, for under the present law we have four classes of school districts, the city school district, the village school district, the township school district and the special school district.

Organization of Boards of Education.

Mr. HOSKINS: Would it not be possible that under the provisions of this proposal, instead of having four methods of governing the schools, just mentioned, we could have as many methods, with as many variations, as there are districts in the state?

Mr. FESS: No; we could have as many as the legislature prescribed. The legislature says that. We do not determine it.

Mr. HOSKINS: We can determine the number of members and the method of organization of the district boards?

Mr. FESS: But the district is defined.

Mr. HOSKINS: The method of organization?

Mr. FESS: Yes; as to the number, you could have as many as there are districts.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you think that would go any farther than to make a difference in the number?

Mr. FESS: The number and the organization and the method—

Mr. DOTY: And the election.

Mr. FESS: Yes, and election. We do not have any uniformity now. We have four classes of school districts, and the law says in school districts of fifty thousand inhabitants or over the number of the school board is not to be less than two nor more than five, and for cities of less than fifty thousand, it is not uniform. The city district is fixed. The number is seven. That is fixed by law. This simply supplements the municipal form of government for cities that would come in conflict with the state law. The member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] explained that. The municipal proposal simply applies to cities. Now, here are some school districts that may take in more than a city, and that municipal proposal cannot apply to them—absolutely impossible—and we wanted to supplement that so that the same privilege and principle involved in the proposal for municipalities could be utilized for the school districts. That is all there was in mind; nothing more.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: We have some uniformity throughout the country districts?

Mr. FESS: Yes.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: This would permit each township to name the number?

Mr. FESS: Yes. The thing that was in your mind that disturbed you was whether you might not change the unit, or have as many units as each district might want. That is not true. Under this proposal we could define the county as a unit if we wanted to. We can reach that by law. We can make the county the unit, or the township the unit instead of the county if we want to, but after that the number of members shall be left to each district, and also the organization.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Under organization, do you think that means management?

Mr. FESS: Oh, I don't think it would include that.

Mr. MILLER of Crawford: It has nothing to do with the technical education?

Mr. FESS: No, nor the employing of teachers. It is nothing in the world except to give the school district that might go beyond the city the right to govern itself, as we gave the right to the city yesterday. We could not put that in the proposal yesterday as originally written, and could not go out beyond the city. The question is, Do you want to carry the principle of home rule in education to cities, with these limitations, that you cannot do certain things?

For example—I might as well be absolutely plain—we would not want to apply the funds of a public school for sectarian purposes, and under the original plan that might have been done, and we did not want to do it. We wanted to drop the taxing power out of section 4 altogether and supplement it with this proposal.

Mr. ULMER: I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. PETTIT: I want to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the motion to table the amendment offered by the delegate from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL].

The motion was carried.

Mr. PETTIT: Now I want to ask a question of the gentleman who was last on the floor.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Mahoning is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON: I yield to the gentleman from Adams if he wants to ask a question.

Mr. PETTIT: Does he—

The PRESIDENT: The member from Mahoning has the floor.

Mr. PETTIT: He yielded the floor to me. I want to ask the gentleman from Greene [Mr. FESS] if this proposal goes far enough to include subdistricts?

Mr. FESS: The wording does not put in subdistricts. The question of districting will be left to the legislature. We do not define that.

Mr. ANDERSON: I offer an amendment.

Mr. HALFHILL: I asked for the yeas and nays on that motion to table my amendment.

Mr. KNIGHT: The gentleman had asked for the yeas and nays sometime back.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Lucas [Mr. ULMER] moved to table this amendment at a time when he did not have the floor. He made that motion, which was not in order, he not having the floor, and the member from Allen called for the yeas and nays on the motion to table his amendment. Then further remarks were proffered by various members, and the delegate from Lucas [Mr. ULMER] again moved to lay the amendment on the table, but this time he had recognition and was entitled to make the motion, and that motion was put and carried by a viva voce vote.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now, I want the yeas and nays on that proposition, and I ask that the vote by which that amendment was laid on the table be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member from Mahoning yield?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is that the vote be reconsidered by which that amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. FESS: No; the motion should be to take it from the table.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the amendment be taken from the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now I ask that the yeas and nays be taken on the motion to lay my amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DOTY: No; on the motion to lay it on the table.

The PRESIDENT: No. It was laid on the table, and now on motion it has been taken from the table.

Mr. DOTY: In order to clarify the situation I move that we lay that amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT: And on that the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 80, nays 19, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Harbarger,	Peck,

So the amendment was again tabled.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Mahoning now offers an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of line 5, strike out the word "of" and insert therefor "in and throughout."

Mr. ANDERSON: If the amendment is adopted it will then read, "The general assembly shall by law provide for the organization, administration and control of the public school and educational system in and throughout the state." I think that is a broader term.

Mr. WATSON: I move to lay that amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] still has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON: I believe that the delegates ought to be willing to give the educators who have made a life study of it that which they ask, provided we cannot see any harm in what they ask. We must remember that Dr. Fess and Professor Knight have given the best years of their life to study, and when we take into consideration their knowledge of law, acquired in off minutes, the great knowledge of law they have, what a wonderful knowledge they must have of education! I think this journal of the Constitutional Convention of 1912 must be wrong. I find that in article VI, page 51 in the book, there is no section 3. I know that the gentlemen who present a proposal would not make a mistake, and yet this is offered as an amendment to section 3.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: You stated that the school people of the state were in favor of this proposal. Do you know that they all are?

Mr. ANDERSON: Supposedly, but there may be some opposed.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I have a letter from the secretary of the school federation opposing this proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON: He is not a member of the Convention?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: They didn't think enough of him in his locality to send him here as a delegate.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: He was not a candidate. He had more important work.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WATSON: I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. KNIGHT: The amendment is not material either way. We used the word "of" thinking it applied to the public school system throughout the state. I do not believe the amendment offered improves it or hurts it in the least.

The PRESIDENT: The question is "Shall the amendment be laid on the table?"

The motion to table was carried.

Mr. DOTY: In the first amendment I made I overlooked the same trouble in another line. I now offer an amendment to cure that.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 4 strike out "The general assembly shall by law provide", and insert "Provision shall be made by law".

Organization of Boards of Education.

Mr. KNIGHT: In this instance no harm can be done by leaving the original form, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DOTY: Of course, if the other correction were made, this correction should be made. There can be no question about that. It starts wrong, and I don't see any reason why we should allow it to start wrong. If this section is adopted it is going to be construed in the light of what is being done. Every place that we have run across that, "the general assembly shall provide," we have changed the language to "provision shall be made by law." That has been done in the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not want to be insistent, but it seems to me there is such a thing as overdoing a good thing, and there is no question that if left as it stands here, you give the people under the initiative and referendum the right to enact laws in the same way. I do not think any harm can result, and I think it looks better.

Mr. PARTINGTON: This question was before the committee on Education, and was ordered by that committee previous to the changing of the FitzSimons' proposal. I see no need of this third section to article VI. The school federation of the state of Ohio stated to the committee on Education that they saw no reason why the provisions in the constitution should be changed as they relate to the common schools. It has been only a few years since the educational people of Ohio were clamoring for a reform in township boards of education. At that time we had three subdirectors, and each little subdistrict was a law unto itself, and the school people of Ohio took the matter to the legislature, and the law now provides that the township board of education shall be composed of five members. A great many of the school people of the state of Ohio believe that is progress, and if this amendment goes into the constitution and is carried, we will be retrograding in our township schools. This will enable a township to have one or even three directors in a subdistrict school. It is absolutely with the people, and you are putting a provision into the constitution that will enable every little subdivision in Ohio to go back and be a law unto itself, so far as it relates to the number and the organization of its school boards. The member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] said that the board of education so organized would have no power at all, outside of the mere number and the organization of the board.

It seems to me the amendment you have already voted down should have prevailed. I am unable to see how the first part of this surpasses in strength the power given to the legislature to act. In section 2 of this same article the general assembly is given power to provide for a thorough and efficient system of common schools throughout the state. That power is given now by our present constitution. There is no conflict with the municipal home rule proposal that this body passed yesterday, and I see no reason for this section 3. The people of a township should not go backward in their progress relating to the schools of the township. I do not believe there should be a provision in the constitution that will absolutely bar progress in a township. I hope the whole proposal will be voted down.

Mr. CROSSER: I think the amendment of my colleague [Mr. DOTY] should pass. Professor Knight says it does not hurt anything, but this sounds better. I think there might be some doubt if we were to use the words "general assembly" here as to whether the people could do it. I do not want any doubt left about the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIT: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Insert after the word "district" in line 6, the following: "or subdistrict".

Mr. PETTIT: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention. I cannot agree with the gentleman last on the floor. The little subdistricts have always been very dear to my heart. All the education I ever got from books I got in a subdistrict out in the country where the people under the old three-director system controlled their own schools. We speak about having progressed by appointing a board from the entire township. We have progressed as a crawfish progresses, backward. The township-five has not worked as satisfactorily as the old system. Very often the subdistricts have to take things that they do not want to take. Five men get together and parcel out the schools, and foist a teacher on one of the subdistricts that the district does not want. As far as I am concerned I believe in the old three-director system, and if we are giving the people a right to control their own affairs, why not give the subdistricts some rights the same as the township?

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to call your attention to the fact that the gentleman to my left, who spoke a few moments ago [Mr. PARTINGTON], seems to misunderstand or misreads the constitution as it now stands. The section he quotes does not put into the hands of the general assembly complete control over the school system. All it does say is that the school system shall provide funds, that there may be an adequate school system, but whether that school system shall be completely under the control of the state, or shall be parcelled out to different cities of the state, is nowhere provided in the present constitution, and it seems to me desirable that that should be specifically stated, so that there can be no question about the control of the school systems as well as the handling of the school funds.

As to the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Adams, I am distinctly opposed to it. The unit of our educational system is the school district, and not the subdistricts, and I move that that amendment be laid on the table.

The motion to table was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the passage of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted—yeas 91, nays 15, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 329—Mr. Knight. To submit an amendment to article VI, section 3, of the constitution.—Relative to organization of the boards of education in school districts.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 3. Provision shall be made by law for the organization, administration and control of the public school and educational system of the state; provided, that each school district shall have the power by referendum vote to determine for itself the number of members and the organization of the district board of education, and provision shall be made by law for the exercise of this power by the school districts.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. SOLETHER: I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. DOTY: The regular order.

The PRESIDENT: Will the member state the nature of the resolution.

Mr. SOLETHER: I have only introduced one proposal so far, and my voice has not been heard upon this floor before this time, and I now desire to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT: Has the gentleman unanimous consent?

Mr. DOTY: We don't care to agree until we find out what the resolution is.

DELEGATES: Agreed.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman can offer the resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 113:

WHEREAS, That in the course of human events the Lord God said, "It is not good that man should be alone, I will make an helpmeet for him;" and

WHEREAS, That one of our worthy and much respected members of this Convention has taken unto himself "an helpmeet"; therefore

Be it resolved by the Constitutional Convention, That we pause one minute in our deliberations in deference to the gentleman from Ashland, Mr. Fluke, and his happy bride.

DELEGATES: Speech.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Ashland [Mr. FLUKE] has the floor.

Mr. FLUKE: President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I appreciate the kindness you are showing me. Of course, I recognize the fact that the matter under discussion, while of a good deal of importance to me, has nothing whatever to do with the business of the Convention or with a constitution for the state of Ohio. At this time I can say to you that I appreciate very much your consideration and good will for my wife and for myself.

Mr. KING: I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution put on its passage.

The rules were suspended and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

The PRESIDENT: The next business in order is Proposal No. 170, a majority report and a minority report, which the secretary will read.

The reports were again read.

The PRESIDENT: The chair recognizes the gentleman from Portage [Mr. COLTON].

Mr. DOTY: Before the gentleman proceeds I desire to call attention to one matter. Technically we will be under the five-minute debate on this proposal at this stage. Unlimited debate would not come until this proposal has reached its second reading. I think it is understood that whatever is done at this time will practically be final, and I therefore move that so far as this debate is concerned this question shall be considered as if on second reading.

The motion was carried.

Mr. COLTON: Gentlemen of the Convention: The members of the Taxation committee, after having considered very carefully the large number of proposals presented to them, and after having discussed them all in the utmost amicability, decided upon one thing unanimously, and that was that they could not agree on the subject of taxation. Hence it is that you have before you this morning these two reports. I am sure that neither the majority of the committee nor the minority have any idea that they can present to the Convention a report which will pass the Convention without modification and considerable amendment. I understand that the question before us now is simply whether the minority report shall be substituted for the majority report, and that no amendments at present are in order.

It is essential, in order that we may discuss this question properly, that we should get a clear idea of the differences and similarities of the two reports, and I propose to go over them somewhat hastily. If I do not state the similarities and differences correctly, any member of the committee can correct me. I cannot go into the details as closely as perhaps might be desirable under certain conditions. If this discussion had occurred earlier in the session of this Convention, it would have furnished an excellent opportunity for one to branch out into certain discursive discussions, but time is now precious, and I shall seek to confine myself closely to the questions that are germane to this proposition.

In the first place, let us consider these things that I think are substantially the same in the two reports, those in which there may be slight differences, but in which the differences are not important.

In the first place, I should say that each of these reports is a substitute for the entire article on taxation. You will find these reports following Proposal No. 169 in your proposal book.

Section 1 of the majority report concerns the poll tax. The same idea is embodied in the minority report also, that there shall never be levied a poll tax. There are some differences in the wording, but they are not material. The majority report forbids the requiring of work on the roads, as required now. This, I believe, is not considered technically a poll tax. Under the law the enforcement of this is optional with the trustees of the townships and the councils of villages. It is only enforced where public sentiment favors it, and the law may be repealed if public sentiment is opposed to it. The minority report leaves this matter as it stands in the present constitution. I do not consider that this is a matter of serious difference, and the minority will not insist on the exact wording of section 1, as they have it.

Both reports provide for an inheritance tax. In the report of the minority the uniform rule of taxation, which I shall consider a little later, is retained, and hence it is necessary to be a little more specific in the provisions concerning the inheritance tax. If you will turn to section 8 of the minority report, you will find that we have written it out quite fully:

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value. A portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars in value may be exempted from such tax.

It was thought to be necessary to be so explicit in order to be sure to secure the end sought.

The next thing is the income tax. This is provided for in both reports, but in the report of the minority the provision about the income tax is written out more fully, so that a progressive income tax can be provided for.

Mr. DOTY: In your opinion the majority report provides sufficiently for a graduated income and inheritance tax?

Mr. COLTON: Yes. The majority report does not include the uniform rate of taxation, and the inheritance tax is sufficiently provided for in that report.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: As I understand, in the inheritance tax you provide for an exemption of $20,000. Is that an exemption to each heir or each estate?

Mr. COLTON: Each estate, not each heir.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: What is meant by the language: "A portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars in value may be exempted from such tax?"

Mr. COLTON: I do not know that I can make it any plainer than that language. Not exceeding $20,000 may be exempted from the estate, and the remainder must be taxed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The inheritance tax heretofore attempted has provided where the individual share exceeded such an amount it should be taxed.

Mr. COLTON: This is not worded in that way.

Mr. PARTINGTON: Would the general assembly have the right to make a difference where there was a direct heir, or where there was one or ten heirs, in the setting aside of that portion?

Mr. COLTON: No.

Mr. PARTINGTON: The legislature would not be empowered to do that under this provision?

Mr. COLTON: I think not, under this provision. Those are provisions in which the two reports concur, and I do not think it is necessary to go very carefully over those.

The separation of the local and state tax is another point in which the reports agree. You will find in the majority report that matter expressed in section 2, just before the conclusion of it. After having enumerated the various ways in which the state may raise revenue, it says finally, "or so many of the sources of revenue aforesaid as the general assembly may deem best." The same provision is in both reports and it does not constitute one of the differences upon which we shall decide which report shall constitute the basis for the work of the Convention.

Mr. PECK: Will you state what are the reasons for that language in line 14? We are entitled to know the reasons even if the committee does agree. The Convention may not agree with the committee.

Mr. COLTON: In the first place, since the state raises its tax as it does now, by assessment on the counties in proportion to valuation, there results a tendency for the various counties to depress the valuation of their property for the purpose of evading the state tax. For instance, a given county may assess property at a value one-third of its real value, and the rate of taxes may be three times as much as it ought to be, and thus the county collects the same tax, but it evades a part of the state tax, paying only one-third as much as it regularly would pay. Again, on account of the variation in the assessed valuation it is necessary to have a state board of equalization, and that board attempts to place the valuation of property in the different counties on the same basis. They are undertaking a work that no board of men working at the capital is equal to. They cannot do it satisfactorily. If we arrange it so that the state takes whatever tax it needs to obtain by assessment, by assessing each county in proportion to its expenditures, the state board of equalization will not be longer necessary.

Then there is another point. This method of collecting state tax tends to economy in the county. Each county will be assessed in proportion to its expenditures for the little balance of the state tax which it may be necessary to collect from the county, and the tendency is rather to economy than to extravagance in the management of county affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: The whole object of this is to eliminate the state tax?

Mr. COLTON: That is the final purpose we hope to attain. It does not at once eliminate the state tax. The tendency, however, is well marked in all the taxing authorities of the state, to eliminate the state tax finally, so far as the direct tax upon the property of the people is concerned.

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: Are you concluding your remarks on the elimination of the state tax?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: I want to ask a question upon that before you leave it. While both reports provide for the elimination of the state tax, is it not true that the minority report, if it should be adopted, has not made any provision for the university school fund, and therefore, there is a difference between the two reports on that important matter?

Mr. COLTON: I will speak about that later. Another difference is found in the fact that section 3 of the original article in our present constitution, referring to taxing banks, is entirely omitted from the majority report:

The general assembly shall provide, by law, for taxing the notes and bills discounted or purchased, moneys loaned, and all other property, effects, or dues, of every description, (without deduction) of all banks, now existing, or hereafter created, and of all bankers, so that all property employed in banking shall always bear a burden of taxation, equal to that imposed on the property of individuals.

It was thought by the committee that this section had become obsolete, banks being taxed by a different method, and it was entirely omitted from the majority report. When the minority came to discuss the matter, it was thought that if this constitution goes before the people, and this section is omitted, someone will say that they have omitted that section requiring that property of banks shall be taxed like the property of individuals, and they will be able to use that as a weapon in attacking this proposal. So the minority decided to retain the words "All property employed in banking, shall always bear a burden of taxation, equal to that imposed on the property of the individuals."

It is possible that does not mean very much, but to retain these lines will certainly remove a club from the hands of those who, if nothing is said on that subject, might use it to defeat the constitution.

The minority report retains the uniform rate of taxation on all property. The majority report provides for a kind of classification which I shall discuss more fully later. I need only mention that fact now.

The majority report provides for the exemption of municipal bonds, school bonds, etc., from taxation, just as our present constitution does. The minority report does not exempt bonds, and if it is adopted bonds will be placed on the duplicate as they were before the constitutional amendment of 1905 became effective.

Then in the minority report there is included a tax limit not stated in the majority report. It is provided in section 7 that the maximum rate of tax shall be that which is now designated in what is known as the one per cent tax law, one per cent with the possibility of one and one-half per cent under certain conditions. We are all familiar with that. This is not included in the report of the majority. The same section includes also a debt limit, which applies to counties, townships, villages and cities. I am not going to discuss now the correctness of the limits there designated. I call your attention simply to the fact that it provides a debt limit.

It also provides in the last clause, that "No indebtedness not payable out of current receipts shall hereafter be created, incurred, refunded, renewed, or extended, without at the same time a coincidental tax being levied, which shall be maintained sufficient to pay principle and interest at maturity."

Then in section 10, line 56 of the minority report, there is a provision that is not in the majority report: "Taxes may be imposed upon the production of coal, oil, gas, and other minerals." That is what is known as a production tax.

Now, with respect to section 2 of the majority report: "The general assembly shall provide for raising revenue for each year sufficient to pay the expenses of the state, the interest on the state debt, the state common school fund of not less than two dollars per capita of the school enumeration and the university fund of not less than seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be distributed between the state supported universities as may be provided by law." Here is a point of difference to which the gentleman from Cuyahoga, [Mr. Doty] called attention a while ago.

Our present constitution simply provides that the general assembly shall provide for raising revenue sufficient to pay the expenses of the state and interest on the state debt. Under that provision revenue has always been raised sufficient to provide for the common school fund and for the universities supported by the state. We thought we might, therefore, readily omit this from the constitution, since the power has been exercised under the present constitution, and since our paragraph is the same as the present constitution.

There is another point which I should mention. Notice that the minimum fund that shall be provided each year for the support of these state supported universities shall be $750,000. Now, while we are not in any way hostile to state supported universities, and are in favor of seeing them well supported, and desirous of seeing our state universities rank with the great universities of other states, we did not think we ought to provide in the constitution for a minimum sum of $750,000 yearly for the state supported universities, especially in view of the fact that they have never received from the state in any one year for their running expenses, and that is all that is included, more than $608,000. If I had the figures correct the sum named is almost $150,000 greater than the state supported universities have ever received in any one year. I don't say it is too great, but it is nearly $150,000 greater than they received in 1910. We thought that to put that provision into the constitution would, as in the other case to which I called attention, put a club into someone's hand with which to attack the taxation provision.

Mr. DOTY: Of course, you do not undertake to say that the $150,000 is a matter of principle?

Mr. COLTON: No.

Mr. DOTY: And you do know that the $750,000 was only put in tentatively for the consideration of the Convention and that the Convention could fix what it should be?

Taxation.

Mr. ANTRIM: Are we to understand that the schools referred to are the State University, and the school at Athens and the one at Oxford?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. ANTRIM: The normal schools are not included?

Mr. COLTON: The "State supported universities" would not include the normal schools.

Mr. ANTRIM: What was the object in omitting them?

Mr. COLTON: I do not know.

Mr. ANTRIM: Why put those universities in? Why not enumerate them all?

Mr. COLTON: They are not enumerated in the minority report. They are enumerated in the majority report, but are omitted from the minority report. The enumeration of the sources of revenue which the state may use is given in this section 2, but it is by no means complete, and it is possible that the enumeration of these particular sources of revenue to which the state may resort may be construed to exclude the state from resorting to other forms of revenue not mentioned here.

Now, I believe I have pointed out with sufficient fullness the respects in which the two reports agree and the respects in which they differ. Some differences are minor, and may not figure very largely in the preliminary discussions at least.

Now I want to call attention to the subject in general, more especially to the differences which exist between the two which may lead us to decide which one would form the best basis for our future work.

Mr. JONES: May I ask why in the minority report there was left out provision for taxing businesses and franchises?

Mr. COLTON: That is not in the present constitution, and we understood that the legislature had full power to do that.

Mr. JONES: That is not included in the minority report?

Mr. COLTON: No. It is in the majority report, but we did not insert it in the minority report, because we think the legislature has the power. That is a form of taxation already used.

Mr. JONES: Was the question raised in your committee that there was grave doubt as to the extent to which the rights and privileges of franchises may be taxed under the present constitution?

Mr. COLTON: I do not think it was. I am sure the minority would be glad to accept an amendment including those words, if necessary, because they are thoroughly in accord with the idea that that source of revenue should be used by the state.

Mr. OKEY: Do you think that under your minority report all classes of franchises would be taxed?

Mr. COLTON: I could not say, but I suppose they would. It was certainly intended it should be so.

Mr. HALFHILL: Does the minority report intend to preserve as a cardinal principle the uniform rule of valuation provided for in section 2 of article XII?

Mr. COLTON: That was our intention, that property should be valued according to its true value in money.

Mr. OKEY: In what way have you extended or helped business conditions in that regard?

Mr. COLTON: We have not changed the essential wording of the present constitution in that respect, although we have changed it slightly. Section 2, line 5, says "Property shall never be so classified as to permit taxes to be levied at different rates for different classes, but all real and personal property, tangible and intangible, shall be taxed by a uniform rule, according to its true value." This is somewhat different from the wording of the present constitution.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do any of these other things or items of property in any way bar the operation of the present constitutional provisions?

Mr. COLTON: I don't think so.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is there ample authority to reach everything that is in the minority report?

Mr. COLTON: We suppose so.

Mr. HALFHILL: Under the existing provisions?

Mr. COLTON: We suppose so.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then where have you helped it?

Mr. COLTON: None in that respect.

Mr. HALFHILL: Have you in any material respect improved upon the existing constitution, section 2, article XII?

Mr. COLTON: We have not improved upon it, except that we have restored bonds to taxation; it remains the same with that exception.

Mr. THOMAS: You have provided for income and inheritance taxes?

Mr. COLTON: Not in section 2.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It seems to me that the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] must have reference to excise taxes, as they are taxes imposed in Ohio, and have been accepted by judicial interpretation, and the query is, are they provided for in this minority report?

Mr. COLTON: We have not specifically designated excise taxes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The majority report seems to do that?

Mr. COLTON: The majority report does do that.

Mr. DOTY: If the gentleman will yield, I move that we recess until 1:30 o'clock this afternoon.

The motion was carried.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by the president, who immediately yielded the gavel to Mr. Cassidy.

Mr. SHAFFER: I demand a call of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: A call of the Convention has been demanded. The sergeant at arms will close the doors, and the secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Brown, Highland,	Jones,	Norris,
Brown, Lucas,	Keller,	Nye,
Campbell,	Kerr,	Okey,
Davio,	Lampson,	Price,
Dunn,	Longstreth,	Smith, Hamilton,
Evans,	Marriott,	Thomas,
Harris, Ashtabula,	Matthews,	Weybrecht,
Harter, Huron,	Miller, Crawford,	Worthington.
Harter, Stark,

The president announced that ninety-four members had answered to their names.

Taxation.

Mr. KERR: I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

Consideration of Proposal No. 170 was resumed, and the delegate from Portage [Mr. COLTON], having yielded the floor for a motion to recess, was again recognized.

Mr. COLTON: Before proceeding with my remarks, I wish to add a little to what I said this morning in reply to a question from the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] which may not have been understood by all the members of the Convention. The question was whether we intended to have our proposal cover the question of excise and franchise taxes completely. I want everyone to understand that we intend to cover that, that we are in favor of full taxation of franchises, and we want to have the constitution so written that excise taxes are permitted, and if the wording copied from the old constitution does not fully cover both of those sorts of taxes we shall accept an amendment to make it sufficiently explicit in that respect.

One other thing: I spoke about the debt limit and the tax limit. We incorporate in our minority report Proposal No. 309 by Dr. Brown of Highland, word for word, and in that proposal the debt limit and the tax limit are fixed. We expected Dr. Brown to be here to defend his proposal, which forms part of our report. Personally I do not swear by this debt limit at all, and I do not propose to discuss it in my talk this afternoon, but I believe it essential that a debt limit should be placed in the constitution, and especially do I believe that the tax rates should be limited in the constitution rather than by law.

It is scarcely necessary for me to say that modern government is a very expensive institution. It is evident that the expenses that are necessary to carry on modern government must come from contributions from its citizens. Thus far we are agreed, but when we reach the question of how those contributions shall be taken, how the tax burden shall be distributed over the population, we reach somewhat disputed questions. I may say that in the early history of the government contributions for the support of the government were taken in an arbitrary and even a forceable way, but in these modern times such methods are not countenanced, and we insist that taxes shall be required from the citizens in such way as to distribute the tax burdens as justly and as fairly as it is possible to distribute them.

Economists have stated two principles which they thought controlled the distribution of tax burdens. These principles attempt to outline a method by which approximate justice may be secured:

First, it was said that each citizen ought to contribute to the support of the government in proportion to the benefits he receives from the government, benefits of all kinds. This was the earliest proposition announced by economists for controlling the distribution of taxes. This proposition has been practically abandoned for the reason that it has been found practically impossible to determine what are the real benefits which different citizens receive from the government, so that we can not distribute the taxes in accordance with that principle.

The second principle, the more modern, and the one now practically universally accepted by economists, is the statement that each citizen should contribute to the expenses of government according to his ability or faculty. It assumes that communities or governments are associations of people for the common good, and that each ought to contribute toward the expenses of the government under which he lives in accordance with his ability to contribute.

Now there are two ways of determining ability to contribute to the expenses of government which may be determined. One of these is the value or the extent of the citizen's possessions, the amount of property which he holds and owns, and the other is the income which he receives. I am an advocate of income taxation. I believe a tax distributed in proportion to the income a man receives would be distributed in the most just and fair way that it is possible to distribute it; but we are not under an income tax, and it is impossible for us to pass from the property tax, under which we are now proceeding, to an income tax in any abrupt and positive way. If we have to pass to the basis of an income tax, we must pass to it gradually. The income tax is at present in an experimental stage. It has been successfully used in the old world, but thus far, as used by our states, it cannot be pronounced a success. The state of Wisconsin is the first state to adopt a very elaborate income tax, modeled after the income tax provisions of the Old World, and there the experiment of income tax is being tried out. All of the states are watching the outcome of the Wisconsin experiment, but the income tax, by itself now, is out of the question.

We are on the basis of a property tax. Now it is assumed by those who accept the value of one's property as the best measure that we have of one's ability to pay, that all property ought to be taxed at a uniform rate. I admit that the value of one's property does not furnish an accurate measure of his ability to pay. The man behind the property is an element which the property tax does not take account of in estimating the income that may be derived from the property. We may say that the value of property is in the long run proportional to the income it will yield and the amount of property a man possesses is in the long run, or in a general way, a measure of his income. This does not take into account the man himself, the man behind the property, which is a mighty element in determining what income will be gotten from it. But we cannot take that into account in the property tax, and we are left to assume that the amount of property that a man possesses is the best possible measure we have of his ability to pay taxes. That being the measure of his ability, we believe that the whole amount of property that a man possesses should be taxed at the same rate.

Now, the classification of property involves a division of property into different classes for the purpose of levying upon those different classes different rates. The rates are to be uniform throughout the same class, but different in different classes. All of these classification schemes that I know anything about place real estate—land—in one class, and they designate a variety of classes, downward from real estate, the last class mentioned on the other extreme being intangible personal property. All of these schemes contemplate placing the highest rate of tax upon land, and the lowest rate of tax upon intangible personal property. Many of those who maintain that classification is the correct method would be very well satisfied if we could exempt intangible personal property altogether from taxation, and tax only material tangible property. The classificationists, therefore, attack the theory of a general property tax based upon a uniform rate from different standpoints. Some of them maintain that intangible personal property ought not to pay any taxes at all. They maintain that only material wealth should be taxed. When, for instance, I sell a horse and take a note for it, there is no increase in the material wealth of the community. I have a piece of paper with certain writing upon it, but the value of that paper as material wealth is nothing. These people maintain that the note ought not to be taxed, since it is not material wealth. In reply to that we say that we do not confine our taxes to material wealth. We tax franchises; we tax corporations, not in proportion to the wealth they possess, but as going concerns. An express company operating in this state may have very little material wealth. We do not simply tax its material wealth, but we tax it in proportion to its value as a business, its value as an income-producing institution. We are taxing its material wealth to a certain extent, but the larger portion of the tax collected from an express company is not upon material wealth, but upon something nonmaterial and intangible.

In the second place I maintain that the note is property, and I presume no one here would dispute me, though I believe a court in California has decided that a note is not property. A note is property. It has value, it has market value. It can pass from hand to hand and be exchanged for money or for commodities. Not only has it a market value, but it is income producing property, and if we were on the basis of an income tax the income from that note would be taxed, just as the income from a farm or a mine or any other sort of a business is taxed.

I maintain, therefore, that a note or a bond—intangible property of that sort—is a proper subject for taxation. I may say in addition to this that the note is under the protection of the law, and if you have difficulty in collecting it the machinery of the law will be put in operation to collect it, just as the machinery of the law will be put in operation to aid you in recovering a stolen horse. So I maintain that a note, or intangible personal property, is a proper subject for taxation.

Other classificationists who admit that a note is a proper subject for taxation, assert that the note should not be taxed at the same rate as other property, and they make this assertion commonly because, as they say, intangible personal property does not bring the same income, and it ought not to be taxed at the same rate as other property. Their point of attack is deposits in bank—savings banks. Money in savings banks yields, say, four per cent, and assuming that the rate of tax is one per cent, which I believe we are going to realize in the near future, twenty-five per cent of the income is paid in taxes and they say that is so large as to be unjust. I want to say that the classificationists in choosing this line of argument are choosing the most forcible presentation of the subject possible for them. It is not quite fair. In the first place no one deposits money in a savings bank as a real investment at all. People who deposit money at four per cent in savings banks do it because that is the most convenient way to deposit it for the time being; there is no worry or trouble about it; it is safe, and they just drop it into the savings bank and let it rest there; and then there is another reason, and that is that money in a savings bank is within easy reach all the time. We can get it when we want it. Those three things determine whether one shall deposit money there or not, and those who deposit money in this way sacrifice something in interest because of these other considerations.

Now, to apply this argument in fairness we must take the money as it is loaned commonly by business men. It is an easy matter to lend money at six per cent, and sometimes at seven per cent interest, on good security. Suppose a man lends money at six per cent interest and is taxed one per cent. He gets five per cent net on his investment. Take the higher rate, and suppose that the tax is one and a half per cent and that would leave him four and a half per cent net on his investment.

Now, I assert that three-fourths of the farmers of the state would be willing to take a net income of five per cent on the value of their farms. Let the farmer charge up against the farm his own labor, the labor of his teams, the amount paid out for labor, insurance, taxes and the deterioration of fences, buildings and farm machinery, and if his net profit is five per cent, or even four and a half per cent, three-fourths of the farmers of the state would be satisfied with their incomes. Believing that, I say that the man who loans money out at six per cent, and who pays the extreme limit of tax of one and a half per cent, thus realizing four and a half per cent, is not being dealt with unfairly. Again, there are classificationists who maintain that while it is right to tax intangible property, it is not expedient to tax it as other property is taxed. They say you are not able to get this intangible property on the tax duplicate when you tax it at the same rate at which other property is taxed. You therefore do not derive the revenue you ought to from this kind of property. If you tax it at a merely nominal rate, they claim that this property will be so thoroughly reported, that it will come from its hiding places so generally, that the revenue received from it will be greater than that received under present conditions, and as a matter of expediency, a matter of getting the greatest income from intangible property, they advocate reducing the rate to a very low point.

This method of proceeding violates my sense of what is right. I do not believe in passing a law which will release these people from the obligation to pay taxes on intangible property simply because they persistently refuse to do so. Suppose there were in our midst a group of people constantly pilfering. We cannot prove it, but we know they are constantly doing it. We cannot subject them to penalties to which ordinary pilferers are subject. Suppose finally in our despair, not being able to convict these people, we say to them "We are going to change our laws concerning you. We are satisfied you are pilfering and are subject to punishment, but we are going to change the law, so that you will not be subject to punishment. We are going to relieve you of the disgrace of being called criminals. We expect you to go on just as you have been with your pilfering, but we expect you, in return for the immunity which we grant you, to turn over to the community a small part of the amount you henceforth pilfer." That is the way the classificationists approach the people who are not reporting their intangible property. "Because you are not reporting it, although you ought to report it, we are going to change our laws so that it will not be required that you pay in full. We are going to reduce greatly the amount you would have to pay, but we expect in return for the privilege we are extending to you that you will voluntarily donate to the community a certain small portion of what you are permitted to withhold from it."

These people argue that the low rate will bring out the intangible property to a large extent, and they cite the experience of the city of Baltimore, which seems to indicate that when the rate of taxes upon intangible property is made very low the income is considerably increased. I do not believe that this result will persist. There may be an increase in the amount of intangible property reported the first year, and it may be that taxes on that amount will increase the total taxes, but left to themselves the people will soon lapse into the old method of withholding from taxation at the low rate just as generally as they did at the high rate.

Professor Bullock, who is an ardent classificationist, makes the statement that all schemes of taxation which contemplate the taxing of intangible personal property at a low rate presume a radical overhauling in the administration of the tax laws, and in connection with that a change in the penalties which are assessed for withholding or falsely reporting one's property.

Let me refer again to Wisconsin. Wisconsin is trying an expensive experiment with the income tax. They have exempted intangible personal property from taxation by the property tax. The property tax does not apply to that, while it does still apply to other forms of property. They apply to intangible property the income tax, at a special rate equivalent to a property tax of from three-fourths of a mill to four mills, depending on the size of the income. With that rate Wisconsin is not going to get very much from personal property unless the personal property is pretty generally reported. Remember that that is a rate that varies from three-quarters of a mill to four mills on the dollar, depending on the size of the income. Now, in connection with this rate, which so largely relieves intangible personal property from taxation, they have provided by law that any man who falsely reports his income, or who refuses to report his income, shall be punished—not as in this state—for perjury, or by having his taxes increased by fifty per cent, but such a man is fined not to exceed $500 and imprisoned not to exceed one year, or both. That is the way Wisconsin gets at the people who refuse to report incomes on intangible personal property as they ought.

Now, unless you accompany the reduction of rates, as advocated by the classificationists, with additional penalties, as they have in Wisconsin for false or incomplete reports, I do not believe the lowering of the rates will be effective permanently. It may for a time bring out more intangible personal property, and it may for a time increase the amount of taxes derived from intangible personal property over what we now get, but unless penalties, and severe penalties, are imposed the people will soon lapse into the old ways.

This proposition advocates a peculiar kind of classification. It is piecemeal classification. You will notice that it provides local option in classification. Counties that vote to do so can adopt classification according to a general law passed by the legislature. The legislature will designate the classes of property and fix the rates on some of them, but not on all of them. There must be flexibility. The total rate of taxes in some counties will be greater than in others, so there must be some power in the local authorities to fix and determine the rate. I think this is classification in its worst form. If we are to have classification at all, let us have it state-wide and universal, and not classification of property in piecemeal.

Now let us see what will happen under these conditions. Suppose a certain county votes to adopt this classification plan of taxation, and suppose it does what is usually done in such cases; it reduces the tax on manufacturing companies almost to nothing, practically allowing them to operate free of tax in that territory. Of course, while the surrounding counties tax everything at a uniform rate, manufacturers looking for a location would drift into the counties that relieve them from taxation, and with the incoming of those manufacturing institutions there will be an increase of population, increased demands for laborers, carpenters, material men, merchants, and every other class of people almost, and the result is there will be a sort of boom in those counties. When these manufacturing companies begin operations and begin to compete with other companies in adjoining counties, the other companies will say to the authorities of the other counties, "Here, we can't stand this. Over there a few miles, occupying a position just as favorable for operations as ours, there are manufacturing concerns making cheaper than we are the same products that we are selling. You will have to reduce the tax here or we will have to emigrate." The result will be that the other counties will have to come down to a classification basis, and we shall have classification by piecemeal all over the state, and that entirely independent of the question whether it will be better, when the end is achieved, to be on a classification basis or on the uniform rate basis, because the counties will be compelled to classify to protect themselves against counties that have gone over on the classification basis. I believe that would be worse than if the entire state were on the basis right at once. I do not believe, as you all know, in classification. I believe least of all in piecemeal classification as outlined in the majority report.

Now these classificationists tell us that our property tax applied to intangible personal property has broken down. Three years ago if one had made that proposition to me I should have assented to it most thoroughly, and if I had seen no relief I should have been looking around for some relief in the matter of taxation. Now, why has the property tax applied in a general way at a uniform rate to intangible property broken down? It has broken down for reasons which it seems to me are rather apparent.

First, it broke down because we left the tax laws to administer themselves. Our assessors have been going about a good deal like colporteurs, leaving tax blanks as the colporteurs leave tracts. Each person fills the blank for himself and often signs the oath with a mental reservation. With this sort of assessment it is not to be expected that any system of property tax would work reasonably well. The assessor has not been a positive force. He has not been exercising the powers that the law requires he should exercise. The assessor is elected from the community in which he lives, and must assess the property of his neighbors—a very delicate thing to do. Assessors ought to be appointed by a power outside of the community, and they should be placed under the control of some central authority to make it certain that they shall make their assessments on some definite and fixed or uniform plan.

In Wisconsin the assessor may be fined for dereliction of duty, and for every blank left in the paper, unless he can give a proper reason why the blank was not filled. We ought to have something of that kind in this state.

In response to a question by Judge Peck I said something about both of these reports advocating a separation of the state tax from the local tax. One of the reasons for this is the tendency of each county to evade the state tax by undervaluing its property. The result is that real estate has seldom been valued at half of its real value, and sometimes for not more than a quarter or a third of its real value. Now it is easy for an assessor to say, "I don't know what this land is worth," and the result of the whole thing is that the land goes in at one-third or one-fourth of its value. But when the owner of a note reports it to the assessor, that note, if it is a good note, must go in at its full face value. It cannot be put in at one-third or one-fourth of its value. Therefore, the owner of the note, knowing that the owner of the land has only put in his land at one-fourth of its value, and not being able to put in his note at one-fourth of its value, simply does not return his note. I do not know that I blame him. I do not say that every man who does this is dishonest. I have not done it myself, but perhaps I have escaped because of lack of temptation.

Then there is another objection. If the valuation is very low, of course the rate of tax must be increased correspondingly, for the county or taxing district must have sufficient income to meet its needs, and this increases the burden on the man who has intangible personal property and makes him less inclined to report it.

There is another reason why our tax system broke down, and this is the fact that municipal bonds have been exempted from taxation. I might say here that our report would restore bonds to the tax list. I firmly believe that they ought to be restored to the tax list. There is no reason why a city should be able to give its bond, which is simply a note, under conditions which relieve the holder from taxation, when if a citizen gives his note the holder of it is taxed. I cannot see any difference between the note of a city and that of an individual, so far as that is concerned. Of course, when a city can issue its notes or bonds free of taxes, it pays a lower rate of interest. It would be a nice thing for me if I could issue my notes free from taxation. I could profit also by a lower rate of interest. And it is just as fair that I should be relieved from paying a high rate of interest as that the city should.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you believe that the city should pay taxes on the money it has in bank?

Mr. COLTON: I rather think so.

Mr. ANTRIM: Do you believe a city should pay taxes on its city buildings?

Mr. COLTON: No. But I was saying that the exemption of municipal bonds from taxation tends to break down our tax system. Here is a man who has money out at interest loaned in the ordinary way. His neighbor has an equal amount invested in bonds upon which he pays no taxes. The man who has loaned his money in the ordinary way says to himself, "Why should I pay taxes on my money, loaned out in the ordinary way, when my neighbor has the same amount invested in bonds and he does not pay anything at all? So, he simply withholds his notes from taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you believe an individual should pay taxes on his debts?

Mr. COLTON: No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Then if you do not believe an individual should pay taxes on his debts, why do you believe a city should pay taxes on its debts, namely, its bonds?

Mr. COLTON: I think a note is a proper subject of taxation, and I believe a note given by a city is just as proper a subject of taxation as a note given by an individual.

Mr. TALLMAN: By what process would you get upon the tax duplicate the bonds issued by municipal corporations, where they are sold to bonding houses, then sold in the New York market and are owned by the people of the state of New York, and it is impossible for us to find out who are the owners of the bonds?

Mr. COLTON: I have no process to expound to cover that difficulty, and there are other difficulties I know that will arise.

Mr. TALLMAN: Is not that one reason why municipal bonds should be exempted, because the municipality would get the taxes out of it right along in the decreased interest?

Mr. COLTON: Yes, that is the reason commonly urged.

Mr. STOKES: In answer to a question to the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] you say that the municipality should pay taxes on its bonds?

Mr. COLTON: Not the municipality, the holder of the bonds.

Mr. STOKES: They are not the city's bonds. They are the individual's bonds after they have been bought by him. That is the bond I am talking about.

Mr. COLTON: I do not mean that the city should pay taxes on its bonds. If I used that expression it was inadvertent. All other bonds should pay taxes. I was saying that it is of advantage to the city to sell its bonds tax free, because it can float its bonds at a lower rate of interest, just as it would be of advantage to the individual. Suppose one goes to a farmer and says, "I am interested in the city. It is a large city and I can sell its bonds free from tax, and you ought not to object to it—"

Mr. DWYER: Is it not a fact the reason given for exempting the bonds of a municipality from taxation is that the home investors buy the bonds, and the money stays in the city? Is not that the main reason given for exempting bonds, that they are purchased at home, and the money instead of going out of the state, stays in the state?

Mr. COLTON: That is urged sometimes. Of course, if they go out of the state they are taxed. There are only two states in the Union whose constitutions exempt bonds, Arizona and New Mexico. They are not taxed at the same rate in a few other states, but in a majority of the states they are taxed just the same as other property. Now suppose an Ohio bond subject to tax, and consequently bearing a high rate of interest, is sold in Pennsylvania, where the rate is four mills on the dollar. It will be sold at a premium, and thus the city will be recompensed for the higher rate it pays on account of the fact that bonds are taxed in this state. If the interest rate named on the bond is higher than money is bringing in Pennsylvania, the bond will sell at a premium, so that if the city issues bonds with the rate a little higher on account of the taxation, they would sell in a state where they are exempt from taxation at a premium, which would recompense the city for the difference in the rate.

But I was speaking about the farmer. Suppose there are in my town two men, one owning a farm worth $10,000 and another has money invested in notes loaned out to farmers to the extent of $10,000. Each of these is taxed, the one on his farm and the other on his notes, and they pay taxes at the rate of one per cent, which would be $100 each year. That is divided between the township and county, and a small portion goes to the state. Then these two men help to pay the expenses of the local and state governments. Now the second man, who has his money invested in ordinary notes, changes his investment to bonds. He gets a little less income, it is true, if he buys tax-free bonds bearing a little lower rate, but he is willing to do that because he escapes taxation. He lives right beside his friend, but he pays nothing toward the expenses of the county or the township in which he lives. Is this just?

This man with $10,000 in bonds, who lives right beside the farmer, is paying nothing, and hence increased burdens fall on the farmer. Of course, if this man who transfers his money to bonds is relieved of local taxation, anyone can see that the result is, since the same amount has to be raised, that there will be $10,000 less of taxable property, and the others have to pay a little more in taxes. You make the farmer bear an added burden in order that the city may get the advantage of a low rate of interest.

"But," someone says to the farmer, "the growth and prosperity of the city means the growth and prosperity of the country, and your interest in the city ought to be such that you will not object to the exemption of its bonds from taxation." It will be very difficult to so thoroughly convince the farmer by this line of reasoning that he will say to the city: "Build your palatial public buildings and your lofty viaducts, pave your streets, purchase and adorn your spacious parks and connect them with broad and sweeping boulevards, borrow the money with which to pay for them, and, so great is our desire for your welfare that we will gladly bear increased burdens of taxation in order to help you pay the interest on your debt."

Now I think I have discussed this matter as fully as I ought to, but there is one other thing that I want to say. I think the rate of taxation of one per cent, or the extreme limit of one and a half per cent, as provided by our present law, ought to go into the constitution, because people ought to know what to depend on in the way of taxation. I believe if the people were satisfied that the present tax law would be continued in force more property would be returned for assessment, and when we fix it in the constitution, the people will know that that is settled, they will know what to depend upon, and it is likely to bring out much more intangible property than we have now.

Mr. PETTIT: I have not had a chance to read your proposal. Is there anything in there in reference to double taxation?

Mr. COLTON: Nothing said of it. Three years ago I would have agreed with anyone who condemned our system of taxation. It had broken down. In fourteen cities the tax rate was over four per cent. In one city the tax rate was over five per cent. In many cities the tax rate was three per cent. The tax rate was often higher than the interest rate paid by banks. Under those conditions no authority would have felt like going to a man who had money deposited in a bank, which was drawing four per cent, and saying to him that he must pay five per cent taxes on it. Such a condition as that precludes the forcible administration of any tax law. But bring the taxes down to a reasonable rate, one per cent, or, in an extreme case, one and a half per cent, and the taxing authorities of the state have some heart in trying to enforce the law. The legislature will have some heart in putting penalties on, so as to bring out intangible personal property. I do not suppose we are going to get it all out. I do not look forward to that condition, but I do look forward to the time when we shall get out a much larger proportion of it than we have now on the tax books, and to a time when the income from it will be much larger than it would be under any ordinary system of classification that is likely to be adopted.

Mr. WATSON: Take a farmer now, and what encouragement would there be for a man to put $10,000 in a farm appraised at $10,000 if he did not know that there was a fixity in the constitution concerning the rate of taxation on the farm? Suppose he would buy that and the general assembly might mark the rate up to two per cent —

Mr. DWYER: You mean the maximum rate—

Mr. COLTON: He would take that into account, and he would be less likely to invest than under other conditions.

Now I am not here to defend the Smith one per cent law. I am not posing as its champion. But I do defend a limitation of the tax rate in the constitution. I do believe that we should secure that for all time by incorporating it in the constitution.

In conclusion, may I be allowed to express a hope which embodies somewhat my idea of what we ought to look forward to in the line of taxation? My hope is that the uniform rule of taxation may be continued. We are under the property tax, and if we pass to classification we cannot avoid many of the difficulties that exist under the present uniform rule. The difficulties of assessments, etc., under classification will be the same as now. I hope that we will continue under the uniform property tax, changing the constitution so that we can have an income tax. Then I hope we will watch the experiment in Wisconsin, and if that succeeds, as I feel confident it will succeed, I hope that our state will apply the income tax with low rates at first, which will be increased as time goes on, with a corresponding decrease of the rate of the general property tax, until by and by the property tax will practically disappear, and we shall be placed on an income tax basis, the fairest possible way in which the tax burden can be distributed over the people.

Mr. DWYER: What would be your plan for taxing land encumbered by a mortgage?

Mr. COLTON: That brings up the question of the so-called double taxation. I ought not to take time to answer that fully. I think double taxation is largely a bugaboo. Double taxation is magnified in its importance and bearing on this question.

In the first place, if I have made my position clear a note ought to be taxed. When a note is taxed I know that it increases the rate that will have to be paid by the man who borrows the money sufficient to cover the tax. That is, if the rate of tax is one per cent, and if the money could be borrowed if the note were not taxed, at five per cent, if it is taxed, the man who borrows the money would have to pay six per cent. That is all right. A horse is taxed. If I hire that horse, theoretically, and perhaps actually, I have to pay more for the horse because the horse is taxed, and if a man borrows money he will have to pay more because it is taxed. It is not double taxation, but it is simply a shifting of taxes. Our whole taxation system is full of examples of the shifting of taxes.

Have you ever noticed how patiently a corporation submits to taxes? They don't care how much they are taxed. They simply increase, if competition permits, the price of the product, or cut down the quality of the material, or diminish wages, and shift the burden from themselves to someone else.

The same thing is true of all corporations except railroads. We have put a limit to the charges which railroads may make for carrying freight and passengers. Under this condition the railroads cannot shift the tax levied upon them so well. We have the railroad companies between the upper and the nether mill stone, but the ordinary corporation shifts its burdens easily. In the same manner if notes are taxed, there is a shifting of the tax onto the shoulders of the borrower.

Mr. PETTIT: How would a man who has a farm valued at $10,000, and has a $5,000 mortgage on it, shift that?

Mr. COLTON: That burden would shift onto him.

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to be sure that I understand the gentleman rightly. Take the illustration the gentleman from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] has given. If I own a farm appraised at $10,000, and have to borrow $5,000 on a mortgage in order to pay for that farm, do I understand the gentleman to say that the man who lends me the $5,000 shifts the burden over onto me, so that I practically pay the taxes?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then, if that is the case, I pay taxes on the $10,000 farm?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: And on the $5,000 mortgage?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: $15,000?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: And all the property I have is a $10,000 farm. Is that right?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: But the farmer pays the tax on the mortgage on his farm?

Mr. COLTON: Yes; it is shifted onto him.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Take the example of the gentleman from Adams [Mr. PETTIT]. He puts the proposition that the farmer buys a farm for $10,000, pays $5,000 cash and gives a mortgage for $5,000. Is there any justice in that? Does he not buy the farm subject to the lien for taxes, and does he not buy it for less than he would if it were free from taxes?

Mr. COLTON: He pays less than if it were free from taxes?

Mr. FLUKE: If I own a farm and give a $5,000 mortgage on it, is there any rule of right or equity whereby the man who holds that mortgage against me should be exempted from paying taxes on it?

Mr. COLTON: No.

Mr. HALFHILL: I would like to know what is the scope and effect of section 10: "Taxes may be imposed upon the production of coal, oil, gas, and other minerals"?

Mr. COLTON: That is a production tax, or excise tax. It might be laid on every barrel of oil produced, or on every ton of coal mined.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is there any contention on behalf of the minority of the committee that excise taxes cannot be levied under the present constitution?

Mr. COLTON: There was the impression that it was necessary to put in the constitution a provision to permit a production tax of that kind to be levied.

Mr. DOTY: Are you not fearful that section 10, carried to its logical conclusion, might result in the single tax?

Mr. WINN: Is it "safeguarded"?

Mr. DOTY: Do you realize where you are landing?

Mr. COLTON: The rate of taxation must be very low.

Mr. DOTY: It does not say so.

Mr. COLTON: You must tax the coal very low, or you close down the mines on account of the competition from adjacent states.

Mr. DOTY: Then you acknowledge that taxation on an industry does affect the value of the industry?

Mr. COLTON: Certainly.

Mr. DOTY: You acknowledge that?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: We are making progress.

Mr. MOORE: Does not section 10 simply assume that society has a secondary interest in the natural production of the earth?

Mr. COLTON: Yes, and very rightly.

Mr. DOTY: Why, may I ask?

Mr. COLTON: The people in a certain way are interested in the natural resources of the state. We are all interested in those natural resources, although they are now claimed by the individuals who hold the deeds. Mr. DOTY: You admit the state should exercise some proprietary right?

Mr. COLTON: I think the state should lay a small tax.

Mr. DOTY: Why not a large tax?

Mr. COLTON: I do not think it should be or could be a large tax.

Mr. ANTRIM: I want to ask about that man with a $10,000 farm, and the other man with a $10,000 note. The man who has the $10,000 farm pays $44 a year in taxes, because the rate in the township where the farm is located is .44, .06 less than one-half of 1 per cent. Now this other man lives in town. In town the rate is 1.38, and he would pay $138. In addition to that this farm is worth $50 an acre more than it was when he bought it in at $10,000. Do you not think the farmer has much the advantage of the man who has the $10,000 note, if the man with the note pays on the full $10,000?

Mr. COLTON: As far as that is concerned, our real estate ought to be frequently appraised.

Mr. ANTRIM: It was worth that much when it was appraised, but it has gone up since.

Mr. COLTON: There might be a little injustice because the appraisal has not been sufficiently recent, but the man in town is paying a rate of taxes for the conveniences which he has of living in town, and he ought not complain of that.

Mr. FACKLER: What reason did the committee have in fixing the bond limit of cities in changing the present law, which exempts waterworks bonds from being figured in the computation of the one cent limit, to a plan which considered all as municipal debts?

Mr. COLTON: I suppose you were not here when I made this explanation at the beginning of my remarks. This section which embodies that peculiarity you refer to was the proposal of Dr. Brown, of Highland, and, without investigating it very much, we incorporated it in our report. I would not swear by the debt limit at all, and I do not propose to defend that on the floor of the Convention. Dr. Brown was to have been here to defend his proposal. He does not seem to be here.

Mr. DWYER: Suppose a man has a farm worth $10,000 and he owes $5,000. At present the land is valued at its cash value. Heretofore it was appraised at about two-thirds, but now it is at its full value. He has to pay taxes on $10,000 while he owns only $5,000. Would it not be fair every year when the assessor goes around to have an affidavit attached to the blank by which the man could swear as to the amount of interest he had in the land, and ought you not to assess him on what he owns and not on what he owes? Would not that be fair?

Mr. COLTON: It would seem to be fair, but it is wholly impracticable. I do not think we can put into practice any scheme of that kind that will work.

Mr. DWYER: You have to return your personal property every year, and why not let what he owes be deducted?

Mr. COLTON: It would tend to the reporting of fictitious mortgages.

Mr. DWYER: It looks to me as if that would be the fair thing to do.

Mr. COLTON: Suppose you bought a horse and you gave a note for it. Would not there be as much reason to exempt that horse as to exempt the land in your supposed case?

Mr. DWYER: That is exceptional. That is one of the great grievances we have. The great trouble with our present system in double taxation, paying on something that you do not own. That is one of the greatest complaints we have. If we could eliminate that complaint we could do very much toward relieving the difficulties of the question of taxation.

Mr. COLTON: There was a large number of applications and appeals sent to the Taxation committee bearing upon a point like that, but to grant that really exempts all notes from taxation, for every note covers something. There is no more reason for exempting from taxation a note given for the purchase of land than for the purchase of a piano, a horse, goods out of a store or anything else.

Mr. DWYER: I am not exempting the notes, but exempting the man who owes the note.

Mr. HALFHILL: Has your portion of the committee considered stock certificates?

Mr. COLTON: No, sir.

Mr. HALFHILL: Or shares in a corporation?

Mr. COLTON: I think not. It was intended in the minority report to leave those things as they were, believing that they would adjust themselves, and that it would be better to leave them as they are than to change the constitution already understood.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then your portion of the committee are contending that the way the present constitution is construed, that is to say, that corporations may be assessed on their intangible property and the owners of shares of stock shall not be taxed on those shares, is correct?

Mr. COLTON: If the corporation pays tax on its stock the owner of the stock ought not to be taxed. There is a difference between stocks and bonds. The stockholders are the partners in the business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Are not the citizens a partnership in the municipality, and do you contend that the bonds of a municipality should be subject to taxation, while the stocks in private corporations should be exempt from taxation?

Mr. COLTON: The stocks in the private corporations are taxed at the source.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is not all the property of the city—the municipality—the property of its citizens? And don't they pay taxes on their private property?

Mr. COLTON: Yes, but the city pays no taxes on its public property.

Mr. REDINGTON: I wish to have the attention of the Convention for a short time. I am not in favor of either of these proposals as introduced. I want to preface my remarks by saying that I am in favor of the classification of property. I want that understood at the outset. I also want it understood at the outset that I am here defending the thousands of corporations which are doing business in the small towns and cities of this state, who furnish the labor for the men who build up those towns, and I am here to speak a good word for them. I am now interested and have been interested in them. I am also here to speak as a person interested in real estate and as one who pays taxes on real estate; and as a man interested in real estate and as a man interested in the manufacturing industries I am in favor of the classification of property. Nearly every tax commission for twenty years that has investigated the uniform rule established in Ohio in 1851 has condemned it.

At the time the constitution of 1851 was adopted there were no large corporations in this state. There was not very much intangible property in the state, and I take it that a great many persons who went to that convention went to the convention on horseback. I take it that in

Taxation.

1851 one-half of the houses on the farms in Ohio were log houses and that farmers used oxen instead of horses. They had very little personal property and everybody knew what everybody else had. Each person knew exactly what his neighbor had, and at such a time and under such circumstances the uniform rule of taxation might have been just. As corporations increased, and by reason thereof intangible property increased in amount, the uniform rule of taxation began to work badly. I venture the assertion that today the intangible personal property of the state of Ohio is more than double that of real estate, and yet not six per cent of the intangible personal property goes upon the tax duplicate; and as a man interested in manufacturing and real estate I protest against such conditions. You never have been able under the uniform rule to bring out that intangible personal property, and you never will be able to do so.

I have read the reports of many tax commissions and have considered their reasons for their conclusions, and, without quoting their opinions or giving their reasons, I have taken down what I consider a concrete statement that seems to embody the consensus of their opinions as expressed by them. I believe that the following statement which I have written down properly represents those ideas.

The well known failure of our present system to reach classes of property other than real estate is known to practically everybody, and the demoralizing results of such system have been increased and magnified as the business interests of the state have grown in size and complexity. Grave evils have resulted from our attempts to administer laws which cannot be enforced, and the greatest depression and injustice has been cast upon classes in the community least able to bear the burdens of taxation. The laws induce perjury, they invite concealment, and the system is but a policy of evasion and dishonesty which has weakened the very fabric of government. The habit of disregarding the laws of the state must reflect a disastrous result upon private morality and public conscience, and we are faced with a great moral problem which demands a remedy, in addition to any problem which we have with reference to the financial needs of the state itself.

Many good citizens, while admitting that chaos reigns throughout the state, believe that the blame for the unequal enforcement of our tax laws lies with the public officials, but such is not the case, for the majority of people are agreed that Ohio has come to be known as the leader in its efforts to enforce the general property tax system. The strictest of inquisitorial policies have been applied, grave penalties, threats of prosecution for perjury, and the tax-inquisitor system, with its large money inducement for the recovery of property, all these have but demonstrated the futility of further attempts to correct a weak system, which is universally regarded as unjust and unequal in its result, and which the people refuse to respect, and which no one can contend has not been entirely inadequate in bringing out for taxation personal property such as stocks and bonds and money in the bank.

Furthermore, the belief is becoming more and more universal that these so-called intangible classes of property should not be required to pay a rate of three or more per cent, as is the case in many localities, and with this growing belief comes the fact that the situation cannot be controlled for the reason that these forms of intangible securities are so constituted that they may be concealed by the simplest methods, and if we were to discover them the owner would inflict the severest punishment upon the community, for the securities, as well as the capitalist, would remove from the state. It is a well-known rule of taxation never to levy a tax which will drive capital from the state or prevent it from coming into it.

Our efforts in the past to enforce unjust and unreasonable taxes have deprived Ohio of hundreds of millions of capital. Capital is the very life of an industrial community and of an industrial civilization such as we are enjoying at present. Real estate is of no value whatever except as money is invested and creates a demand for it. Take away the money from Cleveland, Cincinnati or Columbus and stagnation would result. Economic laws inflict their own punishment upon the community which dares oppose their warning.

I say that the laws of Ohio have not been enforced in taxation matters. Hundreds of pages have been written into our statutes giving directions to the auditor and the assessor as to how they should proceed to bring out intangible property for taxation, and all of no avail. Those who should pay taxes on intangible property have not done so. The taxdodgers have allowed matters to run along, and when after a period of time some have been caught they have been able to settle for a very small part of what they really should have paid, and so they have gained even though they have been caught in the end.

Before I proceed to the general question of taxation I beg pardon of the Convention for taking up one or two side issues. As I am speaking offhand I want to get rid of them while I think about them.

Double taxation has been mentioned and discussed. I will give my idea of this by way of an illustration. Take Mr. Jones, for instance. He has $20,000 and is willing to loan this money at six per cent. A, a farmer, or a man owning ground in a city, comes to Jones to borrow $5,000. Jones is willing to loan the money to A, provided he will sign a note for $5,000, due in one year, and secure that note by a mortgage on his real estate. The terms are agreed to, the note is executed, and as collateral for the loan the mortgage is executed and delivered. The mortgage and note are laid on the table and the money handed over to the borrower, who goes away with it, leaving the mortgage and note on the table. B desires to borrow $5,000 from Jones and says to Jones "I have brought with me $10,000 worth of bonds (or some other intangible property) as security." "All right," says Jones. "I know that your security is good, give me your note for the $5,000 and I will take your collateral as security." The note is executed and the note and collateral are left with Jones and the money is taken away by B. Jones now has two notes upon his table, one secured by real estate and the other by collateral. C wishes to borrow $5,000 from Jones and he brings with him his neighbor, Mr. Smith, who is willing to sign a note with C. C says to Jones, "I want $5,000 for one year at six per cent.", and Jones, being willing, agrees to accept all the terms. So C and his neighbor Smith give their joint note for one year at six per cent. C takes the $5,000 away with him and now

Taxation.

Jones has three notes upon his table. D wishes to borrow $5,000. Being well known in the community and a man of considerable property, he arranges with Jones for his $5,000 by giving his own promissory note.

Now Jones has loaned his $20,000 and has four notes therefor. You now propose to favor Mr. Jones by making provision that the note given by A and secured by a mortgage on real estate shall only pay a recording tax of one-half of one per cent., while the other three notes must go upon the tax duplicate at their full value. Why do you favor Mr. Jones because he exacted the very earth as security for his loan? Are you going to establish some rule of taxation giving a premium to Jones for demanding the earth for security? If I were to punish Jones I would make him pay more for having taken a mortgage on a man's home. Now, why do I say that? Because the other three notes pay taxes and the mortgage would be exempt, except the recording tax. These notes should all pay taxes on the same basis. Each man received the money borrowed and each gave security as demanded, and all should be treated alike. If it is double taxation in the case where Jones loaned the money to A, it is also double taxation in the case where Jones loaned the money to B and C, and if you are to make any exemption on account of a security being given for the loan, then I can see no reason why you should not exempt the loans made to B and C as well as the loan made to A.

Now, in a year from that time these men all come back. This constitutional proposal has been adopted and it is now in effect. A asks to renew his paper and Jones says to him, "They have changed the law. The law is now different from what it was before. We now have a recording tax and I will have to pay one-half of one per cent when I record this mortgage. If you will take the loan for five years I will pay that recording tax myself. If you want it for only one year you will have to pay it for me, as I want six per cent for my money." It is agreed, and the loan is made. B comes to Jones and says "I would like to renew the $5,000 note for another year." Jones says to him, "You know they have changed the law. If I loan money upon a mortgage I only have to pay a recording tax and will have to pay no other tax upon the loan. Now, if you want this money for another year you will have to give me a mortgage or pay extra interest to cover my taxes." "But," says B, "I don't own any real estate". Jones replies "Go out and buy some vacant lot for say $200 and I will loan you the $5,000 upon it. Just so it is a real estate loan, that is all I must have and that saves me my taxes." B goes out and buys a vacant lot for $200 and comes back and executes a mortgage upon it and gets his $5,000 by leaving the same collateral with Jones for safekeeping. Isn't it a fact that if you pursue that system you will turn all loans into mortgage loans, and will not mortgage loans be the basis of all other loans, and will it not drive us to single tax? Land will be the basis of all loans. If people want to borrow on collateral they will have to pay one per cent extra for taxation. In other words, if a person puts up any other kind of collateral than a real estate mortgage he must make the money lender good on the tax. And why is one secured debt we have mentioned any more double taxation than the other?

I am against the whole proposition, because I do not believe in single tax or believe the system just. I do not believe that real estate should be made the basis of all loans. I do not believe that it is fair to the manufacturer and the business men who have to borrow large sums of money to keep their business going. I think they should have the right to borrow money under the same terms and conditions as a man who has real estate.

Take public bonds. You propose to place them on the tax duplicate. Before they were exempt from taxation large cities like Cincinnati and Cleveland could issue a four or a four-and-a-half per cent bond and get a premium for it. Why? Because they were known in the market, they were large cities and wealthy, they had a standing in the financial world and people would buy those bonds because they could get their money next day for them if they wanted to sell them. But if you pick out some small city or town or small school district you will find that its financial condition is not known and its bonds are not sought after, and the rate of interest that it will have to pay will be about six per cent. They will have to prepare an abstract and every legal step in the issue of the bonds will have to be watched and looked after. The valuation of their property will be taken into account and the bonds will have to be sold to some bond house, and you will have to ask them to put in a bid for the bonds, and they will not be any-too willing to do so. The result will be that these places will have to pay six per cent for money and the taxpayers of these small cities, towns and school districts will be compelled to pay an extra tax for money and the bonds will never be returned for taxation in those particular places where the bonds are issued.

Now, where would the bonds go? You could never find them. In the past the bond houses sold the bonds elsewhere and when the fellows who had the bonds clipped off the coupons for interest they would send them to the bond house either in Cleveland, Cincinnati or Toledo and demand payment, and the money would be paid to the local bank and the local bank would send the money to the bond house and the bond house would send the money on to the people who owned the bonds, and you never could find out who actually did own the bonds. At best they would never be returned for taxation. If the bonds remained in the state of Ohio they never would be returned for taxation, for the reason that they could be easily concealed and disposed of. For instance, Ashtabula issued $50,000 of bonds for a school house or for some other improvement in the city, and they had to pay six per cent interest on the money borrowed. Afterwards the tax duplicate of that city would never show that a single bond of that city was owned by any person within that city and no bonds would be returned for taxation, and that city and the people living in that city would receive no benefit by reason of the bonds being placed upon the duplicate, but would be penalized by having to pay each year a higher rate of interest for the money borrowed. When bonds were upon the tax duplicate seventy-five per cent of the bonds left the state. People living in the state might want to buy them and might be willing to pay a premium, but they would not take them on account of the tax, unless they received them through some bond house, whereby they could conceal the fact that they owned them. The bond houses were simply a fence between the city and the bondholders.

What has happened since the change and the bonds are exempt? Here is a little community, say, building a schoolhouse. Now a little city or a village can issue bonds at four or four and a half per cent and there is a market for them. About seventy-five per cent of them are owned locally and only about twenty-five per cent of them leave the taxation district where they are issued. What is the result? Every school district, every small village and city and county is able to borrow money for about two per cent less than could have been done under the old regime. This results in a local benefit to the people of that district. But I want to tell you that in no case will you ever collect any taxes on these bonds, whether they are exempt or not. The point is this: If you keep the bonds exempt from taxes the community is benefited one per cent at least by having the right to borrow the money where it is cheaper. What sense is there in putting it on the tax duplicate when it will go out of the community where the bonds are issued and you will never find them for taxation? I remember twenty years ago or more there was $35,000 of bonds issued by a village in Lorain county and they were issued at six per cent. They were advertised and there was not a bidder found for those bonds, and as I was then interested in a bank I got the officers of the bank to put in a bid at par. That bank carried those bonds a year and could not sell them at par. Finally I went to a bond house in Toledo and negotiated a sale of the bonds and the bank lost $400 in the transaction. These bonds were good and safe, but people did not want to buy them, as they did not know about the financial condition of the village issuing the bonds. And I know you cannot sell village bonds if they are taxable. Take the bonds of the big cities and there is a constant demand for them and the price is not affected so very much whether they are on the tax duplicate or not. They don't vary in price more than one-eighth of one per cent. I have not seen a daily paper lately or noticed the quotations, but I know exactly what the bonds of the big cities are selling for, they vary so little. The large cities are not interested as much as the small cities, towns and school districts.

Now, I have discussed these two side issues as to double taxation and public bonds, and possibly I may not have made myself clear. I have my own ideas and I have tried to give them to you, and I hope you won't take any offense if I speak earnestly. I am very earnest upon this subject. I want you to bear with me if I trespass upon your patience a little. There may be people in this Convention, and I presume there are many, who have had more experience than I have had, but I have had a little and my education is from experience and is not academic, and I have not obtained my information only by using a pencil in an office; I have been out in the world some.

There may be persons at the head of tax commissions who are very learned, scholarly men, who have had great experience in manufacturing and all other industries and may have made their millions and been successful, who may be in favor of the uniform rule of taxation and may think all property should be taxed at its full value, but I doubt it, for that has not been my experience. I know in most towns we have boards of trade and chambers of commerce that want to secure factories and have factories come into their towns to build up the towns, to open up new additions to the town and to bring laboring men into the town for the purpose of helping the farmers and the merchants in selling their goods, and these people are all in favor of classification of property. How many of us have been solicited to contribute to a fund of ten or fifty thousand dollars to aid in getting manufacturing industries established in our small cities and villages, and how many of us have paid our money and never received a dividend in return! How many small corporations are operating in the small towns and villages that never pay dividends, and yet they furnish labor for hundreds of employees! I have stood at midnight as it were watching manufacturing establishments, some that I have helped to build, and I have seen hundreds of men working and a large amount of smoke pouring out of the tall smokestack, and I have wondered what the workmen would think if they really knew the financial condition of that institution. That institution may have been working night and day for three or more years, with the men who are managing it breaking their backs in an effort to get money for a payroll and to keep the institution running, but the state never hesitates to take its taxes and assessments upon the full cost of the plant, whether the machinery or property has a real earning capacity or not, and whether the fixtures owned have any true value or not. When an accident occurs, the moment it does occur lawyers are ever looking for a job, and in many cases corporations are compelled to delay a just claim to a person injured for the reason that they have not the money to pay the claim.

Take the street railway companies and interurban railway companies. You perhaps have helped to build some of them. They issue their preferred stock and common stock and bonds, and maybe a second or third mortgage bond, and after they are built and in operation what is the stock worth? Who knows what their stock or their bonds are worth? The preferred stock is quoted usually at about thirty-five cents, the common stock about four cents, the first mortgage bonds about ninety-five to ninety-eight cents, and the second mortgage bonds about eighty, and the third mortgage bonds about sixty or seventy, but who knows what those bonds are actually worth? How many interurban railways have you put your money into when you did not get anything back for several years, and then finally they went into the hands of a receiver, because sometimes it only takes one large accident to put such a company into the hands of a receiver. I have heard it said here in this Convention that the attorneys who represented the injured persons were benefactors. I know oftentimes that the attorneys for the corporations were the best friends that the injured people had, because those attorneys have staved off the time of settlement that the injured person might get some compensation and there might be some money at that time to make settlement with, whereas if a judgment had been rendered and execution issued when first the suit was started there would not have been a cent, the company would have become insolvent. I know of several instances where by getting time companies were able to pay their claims. As a general thing there is a certain class of attorneys who have their heads out of the window all the time watching for the ambulance, and when they represent an injured person they want two amounts, one for themselves and one for the man injured. Many times we hear talk about the heartless and soulless corporations delaying payment to the poor fellow who is injured when they have not the money to pay him with and could not get the money at any bank, and the only way they can pay the poor fellow who is injured is to get an extension of time until they can earn the same or get the money from some other source.

Now, by classification of intangible property or by classification of all property, you can do justice to these corporations that are having a hard time to succeed and not help to force a failure and thereby create a loss for the owners who have put their money into the enterprise, as well as the workmen who work in those factories and the people who live in those towns. If you can classify property you can protect a lot of these manufacturing institutions that furnish the labor for so many people who built up these small towns. This does not apply to big standard stock companies. Take the large industrial companies, the Standard Oil Company and the Tobacco Trust, and their stock is quoted on the New York stock exchange. The value of their stock is fixed by their income. They make reports every three or four months and everybody knows how much is invested and everybody knows all about the management of the institution, and their stock goes up or down according to the reports as made every three or four months, and people don't take much of a chance in investing in these standard stocks. But what is the truth about the smaller companies in small towns? If you don't have classification of property they oftentimes go down, through some cause or other, and cannot survive. If you have classification, so that those people who have their money invested for the benefit of towns would not have to pay full tax on their machinery and pay franchise taxes and property taxes and all that sort of thing, they might run and furnish labor and pay wages and build up the city or village in which they are operating. If it is the proper thing for standard corporations to have their intangible property valued according to earning power, then why not value the intangible property of our small, struggling corporations according to their earning power, and not according to the visible conditions of their property?

Coming now to money in banks, who is it that has money in banks? Is it the enterprising, hustling city builders? You know it is not. It is the old people, who don't want to take the hazard of putting their money in industrials; young people, minors, widows and workmen. Go to the savings banks of Cincinnati and Cleveland and find out who the depositors are. The deposits will average along about $500 for each depositor. It is not the rich people who have their money in banks; it is not the big manufacturers; they are the borrowers, and they borrow to build up the industries that go to make up the cities. These people who have been putting their money in banks have neglected to return it for taxation, and if you will take the reports of the various banks throughout the state of Ohio and then go to the auditors of the various counties and find out how much property is returned for taxation you will see that not more than six per cent of the cash admitted to be in banks is returned on the tax duplicate. Why not have classification of property, so that you can say to the banks that they shall pay the taxes on this money, say five mills on the dollar?

Now, if there is twelve million dollars of money deposited in banks, that means a large amount of income that you don't get at all now. It would help the banks. Everybody would bring his money and place it in the banks, because it would be exempt from taxation so far as they are concerned. They can say, "We have money in bank". As to the individual, his money in bank would not have to pay taxes. The banks would pay the depositors less interest. But when they go on the theory that the property must be listed at its full value and pay some of the rates of taxation that towns have imposed, it simply takes from some of the depositors the full income. Say a person has $10,000 in bank at four per cent. If this is returned for taxation, or had been in times gone by, it would take all the interest and some of the principal to pay the taxes.

No matter what we may say we all know that many of the small corporations throughout the state are not paying dividends. I know of one instance in my town where a manufacturing concern, with machinery and real estate costing in the neighborhood of $200,000, went into the hands of a receiver and the plant stood idle for two years or more, and it was then sold for $35,000. The machinery was not adapted for anything else than that for which it was originally designed. Now, what are you going to do? Tax that property at its full value? What was its value? Was it not its earning power that fixed its value? Just look what the result would be if you did tax it at its full visible value. Is there any inducement to anybody to put his money into an industrial corporation to bring laboring men to a town that the city may be built up if you indorse such a system? I will say this in conclusion, that I believe that we should at this time recognize the fact that we have more than double the amount of intangible property than we have of tangible property, and we should adopt some rule whereby we can get at that intangible property and make it pay taxes according to its ability to pay, according to its earning capacity, and I say that it is not the true way to tax intangible property at its full value unless it is earning an amount equal to at least six per cent.

Under the Smith law the one per cent authorized to be levied will take twenty-five per cent of the income on the money deposited in banks. An assessor comes to my home and wants me to make out my return for taxation. I may have $10,000 borrowed from some bank, and I may have $20,000 of securities and bonds up as collateral for that loan. I do not really know if those bonds or that collateral are worth enough to pay that note. I have not got them in my possession and how easy it is to say that I have not got them, I don't own them, the title has been transferred and I don't know whether they would pay the debt, and therefore avoid returning them for taxation. I don't know that I will ever own them or have them in my possession. I may have four or five such loans as that. Everybody does business at several banks, not at just one bank. The hustling city builder, the man who comes rolling down town in his automobile, never has idle money. He always has his stocks and bonds up in some bank for money borrowed and used in the enterprises in which he is engaged.

I tell you, gentlemen, there should be some relief. Here we are as a Constitutional Convention. The Convention will not meet again for a long time. The people should have some relief, and if there is no one else in the state of Ohio who will tell the truth about it, I will, and you can do as you please. I know it is a fact that if you can classify property tax matters can be so arranged as to bring in much more income than now, and you can avoid many of the hardships due to the present system.

I am interested in farming. I have owned several farms, and being the owner of farms I want classification of property so that the taxes can be lowered on the farms. It is a benefit to the farmer to have classification of property; it is a benefit to the manufacturing concerns who employ labor. You should not be kicking at the corporations all the time. What are you going to do if they quit furnishing the opportunity for people to labor? Therefore, I am opposed to the recording tax for mortgages, I am opposed to putting public bonds back upon the tax duplicate, and I am opposed to the uniform rule whereby all property must be taxed at its full value regardless of its earning capacity.

Mr. WATSON: You speak about lessening the rate of taxation upon enterprises for the purpose of building up a city or a town. At different periods in my life I have owned blooded stock. Why should not the state tax on blooded farm animals be lessened so as to let a fine lot of cattle be built up? Isn't that just as necessary as building up a manufacturing plant, and isn't one who engages in that just as much benefiting the farming community as the manufacturer benefits the city?

Mr. REDINGTON: I think such property is taxed at its value, and that is correct. You brought my attention to one thing that I omitted, and I am glad you mentioned that matter.

I would exempt farming implements from taxation, and I wouldn't tax nondividend-bearing stock, and I wouldn't tax household goods. Here a young couple gets married, and they have about $125 or $150 worth of household goods. Do you think they should pay taxes on those?

Mr. WINN: I want to say that as I understand you, you are in favor of classification of property for taxation?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. WINN: You are opposed to exempting bonds, notes or securities from taxation?

Mr. REDINGTON: I am opposed to exempting private bonds from taxation, but I think municipal, county, state and all public bonds should be exempted.

Mr. WINN: How about individual notes?

Mr. REDINGTON: I gave an illustration of that, of Jones who made the four loans. And I say, if you are going to exempt one, you should exempt the others. I would tax them all alike.

Mr. WINN: You are opposed to exempting public bonds. Are you opposed to the same extent to exempting private notes and securities of that sort?

Mr. REDINGTON: I am not opposed to exempting public bonds. As to private notes and securities of that sort—I am in favor of taxing telephone company securities and street railway bonds and securities of that character—when you don't know how to list them, and don't know what they are worth, I would be in favor of classification, so that they can be put down at what they are worth, judged by what they produce, their income.

Mr. WINN: You are in favor of exempting manufacturing institutions?

Mr. REDINGTON: I never said that. I said I was in favor of the classification of property, so that some fair rule could be adopted, and that they could be taxed according to their ability to pay dividends.

Mr. WINN: You are in favor of making the tax light?

Mr. REDINGTON: Upon those institutions?

Mr. WINN: Upon those that are unprofitable.

Mr. REDINGTON: If there were an unfortunate institution in your town not paying a cent of dividend, and the chances are that it won't pay, I do not think it should pay taxes.

Mr. WINN: Is not that the law?

Mr. REDINGTON: No, sir; the real estate is appraised every ten years. I believe it is appraised every four now, and the real estate and machinery and permanent fixtures are taken into account, and if that particular plant should fail, and that machinery had to be sold, not being designed for any other purpose, it is worth next to nothing. Many an institution, not worth a dollar, has gone on hoping against hope that it might make a success, but finally has gone down and the people who had their money in it never got a cent.

Mr. STOKES: Do you think it wise to classify in the constitution rather than putting it up to the legislature?

Mr. REDINGTON: It is a legislative matter. I think the constitution should simply give the right, and that the legislature should make the law. However, I realize that we have been making laws, and if I could not get it in any other way I would be willing to get it through the constitution.

Mr. WATSON: The point I was trying to draw out in the question I asked a while ago was, whether you do not think it is wrong for the state to start in building up enterprises for you as a manufacturing industry and not for me as an agriculturist?

Mr. REDINGTON: I never advocated that.

Mr. WATSON: The point you made was that you would lessen the rate of taxation.

Mr. REDINGTON: Evidently, I have not made myself clear. I say where there is a plant the stocks and bonds of which are paying nothing, there should be some rule whereby you could give them some relief.

Mr. WATSON: Does not that question also arise with the farmer?

Mr. REDINGTON: If he is lazy.

Mr. WATSON: When you infer that the man on the farm is lazy, may we not also infer that the people running the manufacturing concerns are lazy, and that that is the cause of their not making any money?

Mr. REDINGTON: No, sir; it is different in the business world.

Mr. WATSON: Is not the agriculturists as much a business man as a man who engages in any other enterprise?

Mr. REDINGTON: No, sir; he has not all the temptations nor all the opportunities for a loss that assail the manufacturing man. I admit it takes a very shrewd man to be a successful farmer. I don't believe any fool can make a success in farming, when it comes down to marketing crops and running a farm, but it is a different proposition when you get in an enterprise where you have to meet your payrolls, and have to go into the market and get the raw material, and where you have to do the manufacturing and selling. The farmers needn't think they have the only hard jobs.

Mr. WATSON: Don't you think you circumscribe that word "business man" by entirely too narrow limits, when you say it takes in the one and not the other?

Mr. REDINGTON: I don't say it doesn't take in the farmer, but I say there is a difference between the farmer and the manufacturer.

Mr. ELSON: In the classification of property, you know that the great obstacle in this state would be the rural vote?

Mr. REDINGTON: I hope not.

Mr. ELSON: Would you be willing to fix the maximum limit beyond which real estate should not be taxed?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes; and I think this substitute proposal of ten mills, plus five mills under certain circumstances, is right and fair.

Mr. WALKER: If I understood you correctly, you favor concessions to corporations and industries to prevent their going out of the state? Did I correctly understand you on that?

Mr. REDINGTON: I said if you tax money unreasonably it will go out of the state, and you all know that is what they have done. There are people who claim their residence in New York who are doing business in Cleveland.

Mr. WALKER: You are in favor of granting concessions?

Mr. REDINGTON: No; I don't say grant any concessions to those people, but I say that money in bank should be paid on by the banks, and all intangible property should bear taxes according to its earning capacity.

Mr. WALKER: Say the tax rate is one per cent on real estate. You are in favor of reducing the tax rate on some other kind of property below one per cent?

Mr. REDINGTON: If it could not bear it; I would not take any of the principal.

Mr. WALKER: Would not that same principle apply also to the farmer in order to make farming profitable?

Mr. REDINGTON: I don't think the matter is analogous at all.

Mr. WALKER: If it is right to grant anything in the way of a concession in the one instance, is it not proper to grant it in the other? And is it just for the state to punish a legislator for bribery, and then itself bribe the business men in here by giving them concessions in the way of taxes?

Mr. REDINGTON: If you pass a law that will permit manufacturers to live you are not bribing anybody.

Mr. KING: Is it not a fact that in the three western provinces of Canada every municipal manufacturing corporation is relieved of taxation until an examination of their books show a profit?

Mr. REDINGTON: That is true, but I did not want to refer to it for fear they would say I was a single taxer.

Mr. COLTON: Did I understand you correctly when I understood you to say that if you would take the money away from Cleveland stagnation would result?

Mr. REDINGTON: Not exactly that. I said this: That, as a general proposition, without money, any community would not have any use for business houses.

Mr. COLTON: It is a good thing for a community to have money?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes, and a good thing for a man to have some too.

Mr. COLTON: Didn't you say that if you taxed the bonds, that they would go out into other states?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes, I expressed that idea.

Mr. COLTON: Would not the money come back into this state, and why would not it be a good thing to have the bonds go out and the money come in?

Mr. REDINGTON: And the increased interest would be paid by our material men, our laboring men and our workmen, no matter where the bonds were, and the state would get no taxes on them either.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I believe you said you believe that classification of property would reduce the taxes that are now paid generally by the people?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes. I say that if you bring upon the tax duplicate a large volume of property that is not now there, it will help to bear the burden and reduce the burden on the lesser amount that now bears the whole of the burden.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: You also said, I believe, that one object of classification was to reduce the burden on the manufacturer?

Mr. REDINGTON: I say that it is unfair to tax the manufacturer that does not make any dividend. If you come to a dividend producing company that is a different thing, but as long as they do not pay dividends why tax them so extremely?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: If we reduced the taxes on these items where would the taxes come from?

Mr. REDINGTON: Thousands and thousands of dollars of intangible property would go upon the tax duplicate. There are hundreds of millions of dollars in Ohio that are not taxed at all now.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: You know that this system in New York has not been entirely satisfactory?

Mr. REDINGTON: I am not familiar with the system in New York in detail. I have not the knowledge that would let me speak on that subject. All I ask is that we do not put an iron-clad uniform rule into the constitution so that the legislature can not classify property on some uniform basis that will be fair or just to the owner.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Then we ought to refer it to the legislature?

Mr. REDINGTON: If you have men smart enough here to provide for it in the constitution I will vote for it.

Mr. WOODS: Do you infer that the men in this Constitutional Convention are not smart enough to be legislators?

Mr. REDINGTON: No, but if you have men here smart enough to do it I will vote for it.

Mr. WOODS: I understood you to say that the general assembly could classify it, but we couldn't classify it.

Mr. REDINGTON: Possibly I am not understood all the way through as I intended. I assume, in addressing the Convention, that all the Convention would do would be to confer the right on the legislature to investigate and devise a reasonable tax law, but if this Convention is prepared here and now to say what would be a reasonable tax law, and put it into the constitution, I would not object to it.

Mr. LAMPSON: Whenever you reduce the tax burden upon one class of property, do you not necessarily increase it upon some other class?

Mr. REDINGTON: No; not if you produce a new class of property to put the taxes on.

Mr. LAMPSON: How are you going to produce a new class?

Mr. REDINGTON: By bringing out money from the banks. Before I close, I want to refer to the states that have exempted municipal bonds and the dates when the exemption was made:

Maine, 1909; Vermont, 1907; Massachusetts, 1909; New York, 1909; New Jersey, 1893; Indiana, 1903; Michigan, 1909; Iowa, 1909; Kansas, 1907; Wyoming, 1907; Oklahoma, 1907; California, 1902; Washington, 1907; South Carolina, 1903; Georgia, 1907; Wisconsin, 1911; Minnesota, 1911; Ohio, 1906.

Now, you see the trend of nearly of those states during the last few years is to exempt public bonds.

Mr. STOKES: What is the object of exempting municipal bonds from taxation?

Mr. REDINGTON: I thought I made that clear. Because they don't pay any revenue anyhow, and you borrow the money at a much less rate if you exempt them.

Mr. STOKES: Don't you think the farmer then might be exempted from taxation so that he might sell cheaper?

Mr. REDINGTON: Do you think it would make the farmer sell cheaper?

Mr. LAMPSON: Don't you think all of those exemptions to which you have referred were obtained through the influence of powerful lobbies in the legislature?

Mr. REDINGTON: If they were, for one time the lobby was right.

Mr. EBY: You made an illustration of an industrial corporation that was furnishing work for a lot of laborers, but said that the corporation paid no dividends. If I understand you you would reduce the taxes on such an institution or let that institution be tax free?

Mr. REDINGTON: No, I do not understand that the classification of property means tax free.

Mr. EBY: Didn't you say it would make it easy for them?

Mr. REDINGTON: They would certainly have to pay on their real estate and buildings, but under the rule of classification some reasonable and just provision should be prepared so that those people would not be unreasonably taxed if they are not paying a dividend.

Mr. PIERCE: What are you going to do with the farms that don't pay dividends?

Mr. REDINGTON: I didn't suggest anything.

Mr. EBY: I know of a dozen farmers who, after they pay their running expenses and the interest on the mortgage, are hardly ever able to make a living for themselves and families.

Mr. REDINGTON: You do not expect that any committee that would prepare a bill for the classification of property would make any such distinction on real estate, because it is assumed that real estate will pay something. You have to pay taxes on vacant property that yields no income whatever.

Mr. EBY: Under the present state tax system that property should be taxed according to its earning capacity.

Mr. WOODS: What classes of people are asking for classification of property?

Mr. REDINGTON: So many that I haven't time to tell. I think the farmer ought to ask for it. The man who owns real estate should ask for it. The banker and manufacturer—all of those should ask for it.

Mr. WOODS: Is the owner of real estate?

Mr. REDINGTON: Up our way they are.

Mr. WOODS: You say that a farmer should ask for it. Why should a farmer ask for classification? Does he want to pay more taxes?

Mr. REDINGTON: If the farmer asks for classification he does it because he realizes that there is a lot of intangible property that is not paying taxes, and by bringing that in it will reduce the taxes on his real estate. It does not stand to reason that he would ask for classification if he expected by classification to pay more taxes.

Mr. WOODS: Well, if anybody pays less under classification, somebody will pay more. If you let one class out for less than it is now taxed, somebody will have to pay that additional burden.

Mr. REDINGTON: But the class that you refer to as being allowed to get out at less are practically getting out for nothing now. They are not paying taxes at all. Our banks in our county will show $15,000,000 of money on deposit in the savings accounts. If you go to the auditor you will find that there is very little of that returned for taxation. There is not $1,000,000. Not to exceed one-twelfth of the actual money in bank is returned. Now, if you bring out that money from the banks and put it on the tax duplicate, why will it not produce new revenue, which will lessen the amount to be paid by those heretofore paying all the revenue?

Mr. COLTON: You gave eighteen states that exempted municipal bonds from taxation?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. COLTON: Have you consulted the digest of the constitutions that we have here on that point?

Mr. REDINGTON: No.

Mr. COLTON: Does not that say that Arizona and New Mexico are the ones that have exempted the bonds?

Mr. KING: Well, if it says that it is not so.

Mr. COLTON: The book I got my information from gives that.

Mr. WATSON: You said, I believe, that the farmer and the coal miner were asking for classification?

Mr. REDINGTON: They are.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not the state board of commerce and similar institutions?

Mr. REDINGTON: I have not consulted them. I'm not here indorsing the State Board of Commerce or speaking for them. I am speaking for H. C. Redington.

Mr. DOTY: Do you not know that the State Board of Commerce is opposed to the majority report?

Mr. REDINGTON: No; I didn't know that.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Do you know that the

Taxation.

National Tax Commission is in favor of classification of property?

Mr. REDINGTON: I know that the National Tax Commission made their report in January of this year and passed a resolution.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Mr. Foote is president of that association.

Mr. REDINGTON: I don't know anything about Mr. Foote. I don't know who he is. I have gotten some leaflets signed by him, but I don't know anything else about him.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Do you know who constitute the Ohio Tax Association?

Mr. REDINGTON: I know there is such an organization.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: And that they are in favor of classification?

Mr. REDINGTON: If they are, they are right.

Mr. PIERCE: Would there be any necessity for classification of property if the people would honestly return their property for taxation?

Mr. REDINGTON: That is a moral question. I can only answer that by saying they never have done it.

Mr. PIERCE: But that does not answer it.

Mr. REDINGTON: I know where there was an estate of a million and a half up in my section, and they made out an inventory of appraisement that showed $600,000. They had never paid taxes on that, and suit was brought, and finally, after eight years, they came in and paid $5,600 and got a clear bill. Then they found another lot of property against the estate, and the estate had to come in and pay $1,500 the second time, and yet even then they didn't pay one-fifth of what they should have paid. The whole thing was exposed in our probate court, and there was no reason why it was not collected.

Mr. PIERCE: Is it not a fact that you are asking for the classification of property because people do not return property for taxation?

Mr. REDINGTON: If everybody would return property honestly and fairly that would be another thing, but still if they won't, and if they are not paying anything, and you had a $2500 bond that I knew of I would feel like a robber to ask you to pay taxes on that.

Mr. TANNEHILL: Will you map out some simple plan of classification and tell us how you would classify the property? If you won't do it, will you not get some other classification man to do it?

Mr. REDINGTON: Do you realize what you are asking? To get up a proper classification ought we not to have a commission formed to study the subject thoroughly and prepare a bill with due care? Do you think that Redington offhand is going to attempt to give such a bill? I am in favor of the principle, but I am not going into details.

Mr. TANNEHILL: Do you not think that the classification members of the Convention ought to submit to us simple-minded members something along that line so we can study and see what it is?

Mr. REDINGTON: I wish they could. I was on that committee, but they couldn't agree on anything.

Mr. WOODS: Did not the general assembly three years ago create a tax commission, and did not that law provide that that tax commission should make recommendations?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Has not the president of the tax commission appeared before the committee on Taxation and made recommendations?

Mr. REDINGTON: There was a tax commission, I believe, appointed in 1906 or 1908, and after two years' study of this question they recommended classification of property.

Mr. WOODS: I am talking about the present tax commission of Ohio?

Mr. REDINGTON: I cannot answer what that tax commission has done.

Mr. WOODS: Did not the law provide that they should make recommendations?

Mr. REDINGTON: Then why didn't they do it?

Mr. WOODS: Have they not done it? Did not Judge Ditty appear here and advise your Tax committee, of which you are a member, of what they thought should be done?

Mr. REDINGTON: From what little I heard, I thought he was in favor of the uniform rule.

Mr. WALKER: Referring to that $15,000,000 and $1,000,000 on the tax duplicate, don't you think it would do better to have all of that on the tax duplicate?

Mr. REDINGTON: If you could do it that would be a very good thing, but there had been a habit growing up of not giving it in until the Smith law was passed. The taxes sometimes were four or five per cent, and the income would only be four per cent, so if the person gave the property in he would lose all the interest that it yielded him and some of the principal, and do you blame him for not uncovering property paying less than the taxes?

Mr. WALKER: That is not the question. That $15,000,000 has not been returned because of the constitutional provision about the impairment of contract. Is not that it?

Mr. REDINGTON: No; I don't know any provision of the constitution or the law that exempts that from taxation, but it simply is not reported.

Mr. WALKER: Is it not true that the legislation has been declared unconstitutional because it would impair the obligations of a contract; in other words, that the assessor could not compel the holder of the note to present it for taxing purposes or permitting it to be stamped because thereby the value of that note would be impaired? Is it not true that no legislation has been possible because of that constitutional limitation?

Mr. REDINGTON: I don't understand it that way. I understand the auditor can put you under oath and ask you, and if he doesn't believe you he can subpoena the bank. They simply don't do it.

Mr. WALKER: If there is nothing in the constitution preventing it, could not the assessor carry a stamp and stamp all of that sort of property, and could we not have a law refusing the use of the courts for purposes of collection unless it was stamped, and would not that be a way out?

Mr. REDINGTON: No, sir; not the way you put it. I would not be in favor of taxing intangible property as other property if it is not dividend-paying property. I do not believe in taking off any of the principal when there is no income.

Taxation.

Mr. WALKER: Your basis for taxation could be on the amount of income?

Mr. REDINGTON: On intangible property only.

Mr. WALKER: Why not tangible as well?

Mr. REDINGTON: Tangible property can be seen, and lots of it can be seen. I would even exempt some tangible property—farming implements and household goods.

Mr. WALKER: If I own a farm worth $10,000, and I am a poor farmer and do not make proper provisions for the farm or run it properly, my debts keep on increasing until finally I am hopelessly gone; but all the time I haven't been making anything. Why am I compelled to pay taxes?

Mr. REDINGTON: I cannot conceive that a man can run a farm worth $10,000 right straight along and not make anything. A man on a hundred acres of land ought certainly to make a living. If he cannot make a living on a hundred acres of land as a steady thing right along, he ought to be put in the feeble-minded institute.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: You say that under the one per cent law the taxes are higher than before?

Mr. REDINGTON: I understand that from the newspaper articles.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Can I make a statement?

Mr. REDINGTON: You can make a statement if you want to.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: An inquiry was sent out by the secretary of agriculture in March, and one of the questions addressed to all was whether the taxes were higher or lower under the one per cent law than they had been before. Five hundred and sixty-two who answered said they were higher; ten hundred and sixty-four said they were lower. Nearly double the number answered that they were lower.

Mr. REDINGTON: My understanding has been that it has increased the taxes considerably. I do not want to be personal, but the taxes on what little real estate I had increased greatly.

Mr. KELLER: I understood you to say that real estate paid more taxes under the Smith one per cent law than prior to that time?

Mr. REDINGTON: I so understand.

Mr. KELLER: Do you not know that all buildings are included in real property?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. KELLER: I wish to state this—and then I have a question—that the increase of valuation under the Smith law was 62 per cent upon real property and 61.4 per cent upon personal property, which in the aggregate, as you gave it a while ago, bore out the impression that real property was paying more taxes than before. That was the impression I got from your answer, that the farmers were paying more taxes. Do you not know that all of the tangible property is upon the tax duplicate for 1911 and at practically the same figures as 1910, and that that 61.4 per cent increase upon personal property has been almost exclusively upon intangible property?

Mr. REDINGTON: No; I do not know that.

Mr. KELLER: It is a fact. It certainly is a fact in my county. I can only speak for my own county.

Mr. LAMPSON: This is given, not as an argument one way or the other, but simply as a statement of fact: In Ashtabula county the gross amount of taxes to be paid in dollars and cents into the treasury on real estate was increased by forty-two thousand and some odd dollars, and there was almost a corresponding decrease upon the gross amount paid upon personal property, and of the decrease the Lake Shore Railroad saved $34,000 and the banks $12,654.

Mr. REDINGTON: I am satisfied that is correct. In Lorain county the increase in valuation in 1911 over 1910 was $77,000,000, and about sixty-five per cent was on real estate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I understood you to say that in your county some fifteen millions of intangible property or thereabouts was not listed for taxation, while a million was?

Mr. REDINGTON: That was approximately.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: And your justification for not listing it was that the rate was 41 mills?

Mr. REDINGTON: I didn't say it was.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Well say 40 mills, with $1,000,000 listed and $15,000,000 not listed. Suppose the $15,000,000 had been listed voluntarily, what would the rate have been?

Mr. REDINGTON: Necessarily lower.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Forty divided by fifteen?

Mr. REDINGTON: No, because there was more property than that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It would have been enormously reduced?

Mr. REDINGTON: I think so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If it had all been brought out the rate would have been greatly reduced?

Mr. REDINGTON: Can you bring it out? We can't.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You say you can't bring it out. How do you know?

Mr. REDINGTON: We never have.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That doesn't prove anything.

Mr. REDINGTON: You ought to be elected auditor of some county. You would learn some things.

Mr. MOORE: You say it would be unjust to tax nondividend-paying bonds. Does not this proposal provide that they shall be listed at their true value in money? What would be their true value?

Mr. REDINGTON: I will try to answer that. When the assessor comes around, how can he tell the value of telephone, interurban or any industrial bonds that have not paid any dividend yet, but may pay some day? It ought to pay some tax, but it is not worth its face value, and who can tell what value ought to be placed on it?

Mr. MOORE: Should you not sell them the same as a farmer sells what he has?

Mr. REDINGTON: I've got some I would like to sell.

Mr. STOKES: Speaking of the $15,000,000 that you failed to get upon the tax duplicate of Lorain county—you spoke about those securities being held by the widows and orphans, or poor people, or something like that. Do you wish us to understand that the poor people are the ones who left out that property?

Taxation.

Mr. REDINGTON: I think I said old people, the people who do not care to take their money from bank and put it into industrials. Many a man when he reaches a certain age just wants a certain income, and he will put it in bank at a small per cent, but the fellows engaged in business in your town and my town, too, are not leaving much money on deposit.

Mr. STOKES: Are these people who have that $15,000,000 the poor people that you are referring to?

Mr. REDINGTON: They are the clerks and the orphans and the widows and the farmers and the old people who don't understand how to invest money.

Mr. EBY: You speak of the vast amount of intangible property not listed. What would you have pay taxes under classification that is not available now?

Mr. REDINGTON: I would have the banks make four reports a year. I would take the average amount during the year, and I would say they would have to pay taxes upon the whole volume, and I would exempt the people who had deposited it. That would put $6,000,000 on the tax duplicate.

Mr. EBY: Is not that available now?

Mr. REDINGTON: You don't do it now. They have not been able to do it, and never can.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Madison: Do you know what part of that $15,000,000 was invested in nontaxable bonds about a week before the assessor came around?

Mr. REDINGTON: I presume that some of it was. I will say that that money is the life of the city, that it is the fund that is drawn on to build up the city. That is the money that is loaned out everywhere, and is really an indication of the prosperity of the city.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Madison: You recognize the fact that at the present time they are using nontaxable bonds to escape paying taxes—simply putting their money in nontaxable bonds just before the assessor comes around?

Mr. REDINGTON: I don't think there is a great deal of that. They don't have so many bonds around.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Madison: They have to have but a few.

Mr. REDINGTON: Oh, there are other schemes than that that they use to dodge taxation.

Mr. JONES: Is it not true that a large amount of what is called intangible property is not in the form of money in banks?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. JONES: Can you suggest any other way than those we have already, and with which we are familiar, that we may now adopt that will bring out this intangible property?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes; classification.

Mr. JONES: That could accomplish it, as I understand your argument, merely by reducing the rate. If you are fair with the people by reducing the rate, and by making everybody pay the taxation would it not accomplish bringing out the property just as well now by reducing the rate as by classification?

Mr. REDINGTON: I do not think it works that way.

Mr. JONES: Why not? We have never attempted in Ohio to enforce the tax laws. If we make an honest attempt to do that, and assess everybody, and attempt to bring out all this property, and then reduce the rate, why would not that be just as effective as to reduce it by classification?

Mr. REDINGTON: You say we have never made an attempt. You may be right in Fayette county, but not in Lorain. We have.

Mr. JONES: Haven't you said that you only got one dollar out of fifteen brought out?

Mr. REDINGTON: That is what I complain of.

Mr. JONES: Don't that argue strongly that there has not been any serious attempt made. But if every man who owned it were to pay on it the rate would be very much below one per cent?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. JONES: Is it not entirely possible that means can be employed by the state to bring out that property under existing laws?

Mr. REDINGTON: If you could get the officers to enforce them. I know men in our county that have everything they possess on the tax duplicate, and I know other men who have ten or fifteen times as much, and everybody knows they have it, and they don't list their property. If we could get the county officers to do their duty it might be a little better.

Leave of absence was here granted Mr. Tallman for tomorrow.

Mr. WATSON: A few years ago, when the one per cent law was being discussed, the largest corporation attorney in our county argued that if we would consent to have our farms listed at the full value they would come out and list their money.

Mr. REDINGTON: What is the significance of that?

Mr. WATSON: The significance is this, that that very corporation attorney, together with the banking interests, have written to me to favor classification of property as against the uniform rule. Now, what is the significance of his statement made to the farmers and his present action?

Mr. REDINGTON: He may have been a poor guesser, and I don't know his motives. I am not responsible for anyone's motives either.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not significant that the farmer and miner and mill owner are memorializing me to stand for the uniform rule, while the bankers and corporation lawyers are memorializing me to stand for classification?

Mr. REDINGTON: I do not know the view they take. I think I am right, and I am fearless enough to stand up and tell you that I think I am right. My argument may not be entertaining, but I think I am right, and I do not believe the other side is right, and I would discuss it with them, and attempt to convince them.

Mr. FOX: How do you get at the $15,000,000 on deposit? I understood you to say that the money is on interest in banks. You would get that income from the bank?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. FOX: Would you do that twice a year?

Mr. REDINGTON: What?

Mr. FOX: Arrange with the bank twice a year to look after that money?

Mr. REDINGTON: I said that every bank has to make a public statement and publish it in the newspapers whenever the national bank authorities call on them. They have to give the average amount of their deposits, and if you would tax that at one-half of one per cent and exempt the people who have the money in the bank from paying any tax, it would give us a large revenue.

Mr. FOX: Suppose they would withdraw the money for a few days, or put it on call?

Mr. REDINGTON: That has been suggested, but what effect would that have on the bank? Under my rule it would be the average, and if it were drawn out just before the tax time and put back shortly afterwards it would have very little effect.

Mr. FLUKE: Under the law now $14,000,000 of property in Lorain county is not listed for taxation?

Mr. REDINGTON: In round figures.

Mr. FLUKE: And the rate approximately is one per cent?

Mr. REDINGTON: Yes.

Mr. FLUKE: Now, in your opinion, what rate of taxation would secure the placing of that $14,000,000 of withheld property on the tax duplicate?

Mr. REDINGTON: I just answered that a moment ago. I said take the average amount deposited in bank, and put say five mills upon it, one-half of one per cent, and make the bank pay it, and the bank would pay it. Every bank in Lorain county pays four per cent on deposits.

Mr. FLUKE: Under the plan that is provided here, we could get that property just as well at a one per cent limit as at a one-quarter of one? Couldn't you get it at one per cent as well as at one-quarter of one per cent?

Mr. REDINGTON: I think not.

Mr. PIERCE: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I am in favor of the substitution and adoption of the minority for the majority report on taxation because I believe it is more in the interests of the people. I am opposed to the classification of property for the purpose of taxation, whether it is secured by direct or indirect methods. If the people of the state want the real estate owners to pay the highest rate of taxation, and those owning personal property of various kinds to pay the least rates, I have nothing to say; but I am opposed to any plan by which a taxing unit less than the whole state itself shall say what kind of a system the people may have.

It is an insidious attempt to secure classification—to favor one class at the expense of another—and it is our duty as representatives of the people to oppose it.

We should adopt the uniform rule, which is absolutely fair to all interests. I want to see all bonds of every kind restored to taxation. It will be argued that they cannot be taxed, and if they are it will result in raising the rate of interest upon the people.

They can be taxed if the public demands it. It might raise the interest rate to the extent of the tax imposed, but this should be the penalty paid by the people for being foolish enough to issue bonds.

We should relieve the debtor class from double taxation. All debts should be deducted from returns for taxation whether secured by mortgage or not.

There is no good reason why a person who has $5,000 worth of real estate in his name and which is mortgaged for $2,500 should pay on $5,000. He is paying on what he does not own. In other words, he is paying on his debts, which is unreasonable and unfair.

I hope to see this Convention correct this evil. If so, it will do more to commend its work to the people than any other act that it has so far passed.

I believe a graduated income and inheritance tax would not only be popular but just. I would not touch any income of less than $5,000, but those above that amount would be subject to taxation.

The question of taxation is the most important before this Convention, because it touches each individual in the state. That of good roads, the liquor traffic, the initiative and referendum, the short ballot, the abolition of capital punishment and the right of equal suffrage are of minor importance compared to it. It is the most important question before the people, for the right to tax involves the right to destroy. The supreme court of the United States has defined unjust taxation as "larceny in the form of law."

One of the most difficult problems the delegates to this Convention have to deal with, if it tries to do equal and exact justice to all classes of people, is that under consideration. It is a question which requires deep thought and study and should not be lightly passed by the representatives of the people.

An attempt has been made, so far as real estate is concerned at least, to list property at its full value for the purpose of taxation. Heretofore it has been placed on the tax duplicate at all kinds of ridiculous prices, ranging from a small per cent of its actual value to many times its real value. But hereafter it will be appraised at its true value as nearly as the fairness, judgment and honesty of the appraisers will permit. As this was the first attempt to appraise real estate at its actual value in money, it is not strange that gross injustices have been done in many instances, but they can be equalized and corrected in time.

It is said many of the cities cannot live under the one per cent tax rate, which may be true. For years they have been plunging headlong into debt with unparalleled extravagance, issuing bonds on slight provocation until they find it hard to economize to a degree commensurate to public necessity. But, notwithstanding, this law should be given a fair trial, and I am satisfied, if officials of municipalities will make the public dollar reach as far as the private dollar, there need be no trouble on this score. A little more economy and a little less extravagance on the part of officials will be a good thing for the taxpayers. The tax eaters may not relish it as well, but it is time to quit seasoning our official acts to the esthetic tastes of the politicians. If the cities complaining of the one per cent tax law will reduce salaries of officials commensurate to the services rendered, cut off hundreds of supernumeraries who are leeches on the body politic, and make an honest effort to live under the law, there will be much less complaint. The sooner the people take their affairs into their own hands and manage them, uninfluenced by those who devour instead of adding to the wealth of the country, the better for them.

There is another element that should not be overlooked by the taxpayers. It is the tendency to increase the rate of taxation. With the people's property appraised at its full value, and in many instances at more than it is worth, if the rate is allowed to increase above the one per cent mark, it will be virtual confiscation to thousands of property owners. It will rob them under the aegis of law of their savings of a lifetime, because they cannot afford to pay the taxes, and their property will be thrown on the market and sold for less than cost because others will not want it on account of high taxes. If half the effort were expended along the lines of retrenchment and reform in the expenditure of public money that there is for a large tax duplicate the burdens of the people would be materially reduced. Therefore, it is wise to limit and restrict by fundamental law the expenditures of public money. There should be a limit beyond which the politicians could not go without submitting the question to a referendum vote.

The question of taxation is as old as government itself. It grows out of the very necessity of government, consequently it is coincident with it.

It is necessary to raise sufficient revenue for the purpose of conducting public affairs. How to raise it has been a question that has engaged the attention of statesmen from time immemorial. Various schemes have been resorted to at different times. Political economists have advocated the proportional, progressive and economic methods as the most just. Adam Smith contended that "the subjects of every state ought to contribute toward the support of the government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities." Whether this is true or not is not important, but if a citizen is compelled by law to pay more toward the support of the government than he ought to, while his neighbor is required to pay less by the same law, the system is unjust, because it relieves one of his just share of taxes while it adds to the burden of the other. If one escapes taxation, no difference to what extent, it imposes a hardship upon the other, because it is necessary to raise a fixed amount of revenue, and if the one is overtaxed the other is under-taxed. It has been said, "Unjust taxation is bad enough when the inequality is due to the frailty of human judgment, but it is worse when it is due to deliberate effort upon the part of those who desire to shirk their share of the burdens of government."

It is now proposed to classify property for the purpose of taxation, which, in my humble judgment, is the most reprehensible method yet devised by the ingenuity of man. It is illegal, unjust and wrong. It absolutely has no merit, and is an insidious attempt to shift the burden of government upon those least able to bear it. It is robbery under the guise of law, as fatal to justice and equity as the breath of the upas is to life. It should not be tolerated by a free people, and a people who tolerate it will not long be free. It will reduce them to slavery on the one hand while it will build up a privileged aristocracy on the other. It is class legislation of the most vicious kind, and if adopted the knell of this republic has been sounded. Its tomb may as well be erected and its epitaph should read, "Perished through class legislation."

Do the people of this state fully comprehend the significance of the classification of property for the purpose of taxation? Do the farmers realize what it means to them? Do the small property owners understand it? I fear not. If they did there would be such a protest against it that no man could advocate it and remain in public life. It would forever destroy all chances of political preferment.

Just think of the monstrous doctrine of letting the legislature of the state, beset by rich and powerful corporate lobbies, say what rate of taxation one form of property shall bear, and what rate another form shall bear! It would be just as reasonable to have the foxes guard the chickens or the wolf protect the sheep. Both would have the same protection that the average citizen would get from the legislature, and its proponents under all the circumstances could not reasonably expect more.

It is admitted that real estate would be in a class all to itself and that the highest rate of taxation would be imposed upon it. Classification will not benefit real estate owners. They would have the highest rate to pay.

Now whom would it benefit? It would benefit the money-lender, the man who holds mortgages, stocks and bonds, and the owners of tangible and intangible property.

The legislature would have the power, if the question of taxation is left to it, to classify it so fine that the people of the state could have practically single tax under the system.

It could provide a small recording tax for mortgages when filed and thereafter they would be exempt, as some states have done. It could do the same thing with other forms of property, and gradually but surely shift the burdens upon those who own real estate. It will be argued that this method of taxation will produce more revenue than under the present system. It was argued that the one per cent tax rate would bring out much additional personal property for taxation, but such is not the fact. It has been found that people who would conceal their property on account of excessive rates of taxation will conceal it for the one per cent. It is not the amount that either makes the individual honest or dishonest, but it is due to his standard of morality. But it is not a question of more revenue; it is a question of right and wrong. It is the duty of this Convention to recommend a just system of taxation to the people. When it has done that it has fulfilled its mission in that respect. It should not concern itself whether a few individuals return all their personal property for taxation or not, or whether it would not be possible by adopting an unjust system to have a little more property returned by the assessor. The thing to do is to make the system just to all the people, and if some of them evade the law let the responsibility rest with them.

There is only one just way of doing this, which is by the uniform rule. Our fathers adopted it sixty years ago and it would still be in force except for the rascally acts of the republican and democratic parties in exempting bonds from its provisions. This was done by a trick of the parties, and bonds of all kinds should be restored to taxation as far as possible.

The question of double taxation should receive the serious consideration of this Convention. It ought to be avoided as far as possible. It is bad enough to tax property once, but when it comes to taxing it two or three times it is a serious matter. A person should pay taxes on what he owns, not on his debts as now. If a person owns a piece of real estate and has it mortgaged he pays on the full value of his property, which is wrong. He should be relieved to the extent of the mortgage, but no feasible plan has so far been presented. I hope some one will present a plan whereby double taxation may be avoided and justice be done to those who are so unfortunate as to be in debt. All bona fide debts should be relieved of taxation, whether secured by mortgage or not. To tax them is wrong in principle.

But the taxgatherer is ever busy. He is constantly watching the hive of industry that he may exact every cent of tribute it will stand. New objects of taxation are constantly sought. The sunshine of heaven is not permitted to bring warmth and health into our homes without a tax. The very air we breathe would be loaded with a tax if the slimy hand of the taxgatherer could be laid upon it. Hardly an article the people, eat, drink, wear or enjoy escapes its tribute.

It is time to call a halt. The government is being diverted from its rightful functions. It has no moral right to exact from the hand of toil one cent more than that necessary to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of their rights.

It would be far better, more humane, it seems to me, to try to relieve the people of onerous and burdensome taxation than to grant special favors to a certain class by permitting the legislature to exempt their property altogether, or to place a mere nominal tax upon it, while other forms of property are taxed to their full limit. Why not tax the bondholder, the money lender, and exempt from taxation the man who is constantly toiling to secure himself a little home? Why not exempt him to the extent of $500 or $1,000 that he may get a home to shelter his wife and children?

It would be far better to exempt from taxation the woodland of the farmer to encourage forestry building. The farmer, owing to the high rate of taxation at present, cannot afford to either plant woods or withhold them from pasturage. Woodland, either natural or artificial, should be absolutely exempt from taxation, provided it is used exclusively for the purpose of reforesting the country. If the municipal bonds of the state were restored to taxation, where possible, and bonds to be issued hereafter were taxed as other property, as they should be in all justice and equity, it would furnish enough additional tax to relieve woodland of taxation to a large extent without any diminution of revenue to the state. I am confident it would be of more service to humanity in general to reforest a reasonable percentage of the country than to exempt from taxation the bonds of municipalities, and I think it the duty of this Convention to provide for the exemption of woodland from taxation, as it is certainly wisdom to provide for the future in a matter so essentially important to the people of the whole state. I trust the Convention will adopt some such measure.

If it is thought expedient, I would like to see this Convention exempt from taxation real estate to the extent of $500 or even $1,000 to encourage people to own their own homes. The number of home-owners is constantly decreasing in proportion to the population. If the poor man could hold free of taxes a little home it would encourage him to acquire it and I believe have a beneficial effect upon society. It would be an act of justice and is worthy of the serious thought of this Convention.

It is not the intention of the advocates of the classification of property to assist the poor man. It is done in the interest of avarice and greed, and there is nothing equitable or just about it. The proposition should be voted down and in its place a system of taxation recommended that will appeal to the heart and conscience of the people.

The principal reason advanced for the classification of property by its advocates is that under the present system it is impossible to collect taxes on personal property. This may be true. It is a notorious fact that much personal property escapes taxation, but because it does is no reason why the uniform rule should be abolished. If it is classified no one pretends that all of it would be returned for taxation; hence if it is competent to classify it, it is equally competent to make and enforce laws for its collection if public sentiment demands it. Of the two evils, it is wisdom to choose the least, and I prefer that some property escape its just share of taxes rather than adopt a system which I feel is unjust to the great mass of people.

One of the chief advocates of classification claims "the value of property is not a just basis for taxation." He contends that "earnings and business profits, not property," should pay the taxes. If such is the case why not abolish taxes on both real and personal property? Why pretend to tax them at all?

Property, not the individuals, should pay the taxes. Earnings and business profits should belong to those able to make them, not to the state.

Taxes are levied for the support and maintenance of government, and each man, woman and child should contribute toward its support. They should pay in proportion to what they have, whether it consists of lands, money, stocks, bonds or other property. If a man accumulates $10,000 and invests it in land, there is no good reason why he should pay all the tax while his neighbor pays nothing because he invests a like amount in bonds. Place them on an exact equality before the law and it will work no hardship upon any class of citizens.

I have heard some fear expressed here that the people are drifting toward single tax. Perhaps worse things could happen to the state, but I want to remind the gentlemen who have such fear that there are two ways to get single tax. One is by classification of property, the other by the Henry George plan, and of the two methods I prefer the latter.

It was once said in congress, "The time will come when the poor man will not be able to wash his shirt without paying a tax."

The man who gave voice to this sentiment had the prophetic eye of a philosopher. The time has long been here that the poor man, nor the rich man for that matter, could wash his shirt without paying tribute to some one. If the water is free it is because the taxgatherer has not been able to appropriate it to private use and dole it out at so much per gallon.

The tendency is to tax everything on, above, and under the earth, and if anything escapes its annual tribute it is due to an oversight of the lawmakers, because they do not aim to let anything of value escape—except a part of the personal property of the rich.

All kinds of plans and schemes are being constantly devised whereby the property of one class of citizens may practically escape taxation. It follows as constantly "as night follows day" that in proportion as one class of property is released of taxation an equal amount is added to other property, because it is absolutely necessary for the state to collect a definite amount of revenue, and if it is not collected from all the property it is collected from a part of it. This is axiomatically true.

To induce the people of a state to adopt some such inequitable system of taxation, which is unjust from every standpoint, a number of catchy phrases are coined by special interests, such as—

"The taxation of personal property is in inverse ratio to its quantity; the more it increases the less it pays."

"Instead of being a tax upon personal property it has in effect become a tax upon ignorance and honesty."

"It puts a premium on perjury and a penalty on integrity."

"It results in debauching the moral sense and is a school of perjury, imposing unjust burdens on the man who is scrupulously honest."

That much personal property, both tangible and intangible, escapes taxation is admitted. Many persons deliberately perjure themselves in order to escape and practice all kinds of chicanery. This is to be expected. It has always been so, and no doubt will continue to be so until the end of time.

But has there been any better system provided? If so, what is it? Who is the author of it, where is it in force, and how does it work?

It is claimed by the advocates of classification that it will work wonders. What evidence have they of it, where has it been a conspicuous success? Will its advocates point out to this Convention what per cent of the intangible property of New York compared to the whole amount is put on the tax duplicate for taxation by reason of classification? It is no answer to say the tax duplicate has increased so many million dollars. Has it increased to the extent it should? If not, classification is a failure just as the present system. If the only difference is in the amount collected when neither plan collects practically the whole amount, it can not be defended as just.

No tax system has ever been devised, none ever will be devised, that will lay its hands upon all property alike for taxation. The cunning, the dishonest, the unscrupulous, the farseeing will always find a way to shift a part of their taxes upon the shoulders of their less fortunate brothers and sisters. This is true under the present system and it will be true under so-called classification.

The most ardent advocates of classification that have appeared before the committee on Taxation admit that they would not ask for it if the people would honestly return their personal property for taxes. Because they do not make honest returns classificationists admit they will reward their dishonesty by giving them the advantage of a lower rate. What does the average citizen think of putting a premium on dishonesty? Would it not be better to reward the honest and punish the dishonest? Why let a man take advantage of his own wrong and reward him in the bargain? Where is the equity in such a course? It may be well to be generous, but it is more important to be just. But those who advocate classification do not propose to be either, because they expect to take from one and give to another. This is neither generous nor just to either class, and when the people realize its unfairness to all they will condemn it by an overwhelming vote.

But I want to say do not increase the burden of the farmer by taxing him more. His load is already too heavy. For years he has paid more than his equitable share of taxes, and if you impose still more upon him it will be a great injustice.

Agriculture is the basis of all wealth and property. It should be fostered and encouraged, not by any undue advantage, but by equality before the law. The farmers do not ask any advantage over any other industry. All they want is absolute justice, which should be accorded them.

The farmer is the bone and sinew of the nation. He is its most valuable asset. If you destroy him, your cities will perish, because they are the product of his toil. The grass would soon grow in your streets and your property would become valueless. Let him withhold his labor from the soil for a few years and our great cities, as opulent and prosperous as they are now, would fall into decay. It should be remembered that the people are dependent upon each other. While we need the farmer, the farmer needs us, and it is wrong—criminally wrong—to array one class against another. The farmer has fed and clothed us in spite of his ill treatment in onerous and burdensome taxation, and it is unfair to longer discriminate against him. The farmer has been reasonably prosperous because of his intelligence and industry, not the favor of government.

We cannot destroy the farmer—the bulwark of the nation—by class legislation such as the classification of property without destroying ourselves, because we are absolutely dependent upon him. If he should refuse to apply his labor to the natural resources of the country we would soon be asking for bread and there would be none to give us.

The question of taxation is a serious problem—the most important that has confronted this Convention—and the happiness, prosperity and welfare of the present generation as well as the generations to come are vitally interested in its solution. It is our duty to study it well, reflect upon it seriously, ponder it thoroughly, before relieving one class of citizens of their just share of taxes and placing them upon another who have too long borne the heat and burden of the day. Do not, I beseech you, crucify the farmer on the cross of class legislation.

The thing for this Convention to do, under all circumstances, is to treat the farmer, laborer, manufacturer and business man alike when it comes to taxation. If we recommend a just system to the people and they fail to adopt it, the blame will rest with them, not with us.

There is no just rule except that of uniformity; hence the minority report should be adopted. It will restore bonds to taxation, or at least tax all those that may be issued in future, and tax property alike, whether it is in the hands of the rich or poor. If you will do this and try to hold up the hands of the tax commission of the state in its efforts to reach all personal property, I am confident the cities will be enabled to get along on the one per cent rate, and even less in many instances.

I am satisfied when the one per cent tax law has been given a fair trial, and the people realize it is to be a permanent thing, millions upon millions of personal property will come out of hiding to be placed on the duplicate. I am of the opinion we shall get as much, if not more, than we would under classification because it would rest equally upon all.

Taxation.

The classification of property is a far more dangerous proposition to the farmer and the small real estate owner than that of single tax. Beware of it!

Mr. Doty was here recognized, and yielded to a motion to recess, which was put and lost.

Mr. DOTY: The farmer has been crucified for sixty years, and all of a sudden we find the farmers standing up and saying, "For Heaven's sake, don't crucify the farmer." It is strange to me, after listening to some of the high-up officials of farmers' organizations, that the farmers should feel as they do about taxation, and at the same time should not strive for something better. We have had a scheme of taxation in this state for about sixty years, and in all of that time the farmer has had the short end of it. He is having the short end of it today, and the farmers in this Convention are now proposing to continue the short end of it for the farmer. We are confronted with a situation here that perhaps needs some analysis. The member from Portage [Mr. COLTON] has made a very careful comparison of the two measures before you, the majority report and the minority report. The question now before the Convention is the substitution of the minority for the majority report. Let us examine first the minority report.

We find in section 1 a straight, simple declaration that the general assembly shall never levy a poll tax. That has been in the constitution for about sixty years with a few more words surrounding it for a frame, but that is the essence of the declaration, and yet we have a poll tax. There is an effort in this proposal to do away with that which we now have, which is really a poll tax.

Mr. BEYER: The old constitution says that the poll tax should never be levied for county or state purposes. The levying of a poll tax was restricted in that regard, but this is a general provision. Will not this do away with it everywhere?

Mr. DOTY: It does not do away with the possibility of passing a law that citizens may pay their road tax by service. But that is a minor matter.

The fundamental difference between the two proposals is one that we may describe simply this way: One is in favor of the classification of property for the purpose of taxation, and the other is in favor of a uniform rule—the property tax.

Now, I do not know whether you gentlemen have noticed it, but the speech of the member from Portage [Mr. COLTON], and of the member from Butler [Mr. PIERCE], and the constitution as we have it today, are all based upon the idea that property pays taxes. That idea ran all through both of those speeches. The description of this scheme of taxation is called the property tax, and the member from Butler and the member from Portage distinctly said that property pays taxes. In their proposal, in section 10 is found this statement: "Taxes may be imposed upon the production of coal, oil, gas and other minerals." In section 3, "All property employed in banking shall always bear a burden of taxation," etc.

Now the theory that the property pays the tax is one of the fundamental troubles with all our thought upon taxation. Property does not pay taxes. Property never did pay taxes, and property never can be made to pay taxes, and yet our whole thought runs in that direction. Our constitution for sixty years has been keyed up on that theory. The support of that theory is made upon the straight declaration that property pays taxes, and it has been written out directly in words in the minority proposal that property pays taxes. Until we come to the conclusion that people are the ones who do the tax paying, we shall not arrive anywhere, or have any basis for building tax notions and schemes and plans. You may say that people pay the taxes, and that is true, but after all, when you get to thinking of it, you always think of property paying the taxes. All the questions that have been asked are under the theory that the farm paid the taxes, and that certain property produces income. Property does not produce income. The use of certain property by people will produce income, and the use of some other kind of property by people will not produce income, but all the thinking, and all the underlying notions of the addresses here and in your farmers' institute, and by your farmer members, as they appeared before the committee and as expressed by the tax commission of the state of Ohio, are based entirely upon the fundamental idea that property pays the taxes. That never happened yet. When we get to the point where we consider that people pay the taxes, we can build upon something true and tangible and certain. Remember that all of your double tax and your single tax and your property tax come back to the fact that men must earn money to pay taxes. Property cannot do it. That may be academic, and not germane to the question, but I have been going up and down the country for the past three years, talking on collateral tax matters, and I find that that notion that is expressed here is the notion of most people, and therefore that is the reason why I have taken this occasion thus to express this view.

The proposal that we have I think, is without exception the very worst I have ever seen put upon paper upon the subject of taxation. I have thought our present taxation plan of the state of Ohio was as bad as could be devised, and it is the worst in actual practice, so the experts say. But what do we find in this minority report? Here is one representative of the minority standing here and telling you that he is absolutely opposed to classification of property for tax purposes, and then he comes to section 10, and in answer to a question from the member from Allen [Mr. HALPHILL], he says that he feels that coal, oil, gas and other minerals ought to be taxed at a lower rate. That is all anybody ever contended for in the classification of property. In other words, the member from Portage [Mr. COLTON] is really for the classification of property, provided it is only on oil, gas, coal and other minerals. But that is a classification of property for taxation. I do not call attention to this to cast any reflections on the member from Portage [Mr. COLTON]. I only call attention to the fact that even the member from Portage [Mr. COLTON], with all his objections to classification of property, in a thoughtless moment, feeling that something ought to be done on that kind of property different from any other property, and not just for the moment realizing where it landed him, came out for the classification of those kinds of property.

Mr. EBY: Do you not realize that the constitution says that all property shall be taxed uniformly, and has it not been held that the tax you have mentioned—production tax—is not on the land, is not a property tax, and that there is a distinction between a property tax and a production tax, and that the levying of the production tax does not violate the present uniform rule?

Mr. DOTY: I do not just grasp the meaning of the member's question.

Mr. EBY: Is not the uniform rule based on the uniform property tax?

Mr. DOTY: It is supposed to be, but it is not.

Mr. EBY: Well, do you say that this section 10, that "taxes may be imposed upon the production of coal, oil, gas and other minerals" is a property tax—is not that a production tax? And is that a classification tax?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, sir; a classification of property for taxation purposes, and nothing else.

Mr. EBY: Do you not understand that the advocacy of a production tax does not violate the principle of uniform taxation?

Mr. DOTY: I do not understand any such a thing. I understand that the member from Portage [Mr. COLTON] and those who agree with him say they are opposed to the classification of property for taxation purposes, and then they propose that there shall be one little bit of classification on the production of coal, oil, gas and other minerals.

Mr. EBY: Has not the state of Ohio for three years been levying special taxes, franchise, excise, and on businesses of corporations?

Mr. DOTY: There are so many kinds of those taxes on everything that I can't keep run of them, but I am willing to agree that you are right.

Mr. EBY: Have not the courts decided that that is not a violation of the uniform rule?

Mr. DOTY: I have been compelled to admit on several occasions that my legal education is limited. I do not know about that, but if you say so, I will admit it.

Mr. LAMPSON: In that provision is not the tax proposed or authorized to be levied upon production, and not upon the coal, and not upon the oil, and not upon the minerals?

Mr. DOTY: Really it is a tax upon the man that does the work of producing coal and oil. That is what it is.

Mr. LAMPSON: It is not the same kind of tax that would be levied upon oil stored in tanks and barrels instead of being stored in the earth?

Mr. DOTY: That is right.

Mr. LAMPSON: It is a tax upon the opportunity to get the oil out of the earth?

Mr. DOTY: It is the classification of property for taxation purposes.

Mr. LAMPSON: In other words, a tax upon a certain franchise?

Mr. DOTY: Call it that if you want to. We have all sorts of classification of property now.

Mr. LAMPSON: But that cannot be classification of property.

Mr. DOTY: Well, call it a classification of effort then, because property is the result of effort.

Mr. LAMPSON: It is not classification or a tax upon coal, oil, or mineral or any other property; it is a tax upon the production of certain things.

Mr. DOTY: That is, a tax upon the man producing.

Mr. LAMPSON: A tax on production.

Mr. DOTY: Upon the man who produces.

Mr. LAMPSON: The man is not property.

Mr. DOTY: But the man pays the taxes. The property doesn't pay it.

Mr. LAMPSON: The man pays the taxes, and that would accord with your theory—

Mr. DOTY: Certainly.

Mr. LAMPSON: That it is not property that pays the taxes, but the man?

Mr. DOTY: Certainly.

Mr. LAMPSON: But that is a tax upon the effort of a man?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, and all property except land value is the result of effort, and to tax it is putting a tax upon labor. Now, I am not objecting to the tax, but I am calling your attention to the fact that in your groping for relief and for changes, while you do not see the classification, you grope toward classification or something similar.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is it not a fact, and may we not call it a principle already recognized by the courts, that classification is justifiable if they can overcome the constitutional inhibition by calling it any other name, and so while they call it production, and they call it excise or some other thing, as a matter of fact, is not the principle exactly the same, that they are putting different kinds of property in different classes, because from their practical experiences and knowledge they say that is the only practical way of securing revenue? Is not that a fact?

Mr. DOTY: That bears out the remark I made but a moment ago, that we have had classification of property for sixty years.

Mr. EBY: May I ask you a question?

Mr. DOTY: Wait a minute, one question at a time. I can get on fine, or at least I think I can, if you will just come at me singly. We have had classification for many years. For sixty years a uniform tax has been required by the constitution, but we have had classification a great part of the time. People have arbitrarily by their assessments classified their property, and that has been going on for years, and, as the member from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] has shown, they have had excise taxes, and now they are putting in another little piece of classification, and the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] is careful to show you that it is not classification. If you call it classification, it is unholy, but if you get at classification in some other way it is as holy as anything else.

Mr. DWYER: Is it not rather enumeration instead of classification?

Mr. DOTY: Enumeration is another word that they use if they don't want to use classification. It is just a matter of using words. They don't want to use something that they are afraid to say.

Mr. DWYER: Is it not an enumeration when they say, we will levy a tax on the production of oil, gas, coal, etc.?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: If you don't mention them in your list how are you going to tax them?

Mr. DOTY: You have misunderstood me. I don't oppose it.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Don't answer until I get through.

Mr. DOTY: You asked the question, and I started to answer, but if you want me to stop, I will stop, and let you ask all you want to.

As a matter of fact, the member from Wood [Mr. BEATTY] did not understand me. I am not criticising, by way of objection, that section; I am simply calling attention to the fact that it is there, and that it is just another classification of property, and you people who are for the so-called uniform rule that was never uniform, and you know it was never uniform, are just trying to hide yourselves from anything that is called classification. You think if you can just go by the graveyard and whistle, you won't see the ghost. That is classification, but you don't want to say classification. Judge Dwyer calls it enumeration. This minority report calls it a production tax, and then before that it was called an excise tax. We have been classifying property for thirty years by assessing it differently.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: We never assessed oil.

Mr. DOTY: Never assessed oil! It was just in a class by itself, right in with the churches.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Have you not valued the oil land at a higher rate than the other land?

Mr. DOTY: It ought to be. I don't know whether it is or not. I am surprised to know that it is valued higher. I know that it ought to be, and if it was valued high enough, you would not have to put in the production tax?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: You would, because one farm might have oil and the other not a drop.

Mr. DOTY: Well, I am talking about land with oil on it.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: You could not tell until you drilled.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, yes, you could.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: No, you can't.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, yes, you can. You have made your money doing it.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose under this proposal the production of coal could be taxed, and 100,000 tons of coal is produced, and it pays taxes on its production. Now when the 100,000 tons of coal is brought to the surface and stored in a bin, and could be found by the assessor, would it not be subject to another tax, a property tax under the uniform rule?

Mr. DOTY: Under the theory that all property must be taxed uniformly, it could not, but as it is, likely you are right.

Mr. RORICK: Along the line of the question asked by the member from Wood [Mr. BEATTY]. I wish to say that I represented that county on the state board of equalization in 1901, and that question came up. They wanted to raise the value of farm lands in Wood county because of the value of oil in them. I took the position that the oil was personal property, and I kept the board of equalization from raising the value of the land on the theory that the farms were one thing and the oil was another. I think that will settle the question.

Mr. DOTY: Your theory is right, if it would work.

Mr. EBY: May I trouble you with a question?

Mr. DOTY: You don't trouble me; I enjoy it.

Mr. EBY: If you and I have a farm producing an income of $3,000 a year and there is a tax imposed on that income, is not that income tax a tax upon that property?

Mr. DOTY: Of course, it is a tax upon the man that made the income. The property didn't make the income.

Mr. EBY: Is it a tax upon that property?

Mr. DOTY: No.

Mr. EBY: Then our contention that an excise tax is only a tax on incomes—

Mr. DOTY: But I haven't disputed that; I have not criticised it, nor have I approved it. I am only calling attention to the fact that the people favoring the uniform rule of taxation cannot themselves keep from classifying. They do not want classification now, and we really have always had classification. Most of our classification, however, has been by assessment.

Mr. LAMPSON: After all, ought not those people who have never asked for special exemptions be permitted to hunt around for something to make up for the burden that is unloaded on them?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; I think they should be allowed to grope around in the right direction, if they want to. Here are three or four hundred thousand people in the state of Ohio who are groping around for some way out. Most of them are asking that mortgages be free from taxation. That is nearest at hand and they can see the injustice of double taxation, and they are asking for relief in that direction. I presume that four-fifths of the people on this bunch of petitions that I have here on this desk, asking for exemption from taxation of mortgages, if you were to put the proposition up to them for the so-called uniform taxation, they would stand up just as the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] and talk for a uniform rule of taxation until their arms fall palsied by their side and their tongues cleave to the roofs of their mouths, over the wrongs of the farmers, and yet where they see a concrete case where it does do an injustice they want relief.

Mr. WOODS: Is it or not a fact that it is the people who own the mortgages that are asking relief, and not those who give them?

Mr. DOTY: Both kinds.

Mr. WOODS: Give the names.

Mr. DOTY: I have not sorted them out that way. It is too tedious. Now, here is one from the Jewish Orphan Asylum at Cleveland. It is a perfectly disinterested concern. The Jewish Orphan Asylum officials see the trouble of this uniform scheme, and they ask for relief, and they want property so classified that certain kinds of property can be made exempt.

Mr. WOODS: And they are asking for that just simply because they will be benefited if it is done.

Mr. DOTY: Did you ever know of anybody to ask for anything that was not for his benefit, or that he did not think was for his benefit?

Mr. WOODS: I am opposed to classification—

Mr. DOTY: Yes, because you have an idea that the farmers ought to pay more taxes than their just share.

Mr. WOODS: We farmers—

Mr. DOTY: We farmers! The farmers in the state of Ohio are paying taxes on their labor and on their land value, and members like the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON], who says he is farmer, and the member from Medina, who is not a farmer at all, but a lawyer, come up here and want to enact this iniquitous scheme compelling the farmer to pay some of the taxes of the city man. You can shake your head all you want to, but you can't prove anything to the contrary.

Mr. WATSON: Will you show me how the farmers of Guernsey county are going to compel the city man to pay his taxes?

Mr. DOTY: What is the name of the city in your county?

Mr. WATSON: Just take any cities, the farmers of Ohio. I am talking generally.

Mr. DOTY: Just keep to your own fireside. Maybe you can see something then. Cambridge is your city, is it not?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Any other cities?

Mr. WATSON: That is all.

Mr. DOTY: The people of Cambridge are imposing upon Mr. Watson, and Mr. Watson does not know it. That is the fact of the matter, and there is no living man on earth who can make Watson see it. Now, I will show you how inconsistent Watson is. Watson is a friend of mine. I have nothing against Watson except that he is wrong on so many things. Now, I will go back to a little history on this thing. We started out progressive. Watson was a great progressive. He and I sat up at nights trying to beat the reactionaries, and we nearly did it. Then we came down to the initiative and referendum fight, and we had quite a fight about that.

Mr. WATSON: Watson didn't want it "safeguarded".

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; but he now wants the farmers safeguarded so that they will get it square in the neck. He is for safeguards all right. Then he got into this taxation fight, and you remember how vigilant Watson was.

Mr. WOODS: Mr. President—

Mr. DOTY: You just wait a minute. I will take care of you after I get through with Watson. Watson stood up here and fought the fight of the people on the initiative and referendum. We were not afraid of the people. We were not afraid of letting the people say what they wanted. The people were great. They never made a mistake, or if they did, they were entitled to make it. Watson was a very good soldier. He went right up and down with the rest of us. He was for the people. What do we find now?

Mr. KING: How about Watson on the recall?

Mr. WATSON: And what do the people think about the Cuyahoga delegation on the initiative and referendum?

Mr. DOTY: Don't you worry about the Cuyahoga members. They can keep their end up on the progressive game with you. Now what do we find? I find in 1891, twenty years ago, there were 303,000 people in the state of Ohio who voted for classification of property. That is quite a respectable bunch of people so far as numbers, but that was the first time they had a chance to vote for it, and it might have been a flash in the pan. Some fellows like me might have gone around and fooled them. We do recognize the fact that progressives can be fooled occasionally. Then we find that in 1893, two years later, we had another vote, and 323,000 people voted for classification of property, an increase of 19,000. So it evidently was not a flash in the pan, and they really wanted properly classified for taxation purposes.

Mr. WATSON: A question.

Mr. DOTY: Just let me go for a minute. It ran along ten years and then 326,600 people voted for classification, another slight increase. Five years later 339,000 so voted. You see every time they had a chance the number of people who voted for classification increased. The people of the state of Ohio were actually foolish enough to want a change in their taxation arrangement. Now we find that Mr. Watson, notwithstanding that there are 300,000 people in Ohio who want to vote on this question, is afraid to put up the Worthington proposal to the people of Ohio, and mind you the Worthington proposal is only a halfway proposal for classification. It perpetuates the present so-called uniform scheme, and provides for classification for counties whose people vote for it, the people that Brother Watson and I are not afraid of on the initiative and referendum proposition, but of whom Brother Watson is afraid of on this proposition.

Mr. WATSON: I am not afraid of the people—

Mr. DOTY: I say you are afraid, and you know you are afraid, and you are not the only member of that committee who is afraid of the people. There are several of the members who signed this minority report that know better. There is Donahey. He knows better. I don't know whether Mr. Fluke does, but Donahey knows better. He is a valiant singletaxer. Donahey's name is signed to that report. And here is Brother Tetlow. He is not afraid of the people except when it comes to taxation. Brother Tetlow stated in a speech a while ago that he has not studied the question of taxation much, and he doesn't pretend to know where he ought to be. I think he is least to be blamed of any man on this report. I skip over Brother Colton and Brother Cunningham. They are always afraid of the people. They are never willing to trust the people.

Now, come to Brother Pierce. Brother Pierce knows better. He does know that the farmers in his community are paying more than their share of the taxes, and they are paying part of the taxes of the city of Hamilton, but unconsciously he is attempting to continue a system that will perpetuate that situation and compel the farmers of Butler county to pay the taxes of the city of Hamilton, and he is also afraid to allow the people to vote upon this question and let the people of the various counties say what they shall have in the way of taxation. Then here is Mr. Crites. He did say to me privately that he didn't think much of either report, and I will let him out.

Mr. CRITES: Do you know that I am one of the largest manufacturers and landowners in the Convention, and do you know that I have sense enough to know that we don't want classification of property?

Mr. DOTY: I don't want to have to pass upon the good sense of any member.

Mr. MARSHALL: Do you not think that all the farmers of the house—

Mr. DOTY: Wait a minute. I don't want to criticise anybody with the idea of saying that they haven't sense enough to know this or that. The member from Pickaway makes an assertion that no doubt is true, and I say when the member from Pickaway goes into Pickaway county and puts up a manufacturing institution, he is doing a good thing for that county regardless of whether he is doing a good thing for himself or not. We, of course, know that he is doing a good thing for himself, or thinks he is, or he would not do it. But when he puts up that manufacturing institution in Pickaway, he does do something good for the county. Instead of being applauded for what he has done you say that he ought to be fined for doing it. I say that is immoral and an outrage upon him, and you not only do that this year, but the next and the next. Of course, as long as you keep on fining a man for doing a thing he is more apt to do that thing. So they want the farmer to keep on just as he has been, paying more taxes than he ought to.

Taxation.

Mr. MARSHALL: I want to ask you if while you are talking for the farmer, you are really a singletaxer?

Mr. DOTY: That is absolutely true. I am talking for the farmer, and I am telling him what is so, but I couldn't make you believe it.

Mr. MARSHALL: Do you not believe in single tax?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: And you are talking about the farmer paying too much now, and you want to saddle it all on him?

Mr. DOTY: I never said and no singletaxer ever did say that he was in favor of a tax on land. That is the trouble. You don't know what it means.

Mr. WALKER: I want you to finish an idea that you started in answer to Mr. Watson's question. You said you were going to—

Mr. DOTY: I didn't say I was going to, but I said I would.

Mr. WALKER: Well, finish that idea.

Mr. DOTY: Well, I will attempt to tell you a little of what the single tax theory is, a little of what makes land values. Take a farm in a county of 50,000 inhabitants. That farm in worth $75 an acre. All the farms in that neighborhood are worth $75 an acre. That is what we are taxing. How much of that $75 an acre was produced by Mr. Watson, say, if he owns a farm, or his predecessor, and how much by the fact that there are 50,000 people in that county? The fact that 50,000 people live in a county produces a certain amount of land value. It is greater nearer the centers, where people can get to it.

Now, how much of that $75 is due to the fact that there are 50,000 people there—$5 or $10? Now, that is the part that should be taxed. Because we tax more than that is the reason why farmers are paying taxes above what they should be.

Mr. MOORE: Does not every burden of taxation—interest, dividends, tariff, increased rates, charges of all kinds, increased burdens of all kinds—fall in every case in its last analysis on the most defenseless class of society?

Mr. DOTY: That is a pretty long question, and you have to assume who are the most defenseless class of society and several other things. I expect there is some truth in it, though. You cannot produce anything, however, except land values, without labor.

On motion the Convention here took a recess until 7:30 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess and was called to order by the vice president.

Mr. Doty, having yielded the floor for a motion to recess, was again recognized.

Mr. DOTY: I think you all know I am always willing to attempt to answer questions, and I tried to do that this afternoon. I do not want to be understood this evening as declining to answer questions, but I ask the indulgence of the Convention that I may say a few things in as connected a way as it is possible for me to say them, reserving the time for questions until a little later.

There is a matter on this question of classification to which I would like to call attention by illustration only, to show how a certain class of our business men are striving for classification of property for taxation, as the member from Medina [Mr. Woods] says, because they have an interest in that phase of taxation. Before one of the meetings of the tax committee the member from Montgomery [Mr. Stokes] appeared with several building and loan and savings bank men of his city, asking us for a classification of property to the extent of allowing a different rate of taxes to be paid upon money in bank, and we had a hearing to that end. That is one of the phases that appears from time to time. Here is a set of business men in Dayton—they are in every city—and they are up against a situation that appears to affect their business. That is the reason they can see it. That is one phase of it. I apprehend that the members from Montgomery—I don't know, but from the indications and the questions one or two of them asked, and the general trend of things, it made me believe that the members from Montgomery are not in favor of the classification of property for taxation, and yet one of the members of that delegation appeared before the committee and asked to have us recommend that to the Convention.

That is one of the gropings we find on the part of the business men toward some relief from this fast, iron-clad scheme that we have now bound around our heads in the matter of taxation. I have referred already to these petitions. I shall not read them. There are too many. Most of them are in favor of doing away with the tax on mortgages. Some are for relief in other directions.

We have the same manifestation of this groping toward some change in this Convention itself. Did you ever realize what the members of the Convention have been doing toward some relief from the present method of taxation? Omitting the one by the member from Ash-tabula, inasmuch as that was not in regard to taxation anyhow, we have to do with Proposal No. 19 by Mr. Eby, relative to taxation. It appears to be a modification of the present tax scheme, and winds up by saying that no direct property tax shall ever be levied for the support of the state except in time of war. That seems to be all the new things in that.

Mr. Brown, of Pike, brought before us a proposal, to make the maximum rate on all taxable property one and one-half per cent, showing that in his mind and in the minds of the people in his part of the country there is something the matter with our present scheme. They have an idea it is the tax rate. That is the thing they can see easiest. It is the thing people talk most about. Why, the speeches of the member from Portage and of the member from Butler were made up largely of the tax rate. And it is no wonder that the people of Pike county got that idea, and that Mr. Brown of Pike, introduced his proposal. We have one from Mr. Watson. He is quite an expert. This is one of the earliest, Proposal No. 28. That re-enacts the present uniform tax rate, but this is the one that takes out the tax exemption of municipal bonds. He knows there is something the matter with the present scheme. So he introduced this to correct the evil that he could see.

So I might go through the proposals, and all through, there is some attempt at doing one thing and another attempt at doing another, but all the proposals show an indication that there is in the minds of somebody somewhere the idea that there is something rotten in Denmark on this taxation matter, that there is something the matter with the present scheme of taxation. They may not all be right. I am not saying whether any are right or any are wrong. I am only showing you how widespread this unrest is. It is not only manifested in these petitions from various parts of the state, it is not only manifested by the appearance of the member from Montgomery [Mr. STOKES] with his constituents in the banking business, but it is also manifested throughout the various counties, as shown by the action of the members in introducing proposals, first one and then another scheme or change in the present taxation laws. There is something the matter and these proposals are proof that a great number of you believe that there is something the matter, but never until this minority report, as it is called, was made had a proposal that combined as many evils in the one document been shown. They are scattered through the proposals, but this combines them all into one place, so that we can see them grouped together.

There is one particular feature of the minority report to which I desire to call attention; section 7:

The maximum rate of taxes that may be levied for all purposes shall not in any year exceed ten mills on each dollar of the total value of all property, as listed and assessed for taxation, in any township, city, village, school district, or other taxing district. Additional levies, not exceeding in any year a maximum of five mills, for all purposes, on each dollar of the total value of all the property therein, etc.

This incorporates the so-called Smith tax law into the constitution. But before I go any farther, and before I forget it, I desire to read into the record the following from the Ashtabula Gazette—I was mistaken. It is the Jefferson Gazette, but it is still a good paper.

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes; Jefferson is the county seat.

Mr. DOTY: And the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] lives there, and he used to own this paper, and it made him rich, and almost sent him to congress, and may send him there yet.

Mr. PECK: How did it come to have the name of "Jefferson"?

Mr. DOTY: I desire to have the member from Ashtabula remember this editorial when he votes upon the minority report. This is the paper that made him rich, and his son is the editor now, and he is contributing editor, and I think he has control:

The position of the Gazette in opposing the Smith tax law has again been vindicated.

We have asserted that this nefarious law was robbing the school systems of the state and putting a serious setback to rural progress along the line of good roads.

There you are, and he is right:

The Gazette does not object to the limiting of the tax rate to 15 mills, but did object to the methods of assessing land at full value before anything of real worth has been attempted to get corporate and personal property on the duplicate at full value.

We have already shown how railways save over $35,000 in Ashtabula county, banks over $12,000 and how farms and village homes pay over $48,000 more than before.

Now what is the result of this law all over Ohio?

Farmers as a whole in this county and in all of Ohio pay more taxes than ever, and yet their children have less money to be used for their education. Corporations and men with money in taxable investments pay less—making their savings out of robbing the youth of the state of proper school funds.

Farm lands were increased for tax assessment 167 per cent as against city increases of 151 per cent and against increases on corporate and personal property of 133 per cent. Thus the breach between real estate and personal property has been widened and the burdens on homes increased instead of decreased.

E. C. LAMPSON.

I call the attention of the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] to the fact that this is a nefarious law, and I have it upon the authority of the Jefferson Gazette. I do think the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] ought to hesitate, as I hope and feel that he really will, before he votes to incorporate a nefarious statute into the fundamental law of the state of Ohio.

Now, let us take up this matter of putting any limit of the tax levy. As I stated a little bit ago, we have allowed ourselves to be educated to think of a tax matter as one of rates entirely, as if when we fix a rate we have solved the problem. That is all a mistake. The rate is about the last thing that ought to be attended to in the matter of taxation. The matter that ought to be attended to first is the method of assessment, and when I come to that I want to show you why the so-called uniform rule will not work. Most of you think it will not work because some official is dishonest, or some county official is incompetent, or because people haven't consciences or are dishonest. Various reasons for the non-workability of the so-called uniform rule have been assigned. The reasons usually given are not the reasons at all. The reason is because of the method of assessment. Now, leaving aside for the moment all reference to land and land values, and all reference to money—that is, actual cash—and to all other kinds of property, there is no standard in existence upon which you can base an opinion of value, not one, and I defy any member of this Convention to produce a method for producing a standard for comparison. Now, if you have not a standard for comparison, how can you get an opinion that is worth while? The matter of valuation is but a matter of opinion except for money. Money, being that which we use to express our opinions, therefore is a standard for all expression of price. Money, of course, is of itself expressive of its own value. But when you come to anything else, eliminating now all reference to land value and money, you have no way of standardizing your valuation or standardizing your opinion. There are not two pieces of personal property in the state of Ohio that are valued on the same basis by comparison. There is not a standard by which you can make a comparison. To illustrate: Take one of these desks and the chair that goes with it. Where is the standard that gives you a chance for comparison, an expression of your opinion of the value of that as compared with the Harrison building across the street, or as compared with your piano in your house, or as compared with your watch in Toledo? There are 4,500 assessors in the state of Ohio trying to assess personal property. They are working without any standard and without any possibility of any standard, and there are 4,500 classifications of property for taxation purposes right now, today, under your so-called uniform rule, and there cannot be any other way, because each assessor must furnish his own standard. He must carry his standard with him in his own mind, and he must be a valuation law unto himself. He has no method of comparing his opinion of value with the opinion of the assessor in the next county or in any other part of the state. The result is, in a crude way, he attempts to carry a standard in his mind. That is the best he can do. And yet he himself, working on two different days, necessarily uses a different standard of value. A man will have a different standard of value before dinner than he has after dinner. That is just as true as that the sun rises in the morning, and yet you send this man out and furnish him no standard for the purpose of expressing value, and you expect all of these assessors to assess property so that there will be equality when they get through. Now, as long as you are attempting to do that impossible thing so long you will fail, and you do not fail because of anybody's dishonesty or incompetency. There are not two men in this room, I don't care what two you pick, who will go out and do the same piece of work in the same way and produce the same result, and do you not think that is just as true in assessing property? Yet we had 4,500 of those men at work in Ohio last month and we expected them to assess property equitably. The truth is they don't do any assessing. They take a piece of paper and go around to assess our property. Each one of us has a standard of value, and we express our opinion with reference to our own standard of value. We have all that kind of classification of property, and that kind of classification of property is inevitable, and it is unfair and untrue to charge a person involved in it with being dishonest.

Taxation.

Mr. EVANS: Will you permit a friendly question?

Mr. DOTY: All of the questions put to me are friendly.

Mr. EVANS: If Mr. Doty's appraisal company had out 4,500 appraisers, and fixed a standard and had them appraise the personal property, would that not come nearer to a true appraisal than what we have now?

Mr. DOTY: Absolutely not. There is no one who can devise any standard for the appraisal of personal property. It is impossible.

Mr. EVANS: Would not you come nearer to it than now?

Mr. DOTY: What is the difference between five or six per cent when you want 100 per cent? I might do a little better, but still it would be inequitable, inevitably so, because I could not procure a standard. There is no scientist or economist, politician or chairman of a tax commission, that can get a standard by which you can value the piano in your home and I value a piano in my home and do it on the same basis. That is impossible, and that is what we have been failing to do for sixty years.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like to have you answer a question before you get through, and that is how these inequalities in valuation that you have been discussing can be remedied under classification? I ask for information.

Mr. DOTY: I don't think they could be remedied to the last degree. I do think that the tendency by lowering the rate on a certain class of property would be to bring more of that property out. I am not a classifier of property for taxation purposes with any fool notion that it is fundamentally sound. That is not fundamentally sound. It is a step in the right direction to my mind, and why? As long as we have this so-called uniform rule, which amounts to a stone wall right around the state of Ohio—until we break into that wall some way and somewhere, we can never get any improvement in our tax methods, and whether we make much improvement in what we do is not of so much value in my mind as it is to get some change so that we can make some kind of an additional experiment in the matter of taxation.

Mr. HARBARGER: Will that be a perfectly exact and just way of assessing property, and if it is one step, what is the goal of classification?

Mr. DOTY: It is not necessarily a goal, but it is simply to allow the people of the state of Ohio to try as many plans of taxation as they care to. It amounts to this: If all the chemists in the world had been compelled to do their experimenting in only one way for sixty years how many experiments would they have carried to a successful termination, and how many things would they have taught us, and how many things in chemistry would we have learned? Not any, except what that one experiment produced. Now, all the difference between the majority report and the minority report is that the majority report is allowing one additional experiment, namely, the classification of property. I am not one of those who think that the classification of property is the beginning and end of all things in taxation. I do not think it is, but it is worth while trying, because it cannot be any worse than what we have had, and it does give the people a chance for an option of one or two things, and perhaps, if they continue to try one and then another, they may finally find that they want to try something else, and having gotten in the habit of trying things we may finally solve the tax problem, but we can never solve it when we stick to the iron-clad, iron-bound, hard-and-fast rule that we have had for sixty years. Mind you, there are many people in Ohio who want to try something else. There were 330,000 of them twenty years ago, and that number increased to 350,000 five years ago, and several votes between those times showed that some people wanted some kind of relief. A proposal that you yourself introduced, Mr. Harbarger, shows that you think there is something the matter with the tax laws, and that you may be right or wrong is neither here nor there. You represent a very large number of people, and you think you are right, and they ought to have a chance to say whether you are right or wrong, and if you can get this plan that you propose at work, people like you, those who feel as you do, will have a chance sooner or later to put in operation their ideas on taxation.

Taxation.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it your idea that the minds of the taxpayers are always at work against tax laws, trying to get the best of them, and that the only way we can arrive at perfection is by evolution from time to time, as the times seem to demand a change?

Mr. DOTY: I think that is a fairly good expression. That is the way in any other line of human endeavor. We don't make progress sticking to one thing.

Mr. ANDERSON: Evolution means growth?

Mr. DOTY: And it means change, too. The only objection I have to this proposal is that it doesn't allow any change.

The whole question of whether a tax scheme is right or wrong is not based on the rate, but on the method of taxation itself. The tax rate is the last thing to fix. The amount of money you spend is the same, fixed by necessity. The amount we spend is fixed by necessity, and the amount of property that we have to levy upon is fixed by the growth from time to time, either up or down. That is, some property appreciates in value and some property depreciates in value, but there is usually a net increase in the value of property in any given district. That is so in all growing cities, and so in most of our districts, though there are some places where there has been a depreciation. Those two things are fixed, one by necessity and the other by the growth in value. Now, naturally, the thing that is the result of those two, one being divided by the other, produces the rate. That rate ought not to be fixed by law, but by those two things that we start with, that we have no control over. The rate won't fix the amount you spend nor the amount you own. Property is not produced by tax rates. We do not pay taxes in tax rates, we pay taxes in dollars. The tax rate is the last thing you ought to fix. This is all hubbub about fixing a tax rate in the tax law. This Smith law is the biggest fraud that ever happened in a tax matter, and the men who originated it knew it. There seems to be a contest between the auditor and the governor as to who originated it. I hope the best man wins. It would be a bad choice for me to make.

The tax rate is not where the trouble is. As long as you have no system of assessing property, and as long as you do not have a standard, you will have inequalities and inequities, and as long as you have inequalities and inequities you are going to have people who are going to escape taxation. Why? Because they know the other fellow is doing it. You can talk all you want to about conscience and about this law and that law, and when you get through and try to tax the owners of things that can move, they will move.

There are two reasons why owners of land and buildings are more easily taxed. The first and most apparent reason is that they cannot move. That is not quite true of buildings. They will not come into existence so numerous if you overtax them. Buildings and land can be seen and cannot move, and therefore we say we will tax them. That is not the reason we ought to tax them, but that is the reason why it is easier to tax them. Now it is possible to get up a standard of comparison for the expression of opinions of value on buildings of various kinds. Buildings may be classified according to their use, and they can be sub-classified according to construction, and it is possible for experts to get at the cost per square foot, and it is possible to get at the reproductive cost, and it is possible to get up a table showing depreciation by reason of age and condition or obsolescence. It is also possible to get up a plan for a standardization of land values in cities. In the country districts we have already a unit of quantity, the acre, but in the cities we are coming to a standardization by agreeing upon the unit foot as the quantity upon which to express values. I will not go into that except to say it is possible to get a unit of quantity upon which to express judgment of value for land in cities. All that is possible for any state board to work out is a general classification plan by which assessors in the various parts of the state will use substantially the same methods of expressing their judgment. In fact, it will not vary more than three to five per cent. When you have done that, you have gone as far as any tax commission or any living man can go in getting at a unit of quantity except in the matter of money. Even notes have no standard of value. Why? If you were to take a note for $1,000 from each member of this Convention, each one would not be worth the same. I know one that wouldn't be worth much, and I know that there would be a difference of value in the whole one hundred and nineteen. Money is the only thing about which there is no different standard. You have not any way of getting at the comparative value of credit or of stocks or bonds. They vary in value. A United States bond is worth more than a municipal bond, and a municipal bond is worth more than a county bond, and some county bonds are worth more than some township bonds.

Look at your railroad bonds and stocks. There is no standard for any of them. You say par value. That is just where you start. That is a matter of starting to compute. You compute up and down, and because the par value is $100 that doesn't mean that every bond is worth $100.

You have a scheme to get at the value of personal credit or stocks or bonds or anything except money. Look at the different ways of valuing watches that we find in any city. There are not two watches in any city valued upon the same basis. Every watch is in a class by itself. Why, you have had all sorts of classification, and you didn't know it. It results in this kind of a proposal. It results in 330,000 people knowing that something is wrong, and who voted for something else, although they may not have known what they wanted.

Of course, something is wrong. The whole scheme of assessment is wrong, and you will never get anything better as long as you try to do the impossible. You and your neighbor don't value a horse the same way, and your tax duplicate shows that your horses are not valued on the same basis. Cows are not valued on the same basis. Pianos are not valued on the same basis. You have not a single item of property in the state that is on the tax duplicate upon the same basis with similar articles in some other part of the state.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes, there is.

Mr. DOTY: What?

Mr. HALFHILL: Dogs.

Mr. DOTY: I said articles of value.

Mr. ROEHM: Dogs are articles of value. I have some that are worth a good deal and I pay taxes on them.

Mr. DOTY: What I am attempting to show is that this tax rate is the last thing that ought to be put into any constitution. My own notion of a tax rate is that a tax rate ought to be fixed by the people who have to pay the taxes and have to raise the taxes to pay their expenses. I don't believe that any farmer knows all about it. And speaking of farmers, you are always speaking about the farmer as knowing not only all about how to run his farm, but to run our cities. I don't think there is any farmer member of the legislature who knows enough about the necessities of a city government to fix a tax rate for us to raise money to pay our bills with. That man does not live on a farm in Ohio, outside of Cuyahoga county at least, and I don't undertake to say that I know how much should be raised in Cincinnati or in any farming community. The whole idea of fixing a tax rate is pure political buncombe. It was put up for political purposes, simply to fool some people. The member from Crawford [Mr. MILLER] this afternoon informed the Convention that in a vote taken—I guess you only gave the number of those whose taxes under the Smith law were raised?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I gave 400.

Mr. DOTY: I think there were 500 raised and 1,000 lowered. Now just see how misleading that statement is. I don't mean that the member from Crawford [Mr. MILLER] made any misleading statement, but the paper is gotten out as a part of the political buncombe of the state. It is gotten out by the agricultural department, is it not?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: And that was gotten out to bolster up the so-called Smith law, and they tried to show, and the member read it as if it did show, that the Smith tax rate had raised or lowered taxes. Perfectly preposterous.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: That was only one of forty questions.

Mr. DOTY: I didn't know that, but I have stated the number right?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: That is the only one of the forty in which I am interested at this time. Of course this Smith one per cent tax rate didn't raise or lower anybody's taxes. That is not the way taxes are raised and lowered. Taxes are raised and lowered either because you spend less or spend more money, or provide to spend some more money next year, because taxes are raised a year ahead. The tax rate has nothing whatever to do with it. The tax rate of that thousand people would have been lowered whatever the tax rate would have been, and the taxes of the five hundred would have been raised whatever the tax rate was. The tax rate didn't have anything to do with it, and it is pure unadulterated buncombe to put the tax rate in a state law or a constitution and get out statistics that would mislead a gentleman like the gentleman from Crawford, and make him get up and make a statement and read statistics as he did, because I know he knows the tax rate did not raise or lower those taxes. Yet to carry this political buncombe further, we are asked to embalm it in the constitution of Ohio, and I hope my friend from Ashtabula won't forget this when he votes on that question.

Mr. DWYER: Was not the rate fixed by the legislature with a view of getting more personal property on the tax duplicate?

Mr. DOTY: I am glad you said that. That is true. I heard the chief executive make that statement in Memorial Hall. He said if you put real estate up to 100 per cent it will bring out personal property in the state of Ohio. But what has it done? Of course, every one has to speak of his own county. All they are doing in our county is to multiply the old personal property assessments by three, and bring the amount of the assessment up so that the amount of the Smith law will raise the revenue needed. That is the way the property is assessed. Outside of land and buildings there is not any property in Ohio assessed on any kind of a basis.

Mr. EARNHART: Is your argument in favor of the majority report or the minority report, or is it an argument in favor of single tax?

Mr. DOTY: Of course, that is a matter of opinion. I have never concealed the fact that I am in favor of the single tax, as far as I know. But outside of a slight reference to it before supper I have not made any reference to the single tax. It seems to me, however, that this idea of charging the state authority and the general assembly with having no scheme of assessing personal property has nothing to do with the single tax. It is simply a question of common honesty. I say it is time to stop attempting to do the impossible, and if you classify property we will tend to get away from that impossible task, because the personal property is not assessed on any uniform basis at all. You don't produce any wealth on your personal household property, and why should you be assessed or taxed upon the basis of ownership of such property?

Mr. EARNHART: How are you going to tax personal property at all under classification? How are you going to arrive at a conclusion as to the value?

Mr. DOTY: I have tried to show you that you cannot arrive at it.

Mr. EARNHART: Then that is single tax.

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; not within forty miles. Don't be afraid of single tax. It is not here, and will not be for quite a while.

Mr. DWYER: You remember when this rate was fixed by the legislature some action had been taken in the city of Baltimore, and it was claimed in the city of Baltimore that by reason of the system they had adopted they increased many million dollars on the tax duplicate?

Mr. DOTY: You are mistaken about one part. If I remember rightly, all there was to that Baltimore business was that they reduced the tax from the property tax standard to a filing tax on bonds—

Taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: A stamp tax on mortgages.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] can state the facts on that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The facts were set forth before the committee on taxation in a printed report from the state board of taxation in Kentucky, urging the legislature and the governor to change from the uniform rule of taxation to the classification tax, and in this printed report they quoted the following statistics in round numbers from Baltimore, where the law had been recently changed from uniformity to classification:

In 1896 under the uniform rule of taxation the city of Baltimore reported $50,000,000 and odd of personal property, on which the state collected $150,000. The law was then changed to classification, and under classification the city of Baltimore, inside of ten years, reported in round numbers $160,000,000, which under a reduced rate under classification brought to the city of Baltimore $450,000 in taxes.

Mr. DOTY: I am reminded by the member from Butler that the tax commission has attempted to value certain public utilities at a unit for expression of value. The commission has arrived at a unit for the valuation of certain utilities. But coming to the matter my friend from Warren speaks of, no man has ever devised a scheme of standardizing the opinion of the value of what we call personal property—credits, stocks and bonds or notes.

Mr. FLUKE: You said the assessor left a blank with you and you made your own assessment?

Mr. DOTY: I make a return, a pure guess.

Mr. FLUKE: Is that the rule in the state of Ohio?

Mr. DOTY: I don't know. I only know that is the rule in my neighborhood. I don't care whether it is a rule or not, if an assessor comes into your house with a paper in his hand and attempts to assess property belonging to you, he still has no standard for the expression of his opinion that compares with a standard that is used by the man next to him or in the next county. I do not care how carefully the work is done, or how much thought or care the man attempts to put upon it, I only say that he must do that. I leave it to the gentlemen here as to whether that practice that I have referred to is not prevalent?

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to say that the custom Mr. Doty has referred to exists in Franklin county.

Mr. DOTY: And in all the large counties. The Smith law was the result of a joke. There was a bill before the taxation committee of the house. It provided for a limit of one and one-half per cent. The members were talking it over in a desultory way, and one of the members thought it was such a preposterous thing to provide such a levy that he would make a joke of it, and he moved to strike out the one and one-half and make it one. That is where the thing started. It started as a joke on the floor, and then both sides took hold of it and the first thing you know the law was passed and we were all hurt by it.

Mr. MARSHALL: Who was hurt?

Mr. DOTY: The city of Cleveland, the city of Cincinnati, the city of Columbus, and every growing city.

Mr. MARSHALL: How are they hurt?

Mr. DOTY: They cannot get enough money to run themselves, because that is not the way to raise taxes. It is immoral. By what authority do you people in Coshocton want to tell us what to do in Cuyahoga county? You haven't any business to do it.

Mr. MARSHALL: Can you fix that right?

Mr. DOTY: We are trying to fix it. We are trying to fix it here. If you want to help us do right, vote for the majority report. I am afraid you won't do it. You say you are in favor of the initiative and referendum and home rule, but your votes don't show it. I hope you will finally vote with us yet.

Mr. MARSHALL: You said a minute ago that there was no man in Cleveland who was able to fix a uniform rate of taxes?

Mr. DOTY: No; I didn't say that. I said there was no man living on earth who knew how to fix a standard for the correct valuing of personal property.

Mr. MARSHALL: Then, if there is no man who is able to do that, what remedy can you have?

Mr. DOTY: Use a system that doesn't attempt to do it. Don't try the impossible. Don't do it at all.

Mr. MARSHALL: That's what I say.

Mr. DOTY: Then you agree with me all right.

Mr. EBY: I have the last printed report of the auditor of state, and I find that in Cuyahoga they have 650,000 people, and they return less than $2,000,000, while Preble county, with 23,000 inhabitants, returns over $2,000,000. You return less than $3 for each inhabitant and we return $90. Do you not think there is some truth in what the tax commission said, that the trouble was not in the one per cent tax law—

Mr. DOTY: I don't claim that the one per cent tax law produces that. It was the method of assessing. The tax rate is not to blame for many things that the people blame it with, and it does not produce the good result that anybody claims.

Mr. EBY: What cure are you going to have for the situation?

Mr. DOTY: I want practical classification, and the first thing is to do what they do in Pennsylvania, eliminate the attempt to tax people on nonproductive personal property. You do not make any money out of household goods. A few people do by keeping boarders, but the most of us do not. What is the use of taxing people on nonproductive goods? Now that could be classified so low as to amount to exemption. As the member from Lorain said, I do not propose to stand here and get up a whole new tax code. It cannot be done. I am pretty smart, but I am not that smart.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose the county under classification would exempt money in a savings bank entirely from taxation. What effect would that have on money in savings banks in an adjoining county where it is taxed?

Mr. DOTY: It would have this effect: In my judgment, if it turned out to be a good thing and a wise and beneficial thing to do, that particular county next to the county that exempted such deposits would have to do the same thing to retain its deposits.

Mr. LAMPSON: They would be compelled to do it?

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, if it were a good thing.

Mr. LAMPSON: It would be a good thing for the people owning money that was exempt.

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: What about the rest?

Mr. DOTY: It would be just as the gentleman from Preble said. How much money did you say there was, Mr. Eby?

Mr. EBY: Two million dollars.

Mr. DOTY: Do you know that there is more money on deposit in one bank in the city of Cleveland than in all the banks of all the cities of the rest of the state put together? Did you know that?

SEVERAL DELEGATES: That is not true.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, it is true, and it gives me a chance to boom our town a little, and out of all that money there are only $2,000,000 on the tax duplicate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Our clearing house shows a great deal more than the clearings of Cleveland.

Mr. DOTY: We have got the money in bank.

Mr. PECK: We do business with ours.

Mr. DOTY: Let me tell you something about the clearing house in Cincinnati. If the clearing house in Cincinnati will only comply with the national rules when reporting their clearances they won't be so big.

Mr. PECK: They do.

Mr. DOTY: I beg your pardon—

Mr. PECK: You have to beg my pardon. You don't know.

Mr. DOTY: The last time I knew anything about it they didn't, and that was just a year ago.

Mr. PECK: I would suggest that you confine yourself to facts that you are acquainted with.

Mr. DOTY: I am confining myself to facts that I know about, and I know there is more money on deposit in Cleveland than all the rest of the cities of the state put together.

Mr. PECK: You haven't got any bank in Cleveland with as much money as the First National Bank of Cincinnati. I will leave that to Mr. Antrim or any other banker. You have a savings bank that has a very large deposit, but your active commercial banks haven't half as much as the banks of Cincinnati.

Mr. WOODS: Why, we have more money in Medina than in Cleveland apparently.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: If the city of Cleveland would pay its debts, it wouldn't have any money in bank at all.

Mr. DOTY: That may be, but the city of Cincinnati owes more than we do.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: We have got a great deal more to pay it with, too.

Mr. DOTY: Well now, to come back, there are $300,000,000 on deposit in the city of Cleveland, and, just the same, that is very much more than they have on deposit in Cincinnati. But that is not what I am coming to. The member from Preble says that we only have $2,000,000 on the tax duplicate.

Mr. EBY: The actual money returned for taxation is $2,000,000.

Mr. DOTY: That is what I thought you meant. Out of $300,000,000 we have $2,000,000 on the tax duplicate. What a farce that is. Some people say that if the people of Cleveland were honest that would all be on. That is not true. The people of Cleveland are just as honest as any other people, including Cincinnati, and I believe Judge Peck will agree with me on that.

Mr. PECK: I don't know much about that.

Mr. DOTY: My statement ought to be good to you for that.

Mr. PECK: All right.

Mr. DOTY: It is not the dishonesty on the part of the tax officials. It is simply that we are trying to do an impossible thing. All of you have been trying that same sort of thing, and you have been trying it and trying it, and had all kinds of drastic laws, and you have never succeeded yet.

Mr. WATSON: Will a change to one per cent or one-quarter of one per cent bring that out?

Mr. DOTY: It will bring out a good deal. If you will put your taxes at one-tenth of one per cent you will get more and more taxes on it.

Mr. WATSON: That's a question of honesty.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, and I say to you that if you put your taxes at one-tenth of one per cent, you are going to get more money returned and more taxes will be collected than if you had it at 1.37.

Mr. WATSON: Then the lowering of the tax rate to one per cent or a quarter of one per cent or one-tenth of one per cent is the premium you ask us to pay on the dishonesty of those people who fail to give in their money.

Mr. DOTY: There is not a premium on dishonesty. It is not a premium on anything. It is a matter of common ordinary horse sense, to do what we can do, and not attempt to do what we cannot do.

Mr. WATSON: What reason have we to believe that the man who will not pay his taxes when they are one per cent will pay them if they are one-quarter of one per cent?

Mr. DOTY: Lots of people will lie for one per cent who will not lie for one-tenth of one per cent.

Mr. LAMPSON: I reduces itself to lying after all.

Mr. DOTY: That is what is going on in every city in the state, and on every street, and in every house on every street. Talk about lying, of course it is. You compel us to lie. You are putting a tax on honesty. That is all the property tax is. The man who is ultra-honest will put his money in at a full rate and pay even up to four per cent, because the law says he shall. Well you and I and the rest of us, putting us all together, don't do it. You can call it lying if you want to, or you can call it anything you choose. It has been going on for years and years, and it will go on for years and years more if the member from Guernsey and the member from Portage have their way about it.

Mr. EARNHART: Would it not be wise under existing conditions for our tax commission to make an example of some of those fellows in Cleveland?

Mr. DOTY: Oh, yes; it will have a great effect. The fact is we have had some examples made, and that is all it has amounted to. A treasurer of our county, after he had been elected the second time, said that he was going to collect the personal property tax, and he got a great big moving van, and put a sign up "Tax Collector," and he gave it out that he was going to back that van up to the place where the property was, and he was going to collect that tax. He lasted about three days. I never did know what became of the moving van. I never heard that he collected any taxes. He gave it up, although he had given out that he was going to make a horrible example of somebody. The tax laws! We have had a whole lot of horrible examples made in different counties of the state. They have made them in other places than in Cleveland, and how much property was there on your tax duplicate after you got through making the horrible example? Not fifteen cents. The member from Lorain gave the figures from his county. They put on the duplicate two or three millions.

Mr. REDINGTON: They didn't get it on.

Mr. DOTY: But it was in their county. Take any county where they had a tax inquisitor. They had several thousands of back taxes, or several millions, that they said ought to be on the tax duplicate, and they proceeded to put it on there, so they said. But if they put it on there, the tax duplicate ought to have gone up, but the tax duplicate next year wasn't affected by it much. But just find a county in the state of Ohio where the tax duplicate was that much greater the next year. Not in one case can you do it. That is the horrible example. How does that happen? What is the explanation of it? They move to New York or Chicago or Jersey. They move out of the county. If they don't move, they resort to all sorts of subterfuges, and you can't get that property. If you attack them too closely people with movable property just move. They take their property with them. Horrible examples! We have horrible examples by the score. As the member from Preble points out, there is less money on the tax duplicate in the county of Cuyahoga than in some other counties in the state where we know they haven't anything like the money that Cleveland has.

Mr. EBY: Do you know that by the untiring efforts of the state tax commission they had less in 1911 than in 1910?

Mr. DOTY: I didn't know that. I am not complaining of the tax commission. They are doing good work. So far as I have been able to observe they are doing their duty to the best of their ability, and with courage, and it takes courage to run the job they are running. But the thing I criticise them for is that they stand for this uniform rule that they know can never be carried out.

Mr. WATSON: Do you agree with us that the tax commission has been doing noble work along this line, and that they have been making some improvements, and if that is so, why not let them try this matter out to a conclusion, and let them finish it?

Mr. DOTY: I have no objection to that. Do you agree to that?

Mr. WATSON: Under the uniform rule.

Mr. DOTY: Well, why not let us postpone the whole matter and let them work it out?

Mr. WATSON: Oh, no.

Mr. DOTY: You won't agree at all. You just want your way.

Mr. WATSON: This minority report is in harmony with their work.

Mr. DOTY: I will tell you what I am willing to do as a sort of compromise. The member from Medina [Mr. Woods] asked us why we didn't take the recommendation of the chairman of the tax commission. Will you take that?

Mr. WATSON: I have not read it.

Mr. DOTY: Do you not think they know what is in line with their program?

Mr. WATSON: Mr. Doty is in line with Allan Ripley Foote —

Mr. DOTY: It is always Allan Ripley Foote. Allan Ripley Foote is against the majority report, and so are you. Don't say you don't know he is. There is no use denying that.

Mr. WATSON. He has never made any report to me.

Mr. DOTY: Nor to me, but I report it to you, and I know what I am talking about. If you will take the direct recommendation of the state tax commission and frame that in a proposal and send it back to the people, all well and good.

Mr. WATSON: What part of the minority report is not in harmony with that recommendation?

Mr. DOTY: The tax rate.

Mr. WATSON: Do you propose to put Judge Ditty's speech in?

Mr. DOTY: I am talking about the specific recommendation. Of course I do not propose to enact that speech. It was the ablest speech ever made in furtherance of an erroneous scheme of taxation.

Mr. WATSON: You said you were in harmony with his speech before the Taxation committee?

Mr. DOTY: Let us take Judge Ditty's specific recommendations if we are in favor of the state tax commission program. Let us give them what they ask, and let them go on for four years and work it out. There is no sleeper in this. You can understand it in half an hour.

Mr. KEHOE: You said a while ago that you thought the tax commission was the best thing that ever happened. How would a subcommission, operating with the state commission in the different counties, improve its work?

Mr. DOTY: I do think that our scheme of assessing real property could be very much improved upon by having one assessor for each county, not a number of assessors, but one assessor, one man.

Mr. KEHOE: One chief in each county?

Mr. DOTY: Let him carry on the work under a plan that can be worked out. It is being done in other places where you get better uniformity in the valuation of lands and buildings. I think that would be a great improvement. I maintain this, that the assessing divisions ought to be coextensive with the larger tax divisions. Take my county, and we have twenty-six assessing divisions in Cuyahoga, and that means there are twenty-six judgments on the valuation of lands and buildings, each one separate from the other, and after those twenty-six separate judgments have operated, and have put their opinions on paper, there are necessarily inequalities of valuation in various parts of the county. That could be largely obviated by a single-head assessing division, the assessing division being co-extensive with the taxing division, and one man at the head, with a proper amount of authority to assess, could do quite a job of assessing so far as land and buildings are concerned. It could not help much on the other.

Mr. HALFHILL: Referring to the question asked you by the member from Brown county [Mr. KEHOE], how would you have that tax commissioner for the county elected?

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: My notion is he ought to be selected by the tax commission. That is the best way to get the most efficient service. Of course, I recognize the fact that the political aspect might interfere with that program, but in my judgment that is the best way to do it.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then you would govern the whole arrangement from Columbus?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; I would standardize the method, and that can only be done from a central authority. Of course the question of exercising judgment ought not to be governed from here, and cannot be. You cannot get up a scheme to govern a man's judgment, but you can get up a plan by which various men will exercise their judgment substantially in the same way, using substantially the same standards of comparison. But the matter of valuing the thing is a mental process. It cannot be done by law. It cannot be done by any central board or any other kind of body. It must be exercised by the man in charge of the work. That is mental work and you can get up a system that will assist him in using his mental faculties in substantially the same way and along the same line as others. He can use the same yardstick with which to do his measuring.

Mr. HALFHILL: Would not you be getting the government a good way away from the people by putting this in charge of a commission appointed by the governor?

Mr. DOTY: It is according to what you call government. Of course, I, myself, believe in centralized authority, and centralized responsibility. Now there can be no centralization so far as mental operations are concerned. There is no way to make a man think in Cuyahoga and Montgomery and Highland the same way.

Mr. HALFHILL: Why have not the people the right to elect their own assessor?

Mr. DOTY: Suppose they have a right to elect their own assessor. If you want to produce inefficient results, let them elect their own assessor. Of course, that officer should not be selected as you would select a lock-tender or a hay-wheigher or a policeman.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is not this centralization, getting government away from the people, a little dangerous thing?

Mr. DOTY: I don't think so.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is it possible that we cannot after all trust the people?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Do we understand that we now have twenty-two progressives?

Mr. DOTY: I didn't know that you had gone back on us yet.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I referred to you.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, no; I apprehend I missed Brother Halfhill's question. Probably the joke is on me. I didn't understand it, but I will ask him about it when I get through.

Mr. WATSON: Is this safeguarded?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; for your benefit I will say it is. You are in the safeguarding class, the jigger class.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is there anything about this doctrine that is squarely "de novo"?

Mr. DOTY: I must make a point of order on that, because it is clearly out of order to raise the "de novo" point when the member from Highland [Mr. BROWN] is not here.

Mr. MOORE: Going back to this matter of the chief assessor in the county, is not that function now performed by the county auditors, who call in the various assessors and instruct them in the manner referred to by the member from Brown county?

Mr. DOTY: You are referring to land and building assessors?

Mr. MOORE: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: No; that is not just exactly what is done. He does call them in, but when they get away they are a law unto themselves. He has no control over them. He ought to have, but he has not.

Mr. MOORE: He may not have the legal authority, but he controls them.

Mr. DOTY: He does if he is a political boss, but he does not legally.

Mr. ULMER: The legislature gave the governor power to appoint the tax commission?

Mr. DOTY: I think so.

Mr. ULMER: Now the tax commission is working?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ULMER: And would it not be wise to let the whole tax question rest, leaving it to the legislature, and let us wait until that commission has worked out a system by experience? Would not that be much better, to leave the whole thing to the legislature after they get the reports and recommendations from the commission?

Mr. DOTY: There is force in that. I thought Brother Watson had almost agreed to that, but he went back on me.

Mr. STOKES: Will the classification of property tend to make the judgment of the assessors any better than under the uniform rule?

Mr. DOTY: No, but it would tend to make the owner of the property a little more nearly honest.

Mr. DWYER: My experience with these assessors is that the most of them are broken down politicians. They are selected by their wards out of sympathy. Half of them are selected for political sympathy, and they are entirely incompetent to do the work they are selected to do. I know that has been the way with us. I know one man who was selected as the decennial assessor who had a hat store. That is the kind of man selected to value real estate and buildings, and how could we have a correct assessment?

Mr. DOTY: My observation on the competency of the assessors has been somewhat wide. I have investigated the assessments in fifty American cities in the last few years, and I find this to be the fact: That while there is some incompetence on the part of the assessors occasionally, and some slight dishonesty, but not much, the great trouble is with your system, by which they may express their judgment. Take the man you speak of, who sold hats. He might have been able to make a good assessment. The kind of men who are elected in cities need not necessarily be what you call land-value experts. It is not a question of knowing what the value is, the thing is to know how to find out what the value is. The people in your city who know more about the value of the land than anybody else are the people there who use the land. The people in this city know more about the value of the land here than any five men living elsewhere. The assessors you had last time—I met them two years ago—were good ordinary, average citizens. If those men had had a proper system by which they could express their judgment and get the people to express their judgment, they could have made a first-class assessment of that city, notwithstanding they were not real estate “experts.” The real estate expert is really not necessary for a good assessment, and I don’t say this as casting any reflection on real estate men; but men dealing in real estate are really not the best judges on the value of real estate usually. The best judges of the value of real estate in cities are the merchants and the men who will say how much they will pay to get this or that place to do business in. They are the best judges of land values in the cities. The trouble of expressing your idea of the value of land in cities is because at present in most cities you have not any unit of quantity upon which to express your judgment. In the country that is not true. In the country we have always had a unit of quantity upon which to express our judgment of value, namely, the acre. Every man in the country knows what is meant by an acre. If you say there are ten acres, he takes a survey in his mind of what that means, but when you come to say that land is worth so much a foot in the city you are then attempting to use a unit of quantity that does not mean anything. A foot on High street is worth more than a foot some place else. It has depth. It may be irregular. It may go to an alley; it may not. It may be far from a corner or on a corner, and all those things must be taken into consideration, and must be known before you can express your opinion of value. There is no unit of quantity. The way to do that is to assume a foot wide in the middle of the square with an agreed depth, say one hundred feet, and with no alley. Then you have a unit that is the same everywhere. That is a unit of quantity on which you can express yourselves, and then you can express your opinion of the value of the street. We really do not value land in a city, but we value streets. I only give you a little of this to show you that there is a way possible to standardize your city land values, but I defy any man in the room to show me a method of standardizing a unit of quality, or a standardization for the consideration of the value of personal property of any kind except money.

Mr. HALFHILL: Did you as chairman of the committee on Taxation, or did your committee have brought to its attention, any constitutional provision in any state which attempts to fix a limit of tax rate, or a limit beyond which no tax can be levied for counties, cities and villages, school districts, etc.?

Mr. DOTY: I do not recall any, and I think not.

Mr. HALFHILL: In section 3 of this minority report there is a provision that seems to correspond with section 11 of the majority report, as I understand it. Now, I would like to know just what those two sections mean, whether there is any difference?

Mr. DOTY: I am glad you called my attention to that. I forgot it. Of course, it is necessary under the majority report to do away with the state tax levy. That has to be done to make this proposal workable. Why they put it in the minority report, I do not know, except to have as much of the majority report in the minority report as possible. There is this difference in the two. If I am wrong Mr. Watson will correct me.

Mr. WATSON: Will the gentleman yield for a motion for recess?

DELEGATES: No.

Mr. DOTY: The only difference that I know of is in the manner of providing the common school fund and the university fund. Years ago it was insisted that the universities should come to the legislature, and there on bended knee each year beg for money for bread and butter. That is what it amounted to. That is, they had to come before the finance committee of the house and senate, and lay before them a long list of things they needed for tuition and repairs, and a whole rigmarole of things that were needed to keep up the university and we usually called those bread-and-butter bills. There was jealousy between three or four institutions that resulted in a good deal of pulling and hauling. Sometimes there would things happen here that verged almost on scandal. At any rate it was a very distressing situation, both for the schools themselves and for the members of the legislature. What we were really doing was to employ a president of the university to run the university and then compelling him to come up and beg money out of us to pay his salary. About fifteen years ago it was decided by the general assembly, and this policy has been maintained until today, that the tax levy should be placed on all the property of the state for university purposes and whatever money that produced should be divided between the four institutions upon an agreed basis, which has never been changed. That put the universities in a position of not having to come up and beg for bread and butter every year, and that has been the situation for fifteen years. Now, of course, in the wording of the proposals, when it was determined to put up a proposition that necessarily did away with the levy for state purposes, it was also necessary to do away with the state levy for university purposes, and then one of two things will be necessary. Either the universities would be compelled to go back to the old program of begging for their bread and butter, or we must provide for them in a way that they will at least have as much as they have been having for the last few years, and the latter was agreed upon by the subcommittee of the majority, and that is why this provision was put in lines 9, 10, 11 and 12.

Now $750,000 is a little higher. I think Mr. Colton was in error last night about $625,000, but it was distinctly stated that this was considerably higher, but if this is too high it can be easily modified in the Convention if they adopt the majority report. This was put in with the idea that we might call attention to it, and it could be fixed to satisfy the majority of the delegates. I think that is the only place where there is a difference in the two proposals upon doing away with the state levy. That is true, Mr. Colton, is it not?

Mr. COLTON: I think so.

Mr. DOTY: Mr. Colton has dwelt upon the advisability of doing away with the state levy, and as I agree with him in that particular, I do not need to go into it further.

Mr. HALFHILL: How about the school fund?

Mr. DOTY: The school fund has been paying $2 per capita for the last few years for each enumerated youth. That is paid to the counties and by the counties paid back to the school district, and if we do away with the state levy we would do away with the levy that provides that money out of which that $2 is paid, and we provide for that as well as the university fund.

Taxation.

Mr. KNIGHT: The state school fund has for years been receiving a specific fraction of a mill upon the tax duplicate out of which this distribution is made.

Mr. DOTY: That is true. There is a direct levy for that purpose, and has been for more than fifty years. For twenty or thirty years it was $1.50 and for twenty years more it was $2, and we put that as low as it has been for the last twenty years. I think those two items are all.

Mr. HALFHILL: I want to ask a question, and I shall have to read from the report to get the question. Section 3 provides: "Every assessment upon the counties of the state under the preceding section, shall be apportioned among such counties ratably in proportion to the aggregate amount expended during the preceding year in each county, by the county and all political subdivisions thereof." What does that mean? That same thing practically is in section 11 of the minority report.

Mr. DOTY: The provisions of the minority report are based upon the possibility that the legislature may do away with the state levy, but in the majority report the state levy is done away with. Section 3 of the majority report provides for a method of getting enough money to run the state government after you have levied all possible under the excise and other taxes provided in section 4. The state is allowed first to get all the money it can—I don't find it just this moment—but we are levying all sorts of taxes. We will raise about half the money on corporations by way of excise taxes, and that is to be continued, and the difference between that and what the state needs will be charged ratably against the counties, and each county will be required to pay enough to the state treasurer ratably in proportion to that which the county expended in the aggregate the preceding year.

Mr. HALFHILL: It doesn't seem plain to me.

Mr. DOTY: First, we provide that the state may raise a certain amount of the necessary money by excise taxes, and assume that is $2,000,000. Now, assume that the state requires $4,000,000 to run its business.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: It has raised $2,000,000 by excise taxes, and it needs $2,000,000 more. That is charged against the counties, and the statements go to the counties, and the $2,000,000 is assessed against the counties ratably in proportion to what each one used for its own expenditures the year before.

Mr. HALFHILL: Of its own funds?

Mr. DOTY: No, sir.

Mr. HALFHILL: Well, that is not plain to me.

Mr. DOTY: Perhaps there may be a word or two necessary to make it clear. What it means is in the way of expenditures in the county of county funds.

Mr. HOSKINS: Would that cover an expenditure by a county to build a court house?

Mr. DOTY: I think not, but under the provisions of that proposal it would be up to the legislature to provide what should or should not be used.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Stalter.

Leave of absence for the remainder of the week was granted to Mr. Smith, of Hamilton.

Leave of absence for Thursday was granted to Mr. Tallman.

Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, moved to recess until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was carried and the Convention recessed.

SIXTY-SEVENTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

(LEGISLATIVE DAY OF WEDNESDAY)

THURSDAY, May 2, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to recess, was called to order by the vice president and consideration of Proposal No. 170 was resumed.

Mr. Doty, having yielded the floor for a motion to recess, was recognized.

Mr. DOTY: I had practically completed my remarks. I desire, however, to give notice at this time that whenever the question of the substitution of the minority report for the majority report is up that I shall ask for a division of the question. If you will look at the minority report you will find there are several questions involved. I desire some sort of a division. I will state that I will file with the president of the Convention my motion of what the division should be and the division will be for the president to make. There are some parts of the minority report that I desire a yea and nay vote on and in some parts there would be a great deal. There is one idea that I do want to call attention to. The member from Portage in his remarks made a statement that the savings bank deposits were not usually an investment. There is no more widely used form of investment than savings bank deposits. If savings bank deposits were what he said they are our savings bank deposits would fluctuate up and down. Some days there would be nothing and some days there would be a great deal. He tried to create the impression that savings bank deposits were used as a temporary method of taking care of money—a most preposterous notion. I do not think the member from Portage upon consideration would agree that what he said is actually the situation.

Now with reference to the Wisconsin income tax proposition. The member from Portage referred to the income tax provision of the Wisconsin law and told how well it worked, and he spoke truly, but he did not tell you—I don't say he omitted it purposely—but he didn't tell you what the provision of the Wisconsin constitution as to the tax is. If the member from Portage and the friends of the minority report will agree to submit to the people of Ohio the Wisconsin tax provision, which will include inheritance tax as well as income tax, I shall be glad to join them and then we will be submitting to the people of the state of Ohio something that has been tried out and, according to the member from Portage, has worked well. I will read it:

The rule of taxation shall be uniform and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the legislature shall prescribe. Taxes may also be imposed on incomes, privileges and occupations, which taxes may be graduated and progressive, and reasonable exemptions may be provided.

There is your Wisconsin law and there is a plan that has some foundation in political economy and ordinary common sense, and if the member from Portage desires to put up to the people of Ohio a provision that will carry out his idea in a scientific manner there is a provision on which I will join him in submitting it to the people.

Mr. HALFHILL: What you have read there is the fundamental law?

Mr. DOTY: The constitutional section relating to taxation.

Mr. COLTON: I do not believe you quote correctly what I said. I didn't say that the Wisconsin tax law worked well.

Mr. DOTY: You said the inheritance part had worked well and the income tax.

Mr. COLTON: No; it is an experiment in Wisconsin yet. I did not say it had worked well.

Mr. DOTY: Then I misunderstood you.

Mr. COLTON: The income tax is an experiment.

Mr. DOTY: How long has it been in force?

Mr. COLTON: One year.

Mr. DOTY: I misunderstood you then.

Mr. COLTON: I said we ought to watch carefully the experiment that was being made by Wisconsin.

Mr. DOTY: You want to submit an income and an inheritance tax to the people of the state of Ohio this year?

Mr. COLTON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Would you be willing to submit the whole of the Wisconsin program, which includes what we contend for, and the uniform rule of taxation?

Mr. COLTON: I think not.

Mr. DOTY: I thought, not. Now, as to anything I have to say on the main question I am through, but I want to make this statement and I want to make it because I agree to it: At the beginning of this debate Mr. Watson and Mr. Colton and I agreed upon a short program of debate without any idea that anything we agreed to would bind this Convention. We thought it advisable to have a couple of speeches on each side of the question and bring the matter to a vote. Since that agreement I have heard several members say they desired to speak and therefore I am not disposed to make a motion which would bring a vote upon this matter at this time. I only give that as my reason for not making the motion. I do want the vice president, however, to take notice of my desire for a division when this matter comes to a vote.

Mr. LAMPSON: I would like to say a word in reply to the request for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Do you want to ask a question?

Mr. LAMPSON: I want to give notice that I shall object to that division as not in order when the matter comes up. The question is, "Shall the minority report be substituted for the majority" and that does not admit a division.

Mr. DOTY: We won't have a debate on that now.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Have you yielded the floor?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The member from Scioto has the floor.

Mr. HALFHILL: Will the member from Scioto yield to me on a question of privilege?

Mr. EVANS: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: When this question came up for discussion it was stated here that we were discussing the entire question as if upon second reading. Am I correct in that statement?

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: So far as speeches are concerned.

Mr. HALFHILL: We are confronted with a resolution adopted a week ago fixing the time of recess, and it is very evident that unless we are cautious no proper discussion of this important question can take place, because as soon as some gentleman arises and moves the previous question it will shut off all who have not up to that time spoken from discussing these two reports. Now I submit that unless we are going to act like a parcel of school boys instead of a constitutional convention, that these questions that are before us for consideration must be discussed as business men would discuss any great, important measure or undertaking, even if they consume a week or two weeks of time. In so far as I am personally concerned I feel that I am here at a sacrifice to my own private affairs and no doubt many of you gentlemen are similarly situated. Here is the report of the minority of the committee on Taxation, and that minority report is full of vicious things, inimical to the interests of the people of Ohio of this generation and their children after them, and in my judgment there are things in the majority report that are bad and should not be adopted, and we should discuss both reports thoroughly. Now if you attempt to shut off debate by taking an early vote, you practically take the sense of the Convention on that vote; and then you are confronted with the further desire that we all have to get away from the Convention, and thus you will choose this minority report without a chance even to discuss the amendments that should be offered. It is well known to everybody that the Convention has been canvassed and a large majority will vote for the minority report when the vote is taken to adopt one or the other. Permit the Convention to vote with its eyes open, and let the various amendments that should be presented to that report be discussed. This is a question that affects us all for years to come, and affects us vitally in the campaign that follows the adjournment of the Convention. Now I urge upon the Convention to sit here and do its full duty and consider and discuss this great question of taxation and every feature of it, for it is of the most vital importance, affecting us all and our children after us. I thank the gentleman from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] for yielding the floor.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: It is very well known in this body that I am opposed to all constitutional rules on the subject of taxation. I think that the federal convention which met in May, 1787, was a model for all constitutional conventions and that when they framed the federal constitution they were under great pressure and they had the idea and they tried to live up to it that no legislation would go into the constitution, that it would be simply a framework of government. There was not even a bill of rights attached to it, but they aimed to make a framework of the government, and yet they committed the monumental folly of putting two constitutional rules in that wonderful instrument on the subject of taxation. One was to forbid that the federal government should ever levy any export tax. It was a member from South Carolina who advocated that, and he declared if that provision was not adopted the state would not go into the Union, and he forced the measure through. As it stands now we pay the federal taxes on what we buy, and if that measure had been left out of the federal constitution it would make the foreigner pay our taxes on what we have to sell. I do not think export taxes ought to be so large as to interfere with trade, but it is essential that that provision of the federal constitution should be amended. If we could put an export tax on the things that we have to sell, foreigners would not only pay our taxes, but we would have statistics of everything that is exported and it would be invaluable to our people to have accurate statistics of exports. But the fathers of 1787 adopted another tax rule. They provided in the constitution that we could not have any direct tax except on the capitation plan, and now we are trying to get the sixteenth amendment through to get rid of that. It is the most unfortunate thing for any community that it is inhibited from any kind of taxation. Now when such great states as New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey and Pennsylvania can get along and be rich and powerful and prosperous with constitutions not having any constitutional rule on the subject of taxation, why can not we? This agitation to have a uniform rule began in 1825 and it was kept up until 1846, and in March, 1846, the most complete and best measure that could ever be drawn in favor of this uniform rule was presented in a bill by Mr. Alfred Kelly, at one time a prominent citizen of Cleveland and afterwards a very prominent citizen of Columbus. It was an ideal measure and the democrats of the legislature opposed it. That is a matter of no consequence, although it is a matter of history. They opposed it and the whigs were in favor of it, and it went through and was adopted and was a model measure, but it was remarkable while the law professed to tax everything it had wonderful exemptions, and in a year the legislature repealed all the liberal exemptions of the law.

In 1851 came the new constitution. In the five years between 1846 and 1851 the democrats veered around and adopted this old man of the sea and put it on our shoulders and we have had it to carry ever since. It was only nine years after that that the whole system was revolutionized by a decision of the supreme court. It held in Baker vs. Cincinnati, 11 O. S. 534, that the taxing power was contained in section 1 of article II of the constitution and section 2 article XII was only a limitation on it. Now what situation are we in? Under the taxing power, article II, section 1, we can levy any kind of taxes, but no matter what taxes we levy, we have to retain the ad valorem taxes named in section 2 of article XII of the constitution. It is held to be a limitation on the taxing power and we have to keep it up, and now it is proposed in both of these reports to keep this so-called uniform rule. When I read the majority report, so-called, I was much shocked, but the minority report produced a greater shock. I at once thought of this part of the Litany where the petition is, "Good Lord, deliver us." If we need to call on the good Lord for deliverance from anything, it is from these two reports. The first shock resulted from our reading that old chestnut derived from the Maryland constitution of 1876, declaring that a poll tax is grievous and oppressive and forbidding it. Considering that at least eighteen states in the Union have the poll tax, it is a gratuitous insult on the part of the state of Ohio by its Constitutional Convention to allege that a poll tax is grievous and oppressive, for it is not. Every man twenty-one years old ought to pay some tax to the state and a poll tax is as good as any. The fathers of 1802, the members of the constitutional convention, found this expression in the constitution of Maryland, and it has been the fashion of all constitutional conventions to go to some other old-time constitution and look it over and to follow it in a general way, and that is why we have it. Why do we copy some antiquated declaration from some old charter simply because we find it there?

This declaration against the poll tax was kept in the constitution of 1851 and kept in the constitution of 1873, and if the state had adopted the taxation provisions of that constitution, it would have been farther ahead than it is today. The committee on Taxation of the Fourth Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio proposes to repeat this monumental folly and keep it in the fourth constitution. I will venture that this matter was never discussed in the committee, and if the whole committee were compelled to stand in line before this desk and explain why a poll tax is grievous or oppressive, or be shot at once on the floor of this Convention every one of them would have to be shot. It is beneath the dignity of this Convention to even mention a poll tax, let alone to declare it oppressive and grievous. The committee did not know it to be grievous and oppressive and it can not prove it. I am opposed to throwing an insult in the faces of our sister states. We have a poll tax in Ohio and have had ever since the state was organized. The three-dollar road tax and the dog tax are poll taxes, and, like the poor, we have had them with us always.

A constitutional rule on taxation is a curse wherever and whenever found. There is no such rule in Great Britain or in Canada, and there is no such rule in any European country. Why do we need it or require it in these United States?

The Taxation committee can not answer this question and will not. The majority report tries to hold the state down to certain kinds of taxation by naming them and thereby excluding others. The state must confine itself to succession taxes, franchise corporation taxes and assessments in counties. All other forms are excluded. No matter how desirable it may be found to give the state the uses of any other taxes, we can not do it. If counties are to be taxed ad valorem, then the assessment on them by this rule is not objectionable, but it ought not to be in the constitution. The state ought to be free to follow any plan and not be compelled to use any particular method.

It was all right to exempt state and municipal bonds, but the bonds of other states should have been exempted as well. The poison in the proposition is in section 4, that all property, including moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, or otherwise, and also real and personal property, shall be taxed at its true value in money.

That is the most abominable heresy and against political science and Ohio adopted it in 1851. I could enumerate, if I could take a moment to think, a number of states which have foolishly adopted article II of section 12 of our constitution.

I want to tell you about my mission to Oklahoma. It seems I do not have much influence in this Convention on the subject of taxation, but I succeeded in getting the present liberal tax provisions in the constitution of Oklahoma. I presented them and they went through. That state can do what it chooses on taxation. When it came to Minnesota, I prepared a pamphlet and presented it, and Minnesota rid itself of the uniform rule in its constitution copied from ours. There was a gentleman, a Mr. Harris, a hardware dealer in Minneapolis, a public-spirited citizen who had five thousand copies of my pamphlet printed and distributed in that state and it rid itself by public vote of this old man of the sea. Let us get rid of him here, and if it should turn out that I do not have any influence in this Convention, I am thankful that I had some in Minnesota.

Now this section 2 of article XII is the greatest curse in the constitution of 1851, and of which the people tried to relieve themselves in 1857, 1875, 1883, 1889, 1891, 1893, 1903, 1905, and 1908. Nine different years the people of Ohio voted on a constitutional proposition in regard to taxation to get rid of this curse, and on account of that peculiar rule which required a majority of all the votes cast they failed. There have been $463,000 spent for the adoption of constitutional amendments in this state, and of that amount at least $200,000 have been spent to get rid of this proposition of the general property tax. Do we propose to stifle this question now? Do we propose, in our anxiety to get away, to let nobody be heard and to force a vote on it now? I say we ought not to do it. I say we should give it a full hearing. The people of this state have been trying for sixty-one years to find a uniform rule on taxation, and they have never found it, and yet both of these reports declare there is such a rule. I am just like Betsy Prig in her quarrel with Sairey Gamp. I don't believe there is any Mr. Harris or any such uniform rule, I don't believe there ever was one, and I can't understand why, when the state has been trying to find that uniform rule since 1825 and has never found it, that both reports try to keep up the fruitless quest.

It never did exist and never will exist. Then again, the true or real value of property can never be found, because value is a mere matter of opinion and varies as the opinion of different individuals varies. I want to say "aye" to what Mr. Doty said about the childish plans of having the ward assessors trying to value the property. I approve of all he said in that respect, though I do not approve of the single tax or any of his socialistic tendencies. Did it ever occur to you that there are a great many classes of property that have no element of value, that they, in fact, have no actual value? Just think of that. In Massachusetts and Tennessee they exempt household property to the extent of $1,000. We exempt $100, but every tax bearer takes the value of $1,000 in property and calls it $100, so we get along as well as Tennessee and Massachusetts. I want to tell you something that happened in Columbus day before yesterday. One of the ward assessors went around in a ward and found a poor negro and made him give a statement of all his household goods to be taxed on the same. He said, "I want to see your insurance policies on your goods and I am going to put you down for the amount of your insurance." If that is the policy of the tax assessors of this state, the people will repudiate it as soon as they get a chance.

Taxation.

That is abominable, and yet it happened in this city of Columbus not more than forty-eight hours ago.

I fully agree with the gentleman who preceded me, that farming implements should not be taxed. I doubt if any tools should be taxed, and I do not think household goods or furniture should be taxed. They ought not to be valued for taxation purposes at all, but that is a matter of detail.

We have the most puerile system of assessing property that could be devised. We elect assessors biennially. We used to elect them annually and the least qualified men of the county and the least qualified men in the townships were usually elected, and the cities in the class where I live paid them $3.00 a day.

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT: State your point.

Mr. WINN: I understand the question before the Convention is the submission of the minority for the majority report.

The VICE PRESIDENT: That is true.

Mr. WINN: Is it in order for a speaker to speak against two reports?

Mr. PECK: Why not?

The VICE PRESIDENT: The delegate has that privilege and he is in order.

Mr. WINN: It certainly does not seem to me that is good practice.

Mr. EVANS: These assessors do not do anything but distribute blanks and gather them up, and for that they are paid three dollars a day. In some cities they are paid more and that is all they have to do. Now I say it would pay the state of Ohio to employ Mr. Doty's appraisal company to value all the property in the state. Let him put forty-five hundred men to work in the state, give them standards and let them appraise all the property and they would get nearer the true value than in any other way. But in ten years such annual appraisal would benefit the state of Ohio. Mr. Doty with his appraisal company would do the work for ten years and would own us all. We can not afford to do that. This appraisal is all haphazard. You say the tax shall only be one per cent, or one and two-tenths, or one and five-tenths and you say because these values are assessed at that rate we have a uniform rule. You have not anything of the kind. You have the most unjust system of taxation which could be devised. You take a saloon that will produce one hundred per cent profit every year. Say it is valued for taxation at $5,000 and you assess it at one per cent. Take a farm that is valued for taxes at $5,000 and it produces ten per cent per year revenue. Now what happens? The farmer pays ten times more taxes than the saloon keeper. I will tell you what we are doing. We are doing just as they did in the time of the judges in the Scripture. You remember how it is said that every man did what ever was right in his own eyes, and that is just exactly what we are doing on the subject of taxation. Every man is doing just what he thinks is right and the state of Ohio can not afford to keep up a system that is sure to give an unjust appraisement. The system proposed makes every man his own tax assessor.

What does that bring us to but that we must have classification? I do not see why that is such a bugbear. We have it in Ohio now. Take up any tax blank and read it and you will find eighteen different subjects. That is classification. Classification is an economic question, and if you adopt either one of these reports you will still have to have classification, although it will be lame, halt and blind. It won't be the true thing.

Now you must tax every object with reference to itself. You must take every kind of property as you find it. I am in favor of all classes of property being taxed in some manner. I don't agree to single tax at all, but even if you have single tax and practically we have it now, for nearly all our taxes are raised on real estate—but don't you know it distributes itself throughout the whole community? It is the tendency of taxes to do that, and we have it now, and yet a great many men raise their hands in holy horror about single tax when we are suffering from it today. I do not want any more of it. I want to preserve the principle that we can place taxes on other property than land, if we see fit to do so. This so-called uniform rule produces injustice and nothing else. I would like to know how many of these forty-five hundred personal property assessors in the state appraising property consider the elements of its productive quality? I do not suppose one, and yet when you look at it as an economic question, that is one of the principal things which figure in the valuation of any property.

I will give you an illustration. This case happened in my town. A gentleman had property valued at $60,000 and he had to have $30,000 right quick. His property was clear and a friend of his had $30,000 in United States bonds. He said to him, "You sell your bonds and give me the money and take a mortgage on my $60,000 of property for $30,000." This was the day preceding the second Monday in April. There was just one subject of taxation, and that was land, before that transaction was had. The landowner paid the tax on $60,000 of property and kept paying it year after year. The bonds were sold and were turned into money and were deposited in bank, and what occurred? The man who owned the property had to pay his tax on it just as though it were clear. The man who sold the bonds and gave the money had to pay taxes on the mortgage and then the borrower had to pay taxes on the money in bank. All at once there were three subjects of taxation just because of that transaction, which never increased values in any way. The state had three subjects of taxation where it had but one before. It had the land, it had the money, it had the mortgage. I say that is dishonest on the part of the state of Ohio, to be guilty of a practice of that kind. I am opposed to fining men of enterprise and energy, who are willing to go into debt for the purpose of making some money. I am opposed to driving out of this state such enterprising citizens of the state as Mr. Beatty, of Wood, and Mr. Weybrecht, of Stark. They are the kind of men who make the country and the state.

We can not live up to our own rule. You remember St. Paul said that circumcision was a yoke that the fathers could not bear. And what have we done? I admit that there are $600,000,000 of credits in Ohio. In 1889 the legislature passed an innocent looking little law which said that the building and loan associations should not pay taxes on their mortgages, that they should be exempt and the people should pay on their stocks in the associations. At one stroke of the pen, we exempted $154,000,000 in mortgages from taxation. Go put your money in building and loan association mortgages. You do not have to pay taxes on them. Is that right to the remainder of the citizens of the state of Ohio owning the balance of the $600,000,000 in credits? And yet there is no man who ever questioned that law. I think it would be declared unconstitutional if it were questioned, but no man has ever done it, and when they had the tax inquisitor law in force any tax inquisitor could have made about $20,000,000 by putting those building association mortgages back on the duplicate. If that had been done every building and loan association in the state of Ohio would have had to shut up its doors, and we are of the opinion, all of us, that they are very valuable institutions. Now both the minority report and the majority report recommend the continuance of this practice. Let us quit being hypocrites. Let us be honest and sincere. Out West, if you were in the company of a dozen or so men who came from Eastern states and you would raise this question, "What made you leave the East and come out here?" they would all go to shooting. That is a subject tabooed out there. Let us have an honest proposition. A system of taxation is like a great locomotive. It has to be under control every minute. The engineer and firemen have to be in charge right along and it has to go to the shops every two or three days and be looked over. That is the same way with taxation. You should leave it to the legislature, where it can be attended to and looked after every minute. A single person with $50,000 in credits in this state does not have to pay any taxes. If you do not believe that I can convince you, but I will not do it from this stand. If any gentleman thinks I can not prove it and will come to me privately, I will show him how it can be done, and no married person with $100,000 in credits need pay any taxes on the same. He can get rid of taxes on his credits all right. I can explain that too, privately, but will not publicly.

Both of these proposals undertake to continue that state of affairs. I say we want to put an end to it, we want to be honest with ourselves and with the state, and we want to abolish the rule that permits double and triple taxation, and we don't want to penalize the people of the state of Ohio because they go in debt. One of the best men I ever knew in my life had $5,000 in income-paying railroad stocks and he didn't want to pay any taxes on it. From the revenue he got he didn't think he ought to. He was a good Christian too. If he is not in Heaven nobody is there. Now what did he do? His son was not worth a penny, was not worth the powder it would take to blow him up, and he gave a note to his son for $5,000, and deducted that from his return of the stocks and that let him escape taxes on the stocks.

This whole system we have is a farce from start to finish. I say that the attempt to continue the ad valorem system of taxation in the state of Ohio is the height of human folly, and when the other states of this Union which copied from us section 2 of article XII are seeking to get rid of it, why do we continue it? When some of them have gotten rid of it why do we propose to perpetuate it? I could talk much longer, but I do not think I should. I have prepared this substitute for the minority report, and at the conclusion of my remarks I desire to offer it and move its adoption. I will ask the secretary whether it is now in order?

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. At this stage of the proceedings —

Mr. EVANS: I thought I had better do it now though.

Mr. DOTY: My point is that it is not in order at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer will have to decide that at this time the amendment is not in order.

Mr. EVANS: I want the privilege then of introducing it at some point in the proceedings of the Convention when it is in order.

Mr. LAMPSON: There is a considerable feeling in this Convention that we are proceeding in a way not to get anywhere. I do not think anybody wants to cut off debate, but there is considerable feeling that we ought to dispose of this minority report and then the question would be, Shall the majority report as amended—if it is amended—be agreed to? That would be open to amendment and debate. Then the very thing the gentleman from Scioto attempts to do might be done. It would then be in order. We are a stage or two in advance really of the point where we usually discuss at length proposals and amendments. We usually wait until the proposal is engrossed and placed upon the calendar for second reading. I do not like to cut anybody out and I am not going to do it, but there is a pretty general demand to proceed until we can come to a point where amendments are in order. In order to test the sense of the Convention, and not desiring at all to cut anybody out from discussion, I demand the previous question upon the pending question only, to-wit, the substitution of the minority report for the majority report, with the understanding that if it shall be substituted, then there will be ample opportunity for debate and amendments.

Mr. DOTY: I rise to renew my demand for a division of the question and the yeas and nays on a certain portion of the report.

Mr. LAMPSON: I make the point that the question is simply upon the substitution of the minority report for the majority report and that that is indivisible.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The matter before the Convention is the previous question upon the minority report only.

Mr. DOTY: I made this demand about half an hour ago, and I am simply renewing it now before the previous question is put, as I have a right to do, because I could not do it afterwards.

Mr. LAMPSON: The point of division has not been reached yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Let the presiding officer have a chance to decide—

Mr. DOTY: Do I understand that the decision as to the divisibility may be made after the previous question has been ordered?

The VICE PRESIDENT: Certainly.

Mr. DOTY: All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is "Shall debate be closed on the substitution of the minority report for the majority report?" The understanding is, if it carries, that it leaves open the question of the adoption of the majority report and amendments will be in order thereto.

Taxation.

The main question was ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion is unanimously carried, and now the vote must go upon the substitution of the minority report for the majority report. Now, with reference to the matter brought up by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty], I call attention to Rule 24:

Any member may call for a division of the question, and the decision of the president, as to the divisibility, shall be subject to appeal, as in questions of order.

Any member may call for a division of the question, which at this time is a substitution of the minority report for the majority report; but it is perfectly apparent that the Convention can not amend the minority report by putting something into the report—that is to say, we are not supposed to put into the mouths of the minority of the committee something they did not recommend, but we can reject a part, if we choose, of the minority report or accept all, as we may desire. There may be part of the report we desire to reject or accept and the only way of doing it is by division.

Mr. RILEY: Could not that be accomplished just as easily by a motion to strike out?

Mr. DOTY: There are various ways, but this is one way.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The chair will make the ruling and give reasons for the ruling first. In ordinary parliamentary practice a division of a question is in the form of an amendment, which would not be in order after the previous question had been called and ordered; but this is different, in that it doesn't demand a vote, but any member can call for it and then it must be left to the decision of the chair. The chair will make the decision and is sorry to make it that way, but I see no other way to do it here in my own mind. This question is on the substitution of one report for another—that is, it is the adoption of the minority report for the majority report, which will not admit of division because after it is adopted or rejected you can reach the same thing by amending it. Therefore, I will decide the division is out of order.

Mr. DOTY: I demand the yeas and nays on the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT: On the substitution of the minority report?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. THOMAS: After one or the other of these reports is adopted can we carry a motion to proceed immediately to the second reading?

The president here took the chair.

Mr. DOTY: No.

The PRESIDENT: The yeas and nays have been demanded on the substitution of the minority report for the majority report.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 74, nays 36, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Brown, Pike,	DeFrees,
Antrim,	Campbell,	Donahey,

So the minority report was substituted for the majority report.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is upon agreeing to the report of the committee as amended.

Mr. ANDERSON: I offer an amendment.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order, the same point of order that was raised when Captain Evans offered his amendment. The question here is on agreeing to the report of the committee. That has not been decided yet. We have substituted the minority report for the majority report and the report is still pending.

Mr. LAMPSON: I think this presents a different question from the one presented a few moments ago, when the question was simply upon the substitution of the minority report for the majority report. The question is upon adopting the majority report as made by the adoption of the minority report for the majority report. That majority report as now before us is open to amendment and full discussion.

Mr. DOTY: There is no question about having full discussion, but we are in the same parliamentary stage as far as ability to amend the report as before. I never heard of such a thing as putting into the mouths of the committee something they did not sign.

Mr. KNIGHT: Will the gentleman from Cuyahoga get us to a point where we can amend this report?

Mr. DOTY: Just adopt the report—agree to the report.

Mr. LAMPSON: You mean then it would be open to amendment on the question of engrossment?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, and we are not there yet.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on engrossment.

Mr. LAMPSON: And under our understanding there should be opportunity for debate and amendment?

The PRESIDENT: The chair so understands.

Taxation—Relative to Final Adjournment.

Mr. ANDERSON: I offer an amendment.
The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "proposal" and in lieu thereof insert the following:

To submit an amendment to article XII, sections 1, 2, and 6 of the constitution, and to add thereto sections to be known as sections 7 and 8.—
Relative to taxation.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 1. The levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive; therefore no poll tax shall ever be levied in this state, nor service required therein, which may be commuted in money or other thing of value.

SECTION 2. Laws shall be passed, taxing by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, or otherwise; and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money excepting all bonds at present outstanding of the state of Ohio or of any city, village, hamlet, county, or township in this state or which have been issued in behalf of the public schools in Ohio and the means of instruction in connection therewith, which bonds so at present outstanding shall be exempt from taxation; but burying grounds, public school houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property, to an amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars for each individual, may by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published as may be directed by law.

SECTION 6. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution the state shall never contract any debt for purposes of internal improvement.

SECTION 7. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value. A portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars in value may be exempted from such tax.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to income derived from investments not directly taxed in this state, but a part of each income not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year may be exempt from such tax.

Mr. DOTY: I offer an amendment.
The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out sections 2, 3, 6 and 7 and insert in lieu of section 2 the following:

"All real and personal property, shall be taxed by a uniform rule according to its true value in money; but burying grounds, public schoolhouses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property to an amount not exceeding two hundred dollars for each individual, may, by general laws, be exempted from taxation."

Re-number sections in accordance therewith.

The delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] here took the chair as president pro tem.

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to give a brief word of explanation. If the substitute amendment be adopted the laws of taxation will remain the same they are now with the exception that bonds will be taxed. In addition to that it will give us income and inheritance taxes. That is the only changes it will make.

Mr. KING: I would like to inquire of the gentleman, and if he can not answer it, from anybody else responsible for either report, why it is necessary to preserve section 6. I notice both reports carefully preserve section 6 and the gentleman from Mahoning in his amendment continues that section also. I can not understand why section 6 is not entirely covered by the provision in article VIII, which expressly limits the amount of indebtedness which the state may incur and the purposes for which it shall be expended except as we may amend it by the proposal submitted for good roads.

Mr. ANDERSON: The only purpose we had in mind—because whatever credit is due for the drawing of this amendment should be given to Mr. Cassidy—was to preserve the good roads propositions already adopted.

Mr. KING: It would not interfere with the good roads proposition because the good roads proposition is excepted from the provision of section 6.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am aware of that, but to make doubly sure we put it in here.

Mr. LAMPSON: I rise to a question of privilege of the Convention and ask leave to make a statement concerning adjournment.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. LAMPSON: Upon consultation with quite a good many delegates, especially consultation with the chairman and other members of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, we are of the opinion that if this Convention goes on with its work today and some time tomorrow and adjourns at two o'clock on Monday and then comes back and goes on with its work until Thursday, which I believe is the day set to go to Chillicothe, that will leave us Thursday at Chillicothe and the Convention should then adjourn at Chillicothe over and until next Tuesday. In the meantime the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology and the committee on Schedule will sit here, put in their work and be ready to report, especially the committee on Phraseology, when we reconvene on Tuesday, and then, if we get along well on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, we can finally adjourn on May 17, as has already been agreed upon. Upon consultation with the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology—I would like to have Mr. Colton state what he thinks about the ability of that committee to be ready to report upon Tuesday as I have stated?

Relative to Final Adjournment.

Mr. COLTON: The committee on Arrangement and Phraseology can do some work in the recess during this week and next week. It can spend Friday, Saturday and Monday, and at the conclusion of next week we can be ready to report on Tuesday, as the gentleman from Ashtabula has suggested.

Mr. LAMPSON: I now move to postpone the further consideration of the pending matter for five minutes. The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I now ask consent to introduce a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:
Resolution No. 114:

Resolved, That Resolution No. 108, adopted April 24, 1912, be amended as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention, when it adjourns on Thursday, May 9, 1912, shall adjourn to Tuesday, May 14, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m. at which time the standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology shall report upon such matters as shall have been referred to said committee.

Resolved, That the calendar of business for May 14, 1912, and thereafter, shall consist only of proposals for third reading and questions appertaining thereto, and no other business shall be considered except that which shall pertain to the concluding work of the Convention.

Resolved, That this Convention shall adjourn sine die, at 12 o'clock noon, Friday, May 27, 1912.

Resolved, That Resolution No. 108 is hereby rescinded.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution be put on its passage.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: This resolution is simply a repetition of what has heretofore been passed with the amendment of the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON].

Mr. HOSKINS: What does this resolution imply with reference to the work we ought to do tomorrow?

Mr. DOTY: It implies that we are to work tomorrow and then come back Monday at two o'clock and work until we are through.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is this one of those bluffs about "tomorrow"?

Mr. DOTY: In so far as I am concerned, it is not. I do not know what it is with reference to the gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS].

Mr. KNIGHT: The cloak room is full of traveling bags.

Mr. HOSKINS: If we are going to work tomorrow we might as well understand it. I have some engagements tomorrow that should be taken care of, but if we are going to work I want to know it so I can be here.

Mr. DOTY: So far as I am personally concerned I think we should sit here and work even tomorrow night.

Mr. HOSKINS: That might be my opinion, but my judgment is you are not going to do that and this meeting will close this afternoon as usual.

Mr. DOTY: No.

Mr. HOSKINS: That has been the expression of a dozen members who have talked, and, as the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] says, "the cloak room is full of bags", to go away tonight. Those of us who have engagements to take care of tomorrow would like to know positively so we can make our arrangements accordingly. We would hate to postpone our engagements and then find we do not have a quorum here tomorrow. I do not see why this Convention can not decide now whether we are going to sit tomorrow or not.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you ask unanimous consent and have all of those who will be here tomorrow say yes? Then if there is a quorum we will know.

Mr. HOSKINS: I will do that—

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will call the roll on that proposition.

Mr. ROEHM [during the roll call]: I will vote "Yes, until tomorrow noon."

Mr. RORICK [during roll call]: I vote "Yes, until two o'clock tomorrow."

Mr. ANDERSON: Under the ordinary rules Mr. Stilwell, being present, must be counted.

Mr. ROEHM: I believe a great many of those who have said yes and that they will be present tomorrow had something else in their minds. They haven't said how long they will be present tomorrow, and about eleven o'clock we will find a bunch of them going away, and at two o'clock there will be another bunch, and there will not be a large enough number here to transact business in the proper manner. I believe it would be a proper thing for us to canvass as to the hour of adjournment tomorrow and let all who say they will be here up to the end of the adjournment vote so we can know it.

The PRESIDENT: The member is out of order.

Mr. ROEHM: Then when I am in order I will take the floor and put that motion.

The roll call was then finished. Eighty-six members answered in the affirmative.

Mr. ROEHM: I want to offer an amendment that we adjourn tomorrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. The amendment the gentleman offers is not reduced to writing and it is not germane to the question. As soon as we adopt this resolution and declare what we are going to do, then we can take up the matter of today or tomorrow.

Mr. ROEHM: Does not the resolution provide for an adjournment until Monday night?

Mr. DOTY: The rules provide for that.

The PRESIDENT: The president did not like to declare the member out of order, but will the member withhold that?

Mr. KNIGHT: The roll call shows that only eighty-six members promised to be here tomorrow and some of them will not be here more than a few minutes. It seems to me it is absurd to talk about doing any business tomorrow in the form of passing proposals. It seems to me it is rather an absurd method of closing the business of this Convention in that it is just like the confusion of the general assembly. We have a number of proposals on the calendar. If we give them decent consideration they will occupy more time than is allowed here. Further than that, with all due respect to the chairman of the committee on Phraseology, I expect you will find when the Convention comes back that the work will not be in such shape that the Convention can proceed with it. I know some of the members can not work Saturday of this week. It has always been regarded that we would have ten days of recess and that that was the minimum time that would be required to properly do this work.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it your opinion that if we adjourn tonight and allow the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology to have all of tomorrow that it can have its work done by Tuesday?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am opposed to the whole resolution. I think the Convention should adjourn regularly and come back next week and finish up its business as it should be done, and then, at the close of next week, it ought to recess for ten days. That would cover the primaries and then we could come back the day after the primary and close up our work. I am opposed to the resolution entirely.

Mr. DOTY: Do you not understand that this resolution or some other resolution must be passed, as we have a resolution in effect to adjourn tomorrow at noon for ten days?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: You want the Convention to adjourn tomorrow?

Mr. KNIGHT: This is not the only resolution that can be offered. I think we could prepare some other resolution.

Mr. DOTY: I said this or some other.

Mr. KNIGHT: Well, let us kill this and put up some other.

Mr. NORRIS: I think the economy of time we are attempting to secure is the most dangerous kind of economy. We took the job to come down here and transact this business for which the people called us together, and we should devote sufficient time to it to do it carefully and conscientiously and properly. Now right at the end of the session we seem to devote our attention, instead of to business, to devise ways and means of neglecting business and getting away from this Convention. I think at the last of this Convention we ought to devote our time to it just as carefully as at any other time. I do not know that my opinion on that is of so much value, because I have not had much experience in the legislative line, but I think whatever we do we ought to take time to do it properly and carefully if it takes an extra week or two weeks.

Mr. LAMPSON: That is just what we are proceeding to do. We have adopted a resolution to adjourn tomorrow for ten days, and unless that is modified when the time comes we can not do otherwise. This resolution puts that off a week and allows the Convention to go on in the usual manner for another week. If it develops at the end of next week that the time we have allowed in this resolution for the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology to report is not sufficient, you can give them some more time, but the imminent thing now is to get this week before us.

Mr. FESS: I feel that the Convention is going to do something that is not helpful for the Convention or its work. We are all anxious to get away from here and the psychology of the situation is that as this grows upon us we are liable to go with a rush, and we will never suffer by taking a little time. We are certainly in danger of suffering if we rush through without giving sufficient consideration to the closing days of our work, and, realizing the imminence of action upon this resolution, I think we shall have to act upon it in order to avoid adjourning Friday; certainly we must. But, gentlemen of the Convention, there is nobody in this Convention that ought to consider getting out of here of greater importance to himself personally than the one who is addressing you, for as president of a college, with the commencement day coming on the 5th of June and work crowding us wonderfully, I would like to get out of here. I have not certain matters on my mind that some of the rest of you have. Matters of that sort are not disturbing me. I do not care anything about the primary. That is secondary. I have been here every day that the Convention has been in session except when I was on my back sick, and I shall continue to stay here.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Following the line of argument we have just listened to, we took the job of making, revising, amending and altering the constitution. College professors, farmers, attorneys and everybody else undertook that job. Now is not that the first work?

Mr. FESS: I do not know whether the member from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] was listening to me or not. I rather think not. That was the point I was trying to impress, that no matter what other work is pressing upon me, this is the work I am going to do. I am not going to abandon this for anything, even for the work of my college. I gave up that work to look after this, but this is what is disturbing me: We are in a situation of hurrying and the first thing we know we will adjourn without having our work completed, and we will feel sorry for it afterwards. Now we have to pass some adjourning resolution, but I hope that you, as members of this Convention, will hold open the privilege of further amending later on if it appears that we can not do our work in the time allotted. I do not want to fix the time here beyond which we can not go, and have you hold it up to me and say, "You have agreed to adjourn," and because we have a majority we will adjourn. I am in favor of this resolution, but I hope the temper of the Convention will be to extend the time to any length necessary to finish our work.

Mr. WINN: Do you know of any way by which we can pass a resolution that we can not rescind if we want to?

Mr. FESS: No; the majority can rescind anything.

Mr. ANDERSON: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all except the last line.

Mr. DOTY: I move to lay that amendment on the table."

The motion was carried.

Mr. KNIGHT: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out "May 14" wherever it appears and insert "May 22". Strike out "May 17" and insert "May 31."

Mr. KNIGHT: That gives the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology ten days and then we can come back and have six working days.

Mr. DOTY: I think it is time for this Convention to favor the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology when the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology requests more time. The chairman of the committee, who is in very close touch with the work of that committee, has stated to you that he thinks he can get through in the time allotted in the original resolution. If we find that is not true, and at any time the chairman will frankly say so we can give him the time necessary. I therefore move that the amendment be tabled.

Relative to Final Adjournment—Taxation.

The motion was carried.

Mr. NYE: It seems to me that we ought not hurry this matter at the very close of our work. I am a member of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology and I know that the committee has put in all of the extra time it could outside of the meetings of this Convention, and we have been unable to keep up with the proposals that have been adopted by this Convention. There are now about thirty proposals. Those proposals have to be considered carefully and have to come back and be submitted to this Convention, and after that there is to be a provision made for submitting the entire work to the people. There has to be a schedule prepared, and there has to be a provision made for submission, and we vote upon the proposals separately, so that every individual proposal can be submitted to the people as a separate proposal and so that the people can vote yes or no on them. Those matters can be considered not only by the committee but by the Convention as well. As has been said, we came here to do this work. No one is more anxious to get away than I am, but I want to stay here until we get the work done well. We ought not to hurry away and then find we have omitted some work. If we were a legislature the correction could be made at the next term. That can not be done with this Convention. When we adjourn our work is at an end, and we can not come back again. I say what we do let us do well. I think we need more time in which to do it than is provided for by this resolution.

Mr. ELSON: I am highly grateful for this executive recognition. I want to say that I regret very much that Mr. Knight's resolution was voted down. I agree with every gentleman who has expressed himself on this subject that there is serious danger that we shall do the wrong thing, that we shall adjourn too suddenly and that we will discredit ourselves and our work in the eyes of the people. For my part I am sure I could name over half a dozen important things that we have discussed that will take or ought to take a day or so to each one, and I do not think we should be in a hurry about it. I am as anxious to get out as anybody, but it seems to me impossible to do our regular work in two weeks and then after a week's adjournment reassemble and finish the work in a week. I am willing to vote for this resolution, but only on the idea that we shall rescind it if it is found necessary, and I think it will be found necessary.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It seems to me there is a great deal of time wasted about nothing. Judge Winn stated the whole case in a nutshell. There is no resolution that the Convention has adopted that the Convention can not rescind. We are doing now what we have done twice before. We say we will try to adjourn on such a date. If the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology requires more time the Convention will give it, and it is time enough when the Convention knows that committee will need more time to grant the extension.

Mr. LAMPSON: The imminent thing here is to give the Convention another week to go along with its work as it has been doing. So far as I am concerned, I am a member of the Arrangement and Phraseology committee and I have stayed with that committee. I have been home only twice since I came here. I have stayed over and worked Fridays, Saturdays and Mondays and I expect to work Friday, Saturday and next Monday on the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, but what we are trying to do now is to get a week's more time, and when the time comes we will take care of the situation.

The PRESIDENT: The president has been called out by the people from Chillicothe, who are anxious to know as to our movements next week, and the passage of this resolution will enable me to answer them in the affirmative.

The question being "Shall the resolution be adopted?" The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 96, nays 5, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Fox,	Miller, Ottawa,

Those who voted in the negative are: Nye, Read, Stalter, Stevens, Walker.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DOTY: I move that when the Convention adjourns or recesses tonight it be until nine o'clock tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I now call up the pending matter, Proposal No. 170.

The president recognized the member from Gallia [Mr. MAUCK].

Mr. MAUCK: The pending question is the amendment of the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], which provides that the only exemption from taxation of municipal securities shall be those outstanding at present, so that subsequent issues will be the subject of taxation. The most odious part of the amendment to the constitution adopted in 1905, exempting public securities from taxation, was that part which exempted some $300,000,000 and odd of securities issued theretofore from taxation which had been issued at a high rate of interest because they were taxable at the time they were issued. I think perhaps no more dishonest scheme was ever put through the legislature and ratified by the electors of the state through the tricks of political parties than to exempt from taxation some $300,000,000 of securities that had been issued at a high rate of interest, some of them as high as six per cent, because they were taxable. Now, if it is proposed to put subsequent issues upon the tax duplicate, manifestly those issued prior to the adoption of the amendment of 1905 should be restored to the tax duplicate, because they had been issued at rates as high as five and six per cent. I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment offered by Mr. Anderson to Proposal No. 170 as follows: After the word "therewith" in section 2 add the following: "issued after December 31, 1905, and prior to the approval of this amendment."

Mr. ANDERSON: It was our purpose to do just what your amendment does, but in the hurry we forgot it. We ask that this be made part of our amendment.

Mr. PECK: The purport of your amendment is to put on the tax list bonds issued prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment. How are you going to distinguish them, and what about the rights of those parties who have bought them under the constitution providing that they should not be taxed?

Mr. MAUCK: They are not in the hands of innocent persons.

Mr. PECK: How do you know that?

Mr. MAUCK: They bought them subject to the possibility of a law restoring them.

Mr. PECK: You can say that as to anything.

Mr. MAUCK: The constitution only protects those that were issued after it.

Mr. PECK: It protects all, and if anybody bought any bonds issued previously he comes under this constitutional provision.

Mr. MAUCK: The member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] would not claim that you could put on a duplicate those issued since—

Mr. PECK: I claim you can not put on any that have been issued, and I think it would be unjust, dishonest and a disgrace for the Convention to do it. I want to tell the Convention another thing that they don't seem to appreciate, that putting these bonds on a tax duplicate would lose the Convention more votes than anything we have done. There are thousands and thousands of bondholders in Ohio and you don't know them. They live next door and every blessed one of them will vote against the constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON: If we regard it as the right thing to do, should we care what the voter thinks?

Mr. PECK: Sometimes it is a matter of expediency more than right. The bonds were taken off the tax duplicate because it was thought the municipality or the state would receive the benefit in a low rate of interest, and they have in many instances. Perhaps the interest has not fallen as much as it was expected to, but put them on again and it will go up and when they are paying five and six per cent for borrowed money the people in the cities and towns will wish they had left them off. You should take a broader view of it. Simply because one man has bonds and another man has another kind of property, you should not say they should all be taxed alike when you have said that they should not be taxed. I venture to say you can not do it, that the constitution of the United States will protect the people.

Mr. MAUCK: What was the consideration that passed to the public for the release from taxation?

Mr. PECK: The consideration was the solemn promise of the state of Ohio made by a constitutional amendment and adopted by a vote of more than six hundred thousand people that they should not be taxed, and when the state of Ohio has pledged its solemn honor that they shall not be taxed I, representing the state of Ohio, rise to protest against a violation of that pledge.

Mr. WATSON: Was not that secured by fraud upon the voters of Ohio?

Mr. PECK: I do not think it was. What right have you to make that assumption?

Mr. WATSON: Evidently it was.

Mr. PECK: You are assuming that the voters of the state of Ohio are a set of ignoramuses?

Mr. MAUCK: The release from taxation of these bonds during the past seven years has been an absolute gratuity, has it not?

Mr. PECK: No, sir; it has been a benefit to the cities and towns that sold the bonds, in that they have a low rate of interest.

Mr. MAUCK: I refer to bonds issued prior to 1905. The holders had an absolute gratuity in the release from taxation.

Mr. PECK: I am talking about the people who have bought bonds since then.

Mr. MAUCK: Now it does not follow from the fact that we have given them seven years of gratuity that we are bound to give them a gratuity of thirty-three years.

Mr. PECK: How about the men who bought them last week?

Mr. MAUCK: They bought them with knowledge of the defect.

Mr. PECK: How do you know they bought them with knowledge of the law, for that is all you can make out of them?

Mr. MAUCK: They bought them with the knowledge that the constitution might restore them to taxation.

Mr. PECK: You may pass your law, but the constitution of the United States declares that you shall not impair the obligation of a contract.

Mr. MAUCK: We are not impairing the obligation of any contract. It is an absolute gratuity and not a contract.

Mr. PECK: It was an agreement with this state. They bought those bonds on the face of the agreement.

Mr. MAUCK: What was the consideration?

Mr. PECK: The money they paid for the bonds. They might have paid a higher price because the bonds were tax free.

Mr. MAUCK: How do you know that?

Taxation.

Mr. PECK: Every bond broker in the United States has been advertising nontaxable Ohio bonds.

Mr. MOORE: Does any constitution prevent the righting of a great wrong?

Mr. PECK: Where was the wrong?

Mr. MOORE: In passing the Longworth law that made that exemption possible.

Mr. PECK: If the state of Ohio has done itself a wrong, it can not right it at the expense of other people. The state of Ohio said to the city of Cleveland, the city of Cincinnati, Dayton and your town, you may issue bonds without taxes, and you may get a lower rate of interest on those bonds and those cities and towns took advantage and issued them and sold them and now you propose to put taxes back on them and upon the people to whom you made that pledge.

Mr. WATSON: If you can get them, but it is claimed that we never can get them and why all this trouble about it then?

Mr. PECK: You can get them if you assume the people are honest, and you are trying to do a dishonest thing; you are trying to beat the constitution. There are forty thousand people whose votes will be influenced, and they are the brokers and the bankers in the state, and every one of them will be against the constitution.

Mr. THOMAS: How about a million working people?

Mr. PECK: And there are some of those working people who have thousands of these bonds. They have a good many more than you think they have. I know in Cincinnati our German mechanics are steady buyers of small quantities of municipal bonds.

Mr. WATSON: Are we here to write a constitution in the interest of the bondbrokers?

Mr. PECK: We are here to do justice to all the people and not to rob anybody. We are here to preserve the honor of the state of Ohio, which is dear to every one of us, I hope, and I do not want to do anything that can be pointed to and have it said that the state of Ohio has deceived the people. She promised that these bonds that these poor people have bought should not be taxed, and now she will levy taxes upon them.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I would ask the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] whether the supreme court has not already passed upon this question and decided they could not again be restored to taxation?

Mr. PECK: I do not remember the decision.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Judge Worthington referred to the case when I raised the question of the taxation of these bonds, and he referred to a case and made it very clear to my mind that the supreme court had already settled this question and therefore it was not further talked of in the committee.

Mr. PECK: It has been clear law ever since the Dartmouth College case that the state can not violate its obligations by law or otherwise and they are protected by the constitution of the United States. I tell you if you pass this it will be futile, because judges of the supreme court of the United States will see that it comes to naught, but what I am protesting against is that it is dishonest in the state to say that it would not tax these bonds and then attempt to tax them.

Mr. WINN: Do you understand that the proposition is to tax bonds that were issued under the provisions of the constitution existing at the time they were issued?

Mr. PECK: No; they were issued before, but have come under the amendment.

Mr. WINN: Would there be any injustice in your opinion to restoring to taxation those bonds that were issued before the constitution was amended exempting stocks and bonds?

Mr. PECK: If you had some that you had bought last week you would think so.

Mr. WINN: If the bonds are now held by the person who purchased them before the amendment—

Mr. PECK: That is impracticable. You couldn't make any such distinction.

Mr. WINN: Is it not true that they have always escaped taxation and there is much ado about nothing here?

Mr. PECK: I do not know about that. I am concerned with the honor of the state of Ohio and I want to keep her straight.

Mr. JONES: May I ask Judge Peck a question? Is not all that is involved in this whole matter merely a question of taxation and is the situation any different in that it is municipal bonds from what it would be if it were bonds of corporations or mortgage liens which had previously been exempted from taxation and which it was now proposed to restore to taxation?

Mr. PECK: I think there is some difference.

Mr. JONES: In what respect is it different, treating it as a question of taxation?

Mr. PECK: Municipalities are creatures of the state, endowed with power to issue these bonds, and every one of those that issued bonds did it under specific act of the general assembly, and therefore the state, when dealing with it, is dealing with its own creatures.

Mr. JONES: Are not private corporations creatures of the state?

Mr. PECK: But their property is not.

Mr. JONES: And their securities are issued under laws authorizing them?

Mr. PECK: They may be empowered to issue them, but they are not creatures in the sense that the municipality is. In the old constitution it was the state giving light to the municipality and the state making it: Blessed be the name of the state.

Mr. JONES: But so far as the purchaser of those securities is concerned, he would be purchasing the security of a private corporation which has been relieved by law of taxation?

Mr. PECK: That is one misleading analysis that doesn't work.

Mr. JONES: Would not that be the same as if he purchased the security of a public corporation, for instance, bank stock or any other private stock? Has not the state the undoubted right at all times to determine whether this class of property shall be taxed or the other, that horses may be taxed this year and next year not, and the situation is the same as if a man bought a horse released from taxation and then you would propose to tax that horse next year and make it less valuable?

Mr. PECK: You do not discriminate between the right and the power, if the state has power to do a thing, it can do it. You are driving in the street with your buggy and you have a right to be there as much as anybody, even the fellow with the big automobile. You have equal rights there, but the man with the big machine can run you down. He has no more right to be there than you have, but he has the power to run you down. So the state can run over you and mash you to pieces, and not be responsible, but the highest attribute of the state is to do justice and the state with the voices of honest men will never knowingly pass laws which do injustice to any class of citizens, at least, it never should and never will with my voice. There are some people who think if they can grab a penny in any county for the state that they are serving the state, but if they grab it dishonestly they are not serving the state, they are serving the devil.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: A suggestion to Judge Peck on the answer to the policy of Mr. Jones: Mr. Jones asked you what was the difference between bonds issued by a private corporation not subject to taxation and the bonds of a municipality not subject to taxation, both of which are tried to be met by this amendment. Is that correct, Mr. Jones?

Mr. JONES: So far as working injustice on the owner is concerned, exactly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Don't forget that. I call your attention to this: It is well known that corporations do issue bonds which at the time issued are not subject to taxation, and they have a distinct contract with the buyer of the bonds that they will assume any future taxes that may be levied against such bonds. As a banker you know that such things are written in the bonds. You have handled such bonds, and so have I, where that provision is distinctly written into the bond. Therefore, if the state puts any taxation on those bonds the holder of the bond does not suffer any injustice because the corporation itself pays that tax. Now that implied contract exists, between the municipality that has issued these bonds and the buyer, that no tax shall be put upon those bonds, and when you put the tax on the bonds you do not make the municipality pay it, but make the owner of the bonds pay it. That is a broad distinction.

Mr. MAUCK: Will the gentleman yield for a question from me?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order.

The PRESIDENT: What is it?

Mr. DOTY: The gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] has the floor?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is so.

Mr. PECK: If Mr. Mauck wants to ask a question I am perfectly willing that he should do so.

Mr. MAUCK: Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, said there was an implied contract. Where does he find that implied contract in the bonds issued previous to 1905?

Mr. PECK: I did not understand Mr. Harris to make that statement and I am not responsible for his statement.

Mr. MAUCK: This does not attempt to put any such tax on any such bonds issued since 1905, but on bonds issued prior thereto.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Therefore, it is the breaking of faith, for in 1905 the state by a vote of over six hundred thousand said they should not be taxed.

Mr. PECK: I will ask Mr. Mauck a question. Do you not know as a lawyer that all parts of a law relating to a subject form part of the contract entered into?

Mr. MAUCK: Yes.

Mr. PECK: Now here are these bonds sold with the law providing that they should not be taxed, and that becomes a part of the obligation of the state to the parties who buy and sell those bonds; and every bond that has been sold since the passage of that amendment in 1905 has been sold and bought with the distinct understanding that the bond is nontaxable, and I maintain it is not proper and is not possible now to change those contracts which say that the bond is not taxable.

Mr. MAUCK: But is it not true that the public contract entered into at the time when these bonds were taxable was a public contract and the contract you refer to is a personal, private contract?

Mr. PECK: But you can not go back and right that which you claim is wrong. You can not go back and right it now at the expense of innocent parties who have bought bonds without knowledge of this.

Mr. WATSON: Suppose a few years ago the farm land of Ohio had become exempt from taxation and suppose those farm lands had changed hands, and suppose that under this constitution we were seeking to find property upon which to put taxes, would you be here arguing that we were doing wrong in restoring that land to taxation?

Mr. PECK: I will be here to say that would work a hardship on the people who had bought the land since, and that they should be compensated in some way.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not a fact that farm lands may be bought when the rate is one thing and that the rate may change—

Mr. PECK: The rate changes every year. That is not an analogous case at all. Every thing changes as far as that is concerned. The price of bonds go up and down every day. Everything of that sort changes and lots of things affect values, but that cuts no figures here.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is it not a fact known to all that prior to 1905 municipal bonds found no sale in Ohio and were purchased outside of Ohio owing to that constitutional provision?

Mr. PECK: That is another provision and that is an argument against the other part which proposes to put those issued since on the tax duplicate.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is it not a fact that since the constitution has been changed that they have been advertised as an inviting form of security and have been brought back and are held here largely?

Mr. PECK: You can pick up any large daily in the state and you will find an advertisement of the bonds of this city at four per cent, nontaxable, and they have been sold that way. Talk about the holders of these bonds! I know one house in Cincinnati that sells $10,000,000 of those bonds every year over the counter and they go right down into the stockings of the good old German women in Cincinnati.

Mr. THOMAS: I am willing to say there is not a quarter of one per cent of the bonds issued—no, not one ninety-ninth of the bonds that are issued that goes into the working men's stockings.

Mr. PECK: You don't know. Where are all these big deposits in the savings bank that Mr. Doty talks about?

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: They are the working men's.

Mr. PECK: The average deposit in the largest bank in Cleveland is less than $500, I am informed, and there are over one hundred and five thousand depositors.

Mr. THOMAS: Well, who has it—who do you think have those bonds?

Mr. DOTY: You have. You have some. I am a plutocrat and have not any.

Mr. PECK: Their money is not in savings banks, but in municipal bonds.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not a fact that along about April—the latter part of March—the newspapers carry advertisements, columns of them, offering municipal bonds nontaxable for the sole purpose of permitting people who have personal property in shape to be taxed to get it in such shape as bonds so it escapes both ways?

Mr. PECK: I do not know about that.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have such an advertisement in my desk. Is it not also true that the bondholders send out letters along about that time—in fact, I have one of those in my desk, but I don't know why they ever sent it to me—asking the receivers of the letters to go in and take these nontaxable bonds and put up that which if kept by the individual would be taxed and in that way escape taxation both ways?

Mr. PECK: I do not know. The only place I have known that to occur much is with the nontaxable stock of Ohio.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is it not your recollection that a few years ago—this is to answer Mr. Thomas' reference to the laboring men—that a few years ago the city of Cincinnati offered nearly $1,000,000 of water works bonds and the banks refused to buy them and the city of Cincinnati sold them over the counter in lots of $250 and lots of $500, to the amazement of the bondholders and brokers, and the laboring men of Cincinnati withdrew their money from the savings bank and bought that last issue of bonds over the counter?

Mr. THOMAS: Are all those working men that bought those bonds?

Mr. PECK: Nearly all of them were working men.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Are you aware of the fact that Reid and Harrison have offered me $175,000 of four and one-half bonds of the city of Youngstown, Ohio, stating that by reason of their nontaxability they could offer them at the magnificent rate of a little less than four per cent?

Mr. PECK: Yes; I know that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I want to ask the member of Mahoning if the city of Youngstown, Ohio, prior to this law ever issued or ever could sell any of its municipal bonds at less than five per cent? They have been offered to me within a week at about a three ninety-five basis because they are not subject to taxation, and the member from Mahoning is willing to tax his people in Youngstown that additional rate of interest when they can not get the equivalent in taxation.

Mr. ANDERSON: Reserve that question until I have the floor.

Mr. PECK: In reference to these bonds, a short time ago I advised a lady to buy $3,500 worth of those bonds for the reason indicated. They are being bought all the time in the city of Cincinnati. My friend from Cleveland boasted about the credit of his city. The city of Cincinnati is the only city in the United States that has sold municipal bonds at par at three per cent, and she has done it because of this law. If you repeal this law she could not come within one-half per cent of that, for until we had this law we never were able to sell bonds at three per cent.

Mr. ANDERSON: You saved that much then, but do you think it paid the state as a whole to provide millions and millions of dollars to permit those who want to escape paying taxes to do so? You understand it cuts both ways?

Mr. PECK: What do you mean by both ways?

Mr. ANDERSON: The banks pay so much taxes and the individuals go to the bank and deposit money and get the municipal bonds out and the holder of the municipal bonds does not have to pay taxes and the bank doesn't have to pay on the money.

Mr. PECK: Why not?

Mr. ANDERSON: The bank pays on its capital.

Mr. PECK: It pays on what it has.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you mean to say the bank has to pay any more taxes providing the bonds are put into money?

Mr. DOTY: Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you say they do?

Mr. DOTY: No—

Mr. ANDERSON: It provides an easy means of escaping paying taxes.

Mr. PECK: You can do that with any nontaxable security. You will have a good time getting the constitution adopted if you put this in, as sure as you are living.

Mr. PETTIT: Do you think the bondholders are going to rule the next election?

Mr. PECK: No, sir; but they are going to vote according to their interests, just as the farmers are going to vote according to their interests, and they have the right on their side this time. They have a right to insist upon the administration of law and insist upon justice.

Mr. JONES: One further question. You made a statement that these bonds sold for less since the amendment exempting them in 1905. Do you not know that here in the city of Columbus the public issues of bonds sold for less before that exemption than they have since at any time?

Mr. PECK: I have never heard of it.

Mr. JONES: That is a fact.

Mr. PECK: But I want to call attention to another fact, that about ten years ago there was a period when rates of interest in Ohio were very low.

Mr. DOTY: The same as rates of interest every where else.

Mr. PECK: Rates of interest were very low. I do not think they have ever been as low since. The city of Cincinnati refunded Cincinnati's debts at three and a half per cent and never has been able to do it since, and that is the time when the city of Columbus I suppose sold the low bonds and the market went back. In other words, the rate of interest is affected by other things than the law of taxation—the market price.

Mr. JONES: The rate of interest upon the issue of bonds has not materially changed by reason of tax exemption.

Mr. PECK: Tax exemption has had more to do with the change of rate of interest on that class of security than anything else. Municipal bonds are bought as a permanent investment generally. The people expect to keep them. The person who buys them buys them to secure a permanent income and at the same time security. They calculate what they will get, and if they have calculated four per cent and have to pay two per cent taxes, their income would be reduced just as much.

Mr. JONES: If that is sound, would it not logically follow that there should be a difference in the price of municipal bonds in Ohio and of all other bonds equivalent to the tax rate, whereas there is only a fraction of one per cent difference in the rates?

Mr. PECK: You compare bonds of a good municipality in Ohio—any town of any size—with the rates of railroad bonds. There is no railroad in the country that can sell bonds much less than five per cent and the rate of interest they pay you will often cause their bonds to sell at about eighty-five while the municipal bonds are always par.

Mr. JONES: Do you know the price in Ohio of Boston and Chicago bonds as compared with Ohio bonds?

Mr. PECK: Are they just the same as Ohio bonds, nontaxable?

Mr. JONES: Under the law they are taxable.

Mr. PECK: Then there are not many of them in Ohio.

Mr. JONES: A great many, selling at substantially the same price as Ohio bonds.

Mr. PECK: I never knew any of them to be sold. Now I would like to say a few words without interruption. I have yielded to all the questions I want to. What caused me to break into this discussion was the attempt to put on the tax duplicate the bonds sold before 1905. The other proposition is to tax bonds hereafter issued, and that is a matter of policy. There is there no question of justice or injustice. I submit to you that the people were wise and they knew a great deal more what they were doing when they voted for that exemption than a good many of you think they did. Do you believe that those six hundred thousand people who voted for that are all fools? If you do you are mistaken. They are not so easily fooled. Do you think the politicians could carry out any scheme when all the people in Ohio know about the scheme? The true policy is, and it is the policy adopted for all the large states in the Union, New York, Massachusetts and every large state—the plan is to exempt the bonds of state, municipalities and of the counties of the state from taxation, for they know the money comes back to the counties and municipalities and in that way to the people in the reduction of the interest rates they get. The rates of interest they have to pay are that much less. The people of Guernsey county will be taxed that much less on the bonds issued by Guernsey county and any other county in the state is in the same boat. Mahoning county has an issue of $2,000,000 of bonds for building a court house, and if she has to do a thing like that again will find she can get a higher rate for bonds and will have that much less to pay if they are exempt from taxation. She can sell them at three or three and a half per cent, whereas she could not sell them at less than five per cent before. That is opening an investment to our own people that you are shutting out by adopting the proposal that bonds shall not be exempt from taxation in this state, and you are forcing the bonds of the state of Ohio to be sold outside and the bond market of Cleveland and Cincinnati will not be regulated as it is now by our own cities and towns, but it will be regulated in New York and Boston, and the bonds will go there for a market and you will never reach them for any purpose of taxation. You will lose the benefit you would get in the reduced rates and you will get no taxes on the bonds. That is what your proposition will come to. This other way you get a sure benefit as against a doubtful claim that can not be enforced. In fact, you say the bonds are not taxed even at home, that there are some people who buy and hide them but they can not be traced, that the only way you can find out about the bonds is that the coupons regularly appear in the bank for collection and the bank presents them to the sinking fund. Who owns them the bankers don't know. Brother Jones would not know where he got them if he went to the sinking fund with the coupons. That is all you can find out about the bonds. Coupons come in with great regularity and you do not know where the bonds are. They disappear as quickly as water thrown on the sand. I think I have taken up too much time and said more than I intended, but I feel some interest in the discussion because it is one upon which I happen to be incidentally tolerably well informed. The line of practice which I have had for years past has thrown me in contact with this question of municipal bonds a good deal, and I have seen a great deal of it, and when I make a statement about these things I know what I am talking about. I know what the effect of this will be on Cleveland and Cincinnati when they propose to take advantage of this home rule proposal and sell their bonds to buy parks, boulevards and provide playgrounds. I know they will have to pay higher rates if you pass this measure. The amendment is perfectly vicious and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. DWYER: Is it not a fact that when the bonds were issued subject to tax they were not purchased in the home market and the state got no tax from them?

Mr. PECK: That is true.

Mr. DWYER: I would like any gentleman here to show me where the bonds were ever returned for taxation that were sold subject to tax?

Mr. PECK: The bonds were bought by brokers who acted for other parties and they generally went right out of the state into the eastern market. The bonds of Cleveland and Cincinnati and Youngstown—the bonds of any good thriving town in the state—find a ready market anywhere in the East, because there is nothing safer than a municipal bond. The town can not break or run away.

Mr. DWYER: Is it not a fact that when the bonds were subject to taxation the city didn't get as good price for the bonds as now?

Mr. PECK: That is exactly what I was saying.

Mr. DWYER: And if they get a low price now doesn't the public get the benefit?

Mr. PECK: Yes.

Taxation.

Mr. DWYER: In the other case the public got no revenue from the bonds at all?

Mr. PECK: Yes; that is right. They get benefit two ways now.

Mr. PRESIDENT: Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PECK: No, I decline to yield. They get the benefit in two ways. The first is in the sale of the bonds. The cities and towns get a higher price. The second is that they can sell at a lower rate of interest, and that is a yearly benefit running on and is fully equal to the amount in taxes, and nine times out of ten exceeds the amount of taxes that you would ever get on those bonds.

Mr. WATSON: I do not wish to be too inquisitorial, but I realize we are all creatures of environment and I want to ask this question: Do you own any bonds?

Mr. PECK: No, sir.

Mr. WATSON: Are you attorney for any bond brokers?

Mr. PECK: I have been. I am not now. I am not the attorney of anybody when I am here. And you can just put that down in your pipe. Old Peck is here for the people of Ohio and nobody else. I have represented corporations, individuals, bondbrokers, bankers, farmers, and I have represented women, children and every other class in the community, but I do not represent anybody here but all classes. My office is open to anybody who has a legitimate claim and a fee. They can come to me right along. This is no joking matter. This matter is one of importance to the state of Ohio and to the welfare of the people of the state generally. This amendment is an outrageous piece of injustice, if adopted, and the original proposal ought to have the provision in it that is in the constitutional amendment of 1905, which is a wise provision. It is the provision that every great financial community has adopted and they have found it to be wise. This is a reactionary policy that goes the other way. In order to show my good faith about the Mauck amendment I move that it be tabled.

Mr. MAUCK: And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 69, nays 38, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Hahn,	Miller, Crawford,
Beyer,	Halenkamp,	Miller, Ottawa,

So the motion to table was carried.

Mr. EVANS: I offer a substitute for the proposal itself.

The substitute was read as follows:

Strike out all after line 4 and all pending amendments and substitute the following:

SECTION 1. The general assembly shall levy and collect taxes in such manner as it may deem proper, but all taxes shall be just to the subject taxed, and in each and every class of subjects, the burdens shall be laid equally, according to the same rule.

SECTION 2. All property of the United States; the state, cities, counties, townships and the public schools, and the bonds or obligations of these bodies shall not be taxed. The general assembly may exempt from taxation, churches, universities, colleges, seminaries, schools, all institutions of public charity, and their endowments, and such property of individuals as shall be deemed best for the public good.

Mr. EVANS: I have thought that this is the best measure that can be adopted by this Convention on this subject. This is the result of forty years of study of the subject of taxation, and when I began that study I did it with an open mind. I had no preconceived notions or ideas. I did not represent any particular school of thought; but taxation is the most important power of government. It includes all other powers. Give me the power to tax and I will control a state. Consequently if we have any use for the legislature we must trust it; it must represent the people; we must leave the subject to it. The taxation of property is the most important subject to the people. When we touch the pocket-book nerve of the people of Ohio we touch the most sensitive nerve of the whole body politic, and if you make a mistake in framing this constitution on the subject of taxation it will be rejected on that ground, no matter about all the other provisions. Now you are right at the Rubicon. You are ready to cross. Are you going to stay in your province of Gaul, or are you going to cross and make war on Rome? I tell you if you adopt this minority report you will cross the Rubicon, but you will have a different fate from that of Caesar. Caesar conquered Rome, but this will be different from that. Rome will conquer Caesar. This is a proper thing to leave to the legislature and let us do as they did from 1802 to 1851. The legislature declared as to each particular class of property that it should be taxed or should not be, and when they declared it should be taxed they fixed the rate, and that is the only way you can have it done. If the legislature happens to make a mistake, if they happen to put too great a tax on any subject, there is a provision by which the owners of the property that belong to that class can appeal to the court and declare the tax unjust. What else can you want? I predict if my proposition could be adopted it would be the best thing that ever happened for the state of Ohio. If we attempt to tax public bonds we will not get any tax on them. It never can be collected. It would be an effort to enforce something that we could not carry out. I will tell you we have exempted public bonds in Ohio, but we made one mistake. We didn't exempt the same class of bonds of other states. If the citizen is allowed to own Ohio public bonds free of taxes he ought to be allowed to own bonds of the same class of other states free of taxes, and he ought not to be penalized because he buys municipal bonds of Indiana, Ohio or Pennsylvania. Let us consider right in this matter. It is a simple question of dollars and cents. Take a common school district and say the bonds are taxable, and that district will have to pay seven or eight per cent, and the bonds will be owned right there in the neighborhood, but they will be in hiding. The creditor will make the extra interest and you will put it in his pocket. Take the tax off and the state or municipalities can sell the bonds at four or five per cent. They usually run twenty or thirty years and just calculate what the difference in this amounts to. The public pays that if you undertake to tax the bonds, and the public will pay the extra interest but will never get anything back in the way of taxation. The bondholders will get it all and you can not prevent it. There is no use in undertaking to legislate in this fundamental law against human nature or against economic laws. Your tax boards in this state can give all the instructions they wish to the assessor, but it is folly; they can not enforce the law. If the people believe a system is unjust, they will not return their property and you can not make them. The thing to do is to exercise a little common sense and recognize human nature as it is, and the principles of economics.

I say to you that this minority proposition, as well as the majority, undertakes to legislate against economic laws and against human nature, and whenever that is done, it will be a failure every time. Try to do something you can do, and refrain from the folly of attempting to do what you cannot do. You have been trying for sixty-one years to do something you can not do, and if you should be so unfortunate as to adopt either of these reports in sixty-one years from now the measure will be as great a failure as it is today. I do hope for the credit of the state of Ohio, my native state, of which I am very proud, that we shall not disgrace it by undertaking to adopt either of these reports and place in the organic law a provision against economic law and against human nature that can never be enforced.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton, was here recognized.

Mr. DOTY: Will the gentleman yield for a motion to recess?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Not quite yet. I am very glad that the three amendments, the minority report, the Anderson substitute and the Evans substitute, are before the Convention, because those three propositions embody the entire question and will give us a chance to debate the entire question from every point of view. Now I yield for a motion to recess.

Mr. DOTY: I move that we recess until this afternoon.

The motion was carried and the Convention recessed until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess.

Mr. DOTY: I demand a call of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: A call of the Convention is demanded. The sergeant-at-arms will close the doors and the secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Brown, Highland,	King,	Read,
Brown, Lucas,	Kramer,	Shaw,
Cunningham,	Marriott,	Smith, Hamilton,
Eby,	Miller, Crawford,	Stamm,
Farrell,	Miller, Fairfield,	Stokes,
Fox,	Norris,	Tallman,
Harter, Huron,	Price,	Worthington.

The president announced that ninety-eight members had answered to their names.

Mr. DOTY: I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I move that further consideration of Proposal No. 170 be postponed for five minutes.

The motion was carried.

By unanimous consent Mr. Hoskins submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Corporations other than Municipal, to which was referred Proposal No. 328 — Mr. Woods, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its indefinite postponement.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Hoskins submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Corporations other than Municipal, to which was referred Proposal No. 319 — Mr. Okey, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its indefinite postponement.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Hoskins submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Corporations other than Municipal, to which was referred Proposal No. 51 — Mr. Miller, of Crawford, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

At the end of proposal add:

"The general assembly may provide by law for the regulation of all rates charged or to be charged by any insurance company, corporation or association organized under the laws of this state or doing any insurance business in the state.”

S. A. HOSKINS,	H. K. SMITH,
JOHN C. RORICK,	AARON HAHN,
W. W. STOKES,	E. A. PETERS,
HUMPHREY JONES,	HENRY E. EBY,
ROSCOE J. MAUCK,	HENRY F. CORDES.

Mr. Stilwell submitted the following report:

The minority of the standing committee on Corporations other than Municipal, to which was referred Proposal No. 51 — Mr. Miller, of Crawford, having had the same under consideration, submits the following minority report, and recommends that the same be substituted for the majority report:

Strike out all after the title and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE VIII.

SECTION 6. The general assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town or township, by vote of its citizens, or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint stock company, corporation, or association whatever; or to raise money for, or to loan its credit to, or in aid of any such company, corporation, or association.

The general assembly may provide by law for the regulation of all rates charged or to be charged by any insurance company, corporation or association organized under the laws of this state or doing any insurance business in this state.

Provided, however, that the general assembly may establish and maintain a bureau of insurance for the purpose of furnishing fire, life, accident or other insurance to the citizens of the state, and provided further, that nothing in this section shall prevent public buildings or property being insured in mutual fire insurance associations or companies.”

S. S. STILWELL,	JOHN C. HOFFMAN,
W. B. KILPATRICK,	HENRY E. EBY,
H. K. SMITH,	J. M. EARNHART.
DAVID PIERCE,

Mr. Doty moved that further consideration of the proposal be postponed until tomorrow and that it be placed on the calendar for that day.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I move that those reports be printed in the meantime.

The motion was carried.

By unanimous consent Mr. Cassidy offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 115:

Resolved, That the following bills which have been filed with the secretary of this Convention be allowed and ordered paid:

The Beggs Co., labor.....	$11 00
Central Union Telephone Co., toll.....	146 45
Columbus Citizens Telephone Co., toll and rental	134 20
The Crystal Ice Mfg. & Cold Storage Co., water	37 00
The F. J. Heer Printing Co., printing...	517 10
The Lowe Bros. Machine Works, labor..	1 00
Remington Typewriter Co., rental.....	25 50
A. Rosnagle & Co., supplies.....	14 00
E. H. Sell & Co., rental.....	4 50
A. H. Smythe, supplies.....	5 40
Fred H. Tibetts, printing.....	2 50
The J. L. Trauger Printing Co., printing and supplies	678 40
Underwood Typewriter Co., rental....	35 50
J. M. & W. Westwater, supplies.....	5 75
George F. Jelleff, labor and supplies....	7 90

On motion of Mr. Doty, the resolution was referred to the committee on Claims Against the Convention.

Mr. Lampson offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 116:

Resolved, That the following bills against the Convention be allowed and ordered paid.

Andrew Earl, supplies	$17 40
T. J. Dundon & Co., supplies and hauling	5 00

On motion of Mr. Doty, the resolution was referred to the committee on Claims Against the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the house is Proposal No. 170 and the vote will be first upon the substitute offered by the delegate from Scioto [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, having yielded the floor for a motion to recess, was recognized by the president.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Mr. President and Fellow Delegates: If there be one time in the course of our deliberations where it is proper that we should bear in mind the wise old adage “Come, let us reason together”, that time is now. We are discussing a subject which affects the weal or woe of five million people now living in the state of Ohio. Passion and prejudice and oratory should have no place in our deliberations.

I am in favor of classification and I advocate it after the most thorough consideration of the subject for the past ten years, and because I find it advocated by the greatest political economists of the world. The United States boasts the proud distinction of having wrested from England and from Germany the authority in matters of political economy. There are two men in the United States who are recognized by political economists of Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria, Russia, Italy and Spain as the greatest living authorities on political economy. Those men advocate and urge in their published writings the classification of property for the commonwealths of the United States. They are Professor Seligman, of Columbia University, and Professor Taussig, of Harvard University, and I shall stop for a moment and ask Doctor Colton as president of Hiram College —

Mr. COLTON: Not president.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Well, as connected with Hiram College—whether he does or does not recognize the supremacy in matters of political economy of the men whom I have named?

Taxation.

Mr. COLTON: They are very prominent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I shall ask Doctor Colton another question: Do you know of any political economist in America of accepted authority who in the past thirty or forty years advocated publicly in his writings any thing but classification together with income and inheritance taxes? If so, will you please name the man for my information, so I can make a study of his writing?

Mr. COLTON: I will say in answer to the gentleman's inquiry, as far as condemning the general property tax, what the gentleman states is true. You will find nearly all of the authorities on his side. I am not ready, however, to say that they all commend classification. Some of them do. I can not name the authorities who advocate certain substitutes for personal property tax which would not fall under the head of classification.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Now, members of the Convention, I call your attention here to a list of the states of the United States which have adopted classification. It is the only memorandum I have. It was compiled by Judge Worthington for the benefit of the committee on Taxation from Thorpe's Constitutions, 1910. I give the states and the times since which they have had classification: Vermont, 1877; Rhode Island, 1876; Virginia, 1902; Colorado, 1876; Connecticut, 1776; Delaware, 1776; Georgia, 1877; Idaho, 1899; Iowa, 1846; Maryland, 1776; Massachusetts, 1776; Michigan, 1909; Minnesota, 1906; Missouri, 1820; New Hampshire, 1776; New York, 1776; Oklahoma, 1907; Pennsylvania, 1776; Arizona, 1912.

Gentlemen, in that list you will notice particularly the three great states of New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. Side by side you notice also all of the great progressive states of the Northwest that have recently held constitutional conventions. With the experience of one hundred and forty years before them, they have discarded the uniform rule of taxation and adopted the classification of property tax. I ask the laboring men in this Convention to what states they look for the most advanced legislation in labor matters. The answer will be New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. I ask those who are familiar with insurance and banking, to what states they look for the most advanced legislation on those subjects, and their answer will be New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. In recent years Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan and other states have been added to that proud list.

The opposition to classification is fear and prejudice. Prejudice and fear are the only two reasons for the opposition to classification. Classification aims to do that which those who fear and those who are prejudiced against it think will not be done. The basis of their opposition to it is the very thing which classification aims at overcoming. Classification aims primarily at the element of human nature. Classification aims to get taxation on certain forms of property which the experience of fifty years has demonstrated can not be gotten by a uniform rule of taxation. A classification tax says that the bonds of a municipality, corporation bonds if you will under the uniform rule of taxation on intangible personal property escape taxation because human nature is greater than any statute. The uniform rule applies such a high rate on the income that the holder seeks every means to escape it. We are not dealing now with the morality of the question. Taxation is a practical concrete proposition. The present rate is fifteen mills in the city of Cincinnati. Why is that rate to a certain extent so great apparently that it induces the holders of bonds other than municipal—which latter are exempt from taxation, but high-grade railroad bonds bringing in four per cent or three and three-quarters—why is that rate of fifteen mills so great as to prevent the listing of the bonds? That is a question of mathematics. Let us determine it by mathematics.

Ten thousand dollars of four per cent bonds bring in an income of $400. Now the uniform rule of taxation at present existing in the state of Ohio, subjects those $10,000 of bonds to taxation in the city of Cincinnati at the rate of fifteen mills, so that the amount of the tax would be $150; $150 is about thirty-seven and a half per cent of the total income. Do you know why such securities evade the tax gatherer? Simply because you are taxing the thing itself and not the income. It is taking under our present law thirty-seven and a half per cent of the income. Human nature says we will not pay thirty-seven and a half per cent of the income; first, because we can not afford to do it and second because we consider it unjust and immoral; we find that merchandise that is paying $150 on $10,000 is earning fifteen to twenty-five per cent—at least fifteen per cent—and the comparison between the percentages of taxation on the incomes of the two classes of property and the burden is so great on the owner of the bonds that he does not list them.

You answer and say, "But the law is there." The law and the machinery with which to execute the law are both there. That is true, but have not the law and the officers of the law and the machinery of the law been there for sixty years? Have we not had tax inquisitors always with us who were given as much as twenty-five to fifty per cent of the amount of back taxes collected, as a fee? And how much of this property has come out? Do you mean to say here that this body or any body that succeeds it as a legislature will so change human nature that they will be able to make better laws and find better officers and better machinery than have been found in the past sixty years? Do you not know that this is ridiculous? That is why we favor classification. We take that same element of human nature and we say that we will put these bonds in a special class by themselves and charge five mills instead of fifteen and make the penalty for failure to list very heavy. That same element of human nature which refuses to pay thirty-seven and one-half per cent of its income will say, "I will pay ten per cent of my income on those bonds."

Mr. WATSON: Will you yield?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: No, sir; I have not any notes and I am speaking simply "on my feet," and I prefer not to be interrupted. The average man will pay ten per cent of his income from his bonds. The average man wants to pay taxes and only refuses to pay when you compel him to consider the elements of self-preservation. And so classification runs on through. It aims to put certain lines of property in certain classes at lower or higher rates, according to the ability of the tax-gatherer to collect the lower or higher rate. In every instance in which it has been tried, for we are not sailing on uncharted seas, it has proved remarkably successful. As I answered an inquiry the other day, I will give you again this concrete illustration, and it could be multiplied a thousand times. Some years ago the legislature of Maryland permitted its city to adopt classification, and the statements I am going to give you are from a printed pamphlet furnished to the committee on Taxation and read by me to the committee at one of its meetings. I am charging my mind with the results of those investigations. It was incorporated in a report from the Kentucky committee on taxation made to the governor and the legislature of Kentucky imploring the state of Kentucky to adopt classification. The city of Baltimore in about 1896, before the classification of property was permitted, returned in personal property about $5,000,000. The rate was about three per cent and the revenue was about $150,000. In 1906 the statement gave the increase in every year during ten years, including the year of the great fire, in which there was a slight falling off of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000. In the year 1906 people of the city of Baltimore returned $150,000,000 of personal property for taxation and the city of Baltimore received something like $450,000 of revenue therefrom. Last spring the legislature of New York enacted a law stating in substance that the holders of certain classes of bonds, which at that time were not exempt from taxation, could, upon delivering them to the state treasurer at Albany and paying a tax of one-half of one per cent, have the bonds stamped declaring the bonds thereafter were forever exempted from taxation. I wrote to my banker in New York and asked him to get from the state comptroller of New York concrete results of the operation of that law. I read the letter in question to the committee on Taxation and now give you the substance of it so far as my memory carries it. The comptroller wrote that the law became operative September 1, 1911, and in the four months of September, October, November and December, there had been surrendered to the comptroller at Albany $300,000,000 of those bonds on which a tax of one-half of one per cent was paid and which theretofore had not paid anything, although subject to taxation. It is computed that within eighteen to twenty-four months from the operation of the law, taking again into consideration that element of human nature which controls all our actions (fear on the part of the holders whether the law would stand and wanting to see how it operated, to see that there was no trick in it), that there will probably be two billions of bonds returned to the comptroller for taxation. That is the theory of classification. It is not to help the rich man, as you believe. It is advocated by the greatest political economists of our times as a distinct step in advance toward a practical solution of a question that would otherwise seem to be unsolvable.

Now I want to take up with you the question of exempting municipal bonds from taxation. There is no question before you which ought to receive from you more serious consideration, and that ought to appeal to people coming from the small villages or small communities so much more strongly than from the large communities. I know from practical experience that prior to the time when municipal bonds were exempt from taxation the small villages were fortunate when they floated their bonds at par bearing six per cent interest. Every inhabitant in that small village contributed his share toward that six per cent of interest that went on day and night. The small place was at the mercy to a certain extent of the bond buyer, because its bonds have no general market. They can not be sold in New York or Pennsylvania or Massachusetts. They can only be sold in Ohio communities and they were subject to taxation by reason of which these small places were heavily burdened. The result, as all of you know who have had any practical experience at all, was that it was extremely rare for any small community of five thousand or less to float their bonds under six per cent interest. The exception only proved the rule. The moment the ban of taxation was lifted conditions radically changed, and bear in mind always that neither the state nor the county nor the municipality got any of that tax because the bonds were not listed for taxation; it was a burden placed upon the community by the buyers of the bonds. They charged for the risk taken by them in concealing the bonds from the tax officials. Now the moment the law was passed exempting the bonds of all municipalities from taxation, those of us who had anything at all to do with municipal and county bonds noticed immediately a drop from six per cent to five per cent in the bonds of the smaller communities and at times as low as four and a half per cent. Why? Because then the small community was not at the mercy of the bond buyer. The neighboring farmer who had $500 or $1,000, or the laboring man who had $500 or $1,000, or any other person in the community with money, bought those bonds. The bonds could be sold in the immediate neighborhood where the financial strength and character of that particularly small community were well understood. The people knew they were safe, they knew they were taking no risk, whether it was a city of five thousand or of three thousand or of one thousand. It made no difference. Those bonds are almost universally held by the farmers and small investors in the small community.

Now what practical advantage will you gain by making municipal bonds subject to taxation? Assuming for the sake of argument, and I only do it for the sake of argument, that you will get some of that interest back in the form of taxes, the amount received will be very small as compared to the additional amount by reason of the increased rate of taxation you will pay annually. As a practical proposition it amazes me that this question should receive any serious consideration in this Convention. I can not figure out the mental reasoning that goes on. We know what has been the experience in the past and it is safe to predicate the future on the known conditions of the past. We know what will happen as to the larger municipalities, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Dayton, Youngstown, etc. The bonds of half a dozen of the large municipalities have a market outside of the state. Cincinnati will sell its bonds as it has done for the past thirty-five years. We have a magnificent market in New York city. Millions and millions of our bonds issued for the construction of the Southern Railway Company were held by the savings banks of New York city and other cities in the state of New York. I remember that one large bank held one registered bond for about $800,000. Another bank in New York held one of our registered bonds for $1,200,000. Registering a bond simply means the surrender of the bond with coupons attached and delivery of a non-coupon bearing registered bond in lieu thereof. It means generally that the owner is going to hold these bonds from time of purchase until maturity. Such registered bonds are generally part of the fixed investments of the savings bank.

The moment municipal bonds are made subject to taxation the bond buyers of New York are the great gainers. They say that they can not sell any of those bonds in Ohio because they are subject to tax, and having lost one of their best markets, those bonds, instead of selling at four per cent and at a fine premium, will have to be sold for four and one-half to five per cent, and the municipality will be lucky if it can float its bonds at par at four and one-half per cent. Now where is the good business judgment shown by such methods? Does it take any great financier to show you the absurdity of making municipal bonds the subject of taxation? Is it not a plain, every-day, common-sense transaction?

Remove your prejudice and look at it calmly. Any banker or broker you may speak to will tell you exactly what I am telling you, and I am speaking from ten years of official life in Cincinnati in that particular department concerned in maintaining the city's credit. The general proposition that the community should tax itself is so ridiculous that to state it is simply to cause its defeat. Have you considered, gentlemen, that this Convention has just authorized the state of Ohio to issue $50,000,000 of bonds for the construction of good roads? Now you will pay the interest on those bonds, and yet have you considered for one moment the idea of increasing your own taxes for the purpose of giving an advantage to New York bankers who will buy the bonds of the state of Ohio that are so gilt-edged, but knowing they would not have the general market of the state of Ohio the moment they are taxed, they will penalize the state of Ohio? I make the statement here, and I believe it to be absolutely correct and have no fear that time will not justify it, that if you do not commit the unpardonable crime of making municipal, county and state bonds subject to taxation, there will be no difficulty at all in selling at par the $50,000,000 of bonds of the state of Ohio issued at three and a half per cent, and possibly at a premium, for I say to you that the great bankers of France and England, some of the great continental financiers, will take part of those bonds. That is where part of them will eventually be held. That is how high the credit of the state of Ohio stands. Several millions of bonds issued by the city of Cincinnati for the construction of its Southern Railway were sold in the city of London and were held there for forty years, until their maturity, and one of the conditions named in that particular issue of bonds was that they should be payable in pounds sterling as well as dollars, and the bonds came back to us from the city of London; they had never left the bank to which they were originally sold forty years ago.

Now, gentlemen, there is another subject on which I wish to speak that it pains me to speak about, and in order that my words may not be misunderstood I here and now publicly state that I do not hold any member of the minority committee responsible for knowledge of the conditions which I shall now disclose. I distinctly exonerate them from any known participation in the outrage that is attempted to be foisted on this Convention.

A few days ago one hundred and four members of this Convention declared for home rule. To one who has been a student of history to some extent, I noticed the historical significance that in 1912 an empire that the greatness of Rome in all its glory never equaled had finally determined to do justice, and had given home rule to Ireland. I thought it more than a coincidence that in the same year and almost the same month, our municipalities in Ohio, from the smallest village to the largest city, were being freed and delivered from the thralldom of state control and were being given home rule. So did I and so did every one of you. It never entered your minds for a moment that instead of being given home rule, home rule was being taken from you stealthily and cunningly by those whom you supposed were its friends. I saw the minority members of my sister committee on Taxation offering to this Convention its substitute proposal and I studied it, and I was shocked when I discovered that without their knowledge, without a thought of the iniquity being practiced and in their gullibility, they had permitted the corporations which owned the private utilities that are throttling our cities to cunningly get in their work. The minority report on taxation stood with its right hand extended with palm upward in a brotherly fashion to the committee on Municipal Government, but with its left hand around the neck in what we supposed was a friendly embrace, but was instead in the act of sticking a stiletto under the fourth rib. Now how did they do it? Read section 7. The minority did not know what they were doing. No, gentlemen, you thought that public utilities were going to be given you. You naturally believed that you had in your power the ability to own and operate and construct public utilities in your own villages and cities. Of course, it occurred to you that it required money to do this, but the privately owned utilities would have destroyed you. They have limited by constitutional law—think how cunning it was, how well thought out, all for the protection of the people they said and in order that the people could not get too much money—they have limited the power of bond issues and debt to four per cent of the tax duplicate in the cities. With that limitation you will never own any public utilities. Today the limit under the referendum vote is five per cent. The difference of the one per cent in the city of Cincinnati is $5,000,000, because our tax duplicate is $507,000,000. In the city of Cleveland it is about $7,000,000, because its tax duplicate is about $700,000,000. If we in the larger cities or you in the smaller cities, because the proportion relatively is just the same, want to own, construct or operate our public utilities, and we found that the five per cent limit would not enable us to do so, we would go to the legislature and ask for that which was carefully preserved by your committee on Municipal Government, namely, for a special law to enable that particular municipality to increase its debt limit to eight per cent, and, if necessary to spend $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 in a manner most profitable to the municipality because then they would be exclusively general bonds, not special bonds, based on franchise and the utility, and the legislature would enact that special law, then the particular municipality, whether a city of six hundred thousand or six hundred, could determine for itself if it wanted to avail itself of this special law. But section 7 cunningly provides by a constitutional enactment that you can not do that. Remember a legislative enactment is quite a different proposition. You could change that at any session of the legislature whenever the demand was strong enough, but a constitutional provision is not so easily changed. And so in the house of its friends, in the midst of our rejoicing, when all through the state everybody was of the opinion that municipalities had finally obtained home rule, the minority report of the committee on Taxation, with the sneer of Mephistopheles takes it away from us. Of course, I am aware that no single member of that committee knew anything about it. Of course not, or it would not appear there, but I know a little better than some of those gentlemen do, the underground conduits through which corporations work. A chance conversation with Mr. Smith or Mr. James, who may or may not be a member of this Convention, or one of the Convention who may be innocent of any complicity, admits a suggestion from an outside source and it seems good. My very blood boils with indignation when I think that after all these years of servitude, when the Ohio municipalities thought they had stricken off their shackles, we find in the taxation proposal a carefully worded phrase which would rivet the shackles stronger than they were before—and our humiliation and destruction had come to us from within the house of its friends.

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. DOTY: At the present time an amendment would not be in order, but I would like to withdraw the amendment I have pending so the gentleman can offer his amendment.

The PRESIDENT: Without objection the amendment of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] is withdrawn.

Mr. KNIGHT: I now offer the following amendment—

Mr. WOODS: I object to the withdrawal of that amendment of the member from Cuyahoga. I do not think one member has the right to withdraw an amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. Knight was read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. Evans to Proposal No. 170 as follows: After the word "taxed" and before the period insert "unless such taxation shall be authorized by general laws."

Mr. WOODS: I want to know whether a member of this Convention has not a right to object to the withdrawal of an amendment that is before the Convention?

The PRESIDENT: Will the member quote the rule on the subject?

Mr. WOODS: I move that the pending amendment and the amendment to the amendment be laid on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 64, nays 42, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the motion to table was lost.

Mr. WINN: I desire to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of the amendment offered by Mr. Anderson add the following to be known as section 9 of said article XII of the constitution:

SECTION 9. The maximum rate of taxes that may be levied for all purposes shall not in any year exceed ten mills on each dollar of the total value of all property, as listed and assessed for taxation, in any township, city, village, school district, or other taxing district. Additional levies, not exceeding in any year a maximum of five mills, for all purposes, on each dollar of the total value of all the property therein, as listed and assessed for taxation, in any taxing district, may be levied when such additional levies are authorized by a majority vote of the electors voting thereon at an election held for such purpose; but in no case shall the combined maximum rate of taxes for all purposes, levied in any year in any township, city, village, school district, or other taxing district, exceed fifteen mills on each dollar of the total value of all the property, as listed and assessed for taxation, in such district.

Mr. WINN: Gentlemen of the Convention: This amendment which I offer is taken from one of the paragraphs of the majority report. It differs from the minority report in that it contains no limitation as respects the amount of bonds that may be issued and outstanding by municipalities. In other words, the amendment attempts to do nothing more than limit the rate of taxation. The limitation of the rate of taxation is a proper subject for consideration by a constitutional convention. In nearly all of the states some limitations are made, and in my judgment the limitation of this amendment is the correct one.

Mr. ANDERSON: How do you figure that that is the correct one? What can you take as a basis for your figures? What figuring can demonstrate its correctness? Is not that very indefinite?

Mr. WINN: I want to say to the member that I prefer to discuss this in my own way, and when I am through I will have made it as plain as I am able to do why I think the limitation here is the correct one. Then I shall be glad to answer any question that is asked me.

When I was elected a member of the Convention, and when I came here, it was with an open mind as respects this question of classification of property. Twice within the last ten or fifteen years we have voted for a constitutional amendment authorizing the classification of property, and if my memory is not at fault I voted both times in favor of the proposed amendment. I believed in it because I thought there existed some good reason for the classification. I came to this Convention hall one night to hear several experts discuss the question and I came with an open mind, expecting that before they concluded their remarks I would be convinced they were right. But much to my surprise, I found myself, as the argument progressed, taking the other side of the proposition, and when those men had concluded what they had to offer in favor of classification I was altogether opposed to it, and I will tell you why. I thought property ought to be classified because it would make it possible for us to reach a class of property that in a measure at least escaped taxation; but I found that all the argument in favor of the classification of property was that we make it easier for some property to escape taxation. I spent a few minutes this forenoon in ascertaining as near as I could how property is escaping taxation in some of the large cities. Here are a few figures that I hastily gathered from an official report. If this report is correct, in Cuyahoga county in 1909 there was returned for taxation moneys on hand and subject to check $1,800,000. I give it in round figures. There was at the same time on deposit in the banks of Cuyahoga county subject to check $165,000,000. In Hamilton county there was on deposit $111,000,000, while $1,113,000 was returned for taxation. In Franklin county there was $32,000,000 subject to check, and 1,600,000 returned for taxation. In Montgomery county there was $14,000,000 on deposit, and $1,500,000 returned for taxation.

Now, last night the member from Preble spoke of his county, and I looked that up, and there was $2,252,000 on deposit in 1910. I was not able to get the report for 1911, and so all I can give you is for 1910. In 1910 there was returned in Preble county about $927,000 out of about $2,000,000. Now, come to the county where I live. There was on deposit in the banks of Defiance county $1,313,000, and there was returned for taxation $201,000.

Now I am going to discuss this matter today just as I discussed it with a banker of Defiance county a few days ago. I said to him, "I will not agree to any proposition that will make it easier for any men to avoid taxes," and I want to confirm what was said by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory], that it is not the property that pays the taxes, but it is the owner of the property. I will not consent to any proposition which makes it easier for the owner of property to avoid the payment of taxes. I said this to the banker, "If I have an opportunity in the Constitutional Convention—indeed, if I ever find an opportunity any place where I shall be able to strengthen the law so that the taxing officers may go into your banking institution, and ascertain the name of every man who has money on deposit there, to the end that it may be required to respond in a just amount of taxes, I will do so," and I said to the building and loan association that my firm represents as attorney, "If at any time in the Constitutional Convention or elsewhere I can aid in making it possible for the taxing officers to go into your association and find who it is that owns $780,000 of money that I know is on deposit with your association, I will aid him, to the end that every one of those owners of property may be required to pay taxes." If it were possible to get upon the tax duplicate these concealed funds nothing would be easier than for our counties and municipalities to raise all the funds necessary to carry on their business affairs and pay their debts; and the reason we have not been able to do it heretofore was because we have all the time attempted to make it easier for men with money to avoid paying taxes upon it. Now it appeals to me this way: I have in mind an illustration in one of the townships where I live. A man died a couple of years ago leaving an estate of about $80,000. It was inherited by his two sons. One of them took his $40,000 and put it in one of our banks and in our building and loan associations. So much as went on deposit in the building and loan associations earns five per cent interest, and that in the bank earns three per cent. The other son invested his money in a farm in Defiance county. Is there any justice in a proposition that will permit the one who put his money in the bank and the building and loan associations to escape all the taxes, which he will do, when the one who put his money in the farm will have to pay full taxes?

I offer this amendment so that we can meet the question face to face as early in the discussion as possible.

Mr. FACKLER: I have never been an advocate of the classification of property for the purpose of taxation, but I have believed that taxation is a matter upon which public opinion is in a formative stage, and it should be left to the legislature rather than fixed in the constitution, and I have been interested as a resident in a large city, or district in which there is a large city in which I am interested, in that part of the minority report which undertook to limit the powers of the city, and I am pleased to note in the amendment of the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] that the arbitrary limit of the bonded debt was abandoned. The bonded debt there was not only decreased, but if section 7 of the minority report were adopted, water works bonds, which have heretofore been eliminated in figuring the debt limit, would be included; but the amendment of the delegate from Defiance [Mr. WINN] provides the maximum tax rate shall never exceed ten mills. That is more stringent than the Smith bill. The Smith bill allows levies for sinking funds. The Cleveland sinking fund levy is 1.38. We can not get along with this amendment, and I offer an amendment raising that limit to enable the cities to get on temporarily.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. Winn to Proposal No. 170, as follows:

In the second line of section 9, change "ten" to "fifteen". In line 11 change "fifteen" to "twenty".

Mr. CASSIDY: I move to lay the Winn amendment and the Fackler amendment on the table.

Mr. WINN: I want the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member want the yeas and nays, or will he allow the president to count?

Mr. WINN: I want them to go on record.

Mr. PRICE: I ask for a division of the questions.

The PRESIDENT: The question then is upon laying the Winn amendment upon the table.

Mr. DOTY: No; if anybody had desired to lay the Fackler amendment on the table, a motion could have been made to that effect. A motion was made to lay the pending amendment and the Fackler amendment upon the table, and that motion is indivisible. I call your attention to the fact that we have already voted once upon this, and we are only allowing a yeas and nays vote by sufferance.

The PRESIDENT: The president sees no reason why a division is not granted and the vote taken.

Mr. FACKLER: I will withdraw my amendment temporarily then.

Mr. WINN: An amendment cannot be withdrawn without unanimous consent.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then I object, and appeal from the decision of the chair, after we have had one vote on it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: And I sustain the appeal.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the decision of the president stand? Those in favor of the motion will say aye, and the contrary no.

The president seems to be sustained, and the vote is on the amendment of the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER]. The question is, Shall this amendment be tabled?

A vote being taken the president declared that the motion seemed to be lost.

A division was called for.

The PRESIDENT: Those in favor of laying the Fackler amendment on the table will please rise. [After a count]. The motion is lost.

Mr. WINN: Now I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOTY: Oh what?

Mr. WINN: On the amendment I offered.

Mr. FESS: I rise for information. The motion was to table these two amendments, and I want to know what we voted on. I do not understand how we can table the Winn amendment without taking the other amendment with it.

Mr. WINN: We have voted on the other amendment, and now I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to table my amendment.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 52, nays 57, as follows:

So the motion to table was lost.

Mr. COLTON: I now offer an amendment.

Mr. FACKLER: I rise to a point of order. There are three amendments pending now.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken. The president recognizes the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. HAHN].

Mr. HAHN: Mr. President and Members of the Convention: F. B. Colbert, the great French financier during the reign of Louis XIII and Louis XIV, was asked what he considered the best principle in taxation. His answer was, "Taxation may be compared to the plucking of the feathers of the geese. Pluck out as many feathers as you possibly can, but only see to it that the goose does not squeak." That policy in taxation of ages past does not hold good in our days. We have to be guided by the principles of the science of taxation.

The great minds of England, France and Germany have given the closest attention possible to that matter; and the consequence is that taxation has become a subject discussed in clubs and societies, books and periodicals, lodges and private assemblies and with the result that the greatest experts of the present day came to the conclusion that uniform taxation has proved to be a failure.

We have two kinds of property, real and personal, and as long as these two classes of property will so radically differ from one another in form, nature and character, it will be necessary to have at least two kinds of taxation. Uniform taxation is and will remain a failure as long as it will be difficult to reach intangible property. If intangible property could not be concealed the whole taxation problem would be solved at once.

I am in favor of the classification of property for taxation purposes for the reason that uniform taxation is in conflict with and in contradiction to every principle of sane taxation. The first fundamental principle of taxation is and should be just distribution of the taxes. But a just distribution of taxes is impossible under the uniform taxation system because uniform taxation means double taxation. I heard yesterday a gentleman here say, "What about double taxation? That is a mere bugaboo. There is nothing of any amount in the state of Ohio that indicates double taxation." As long as there will be a tax on real estate mortgages and at the same time a regular tax on the same encumbered property, and as long as there is tax to be paid by the merchant on his outstanding debts, and at the same time a tax on his stock of goods on which he owes money, and as long as the investor in the stock of a corporation and also the corporation will be taxed on the same stock we have double taxation of a nefarious kind in Ohio.

What are the consequences of double taxation? In the first place, it has a bad moral influence in so far as it leads to lying and to perjuries and to all kinds of schemes by which people conceal their personal property to escape taxation. Mortgages are put in fictitious names or in the names of banks. A great many people do everything to conceal their securities and their money deposits and in most cases it is impossible to do anything against them. It has further a very injurious influence in driving the money out of the state. People think a classified taxation makes it too easy for the rich man to invest his money. You need not worry about the rich man. The capitalist knows where the cities of refuge are to obtain the highest per cent and to secure the greatest benefit. We must rather take care of the farmer, who is threatened by foreclosure and unable to secure a loan, we must think of the merchant, when beneficial for him to put a mortgage on his stock, and of the workingman, when the time comes for him to build a little home and he cannot get a loan because the money is driven out of the state. Who after all has to pay the higher rate of interest? The capitalist finds under all circumstances a way to shift the burden of the taxes upon the shoulders of the borrower. A great injury is wrought in that respect. Moreover the double taxation drives some of the best men from the state. People may say, "Well, we can get along without them." Ah, my friends, that is a great mistake. We can get along and we must get along when it can not be helped, but there are men whose genius, energy and enterprise weigh in the scale of social conditions a great deal more than their dollars and cents. The uniform taxation is against another fundamental principle, the ability to pay taxes. The burden of taxes should not come on the man who is not able to pay. It is a great mistake to think that the man who pays the taxes really is the taxpayer. Very often the man who pays the taxes does not pay them at all. He merely advances the money and the real burden is shifted upon the man who is the least able to bear it. Let us see how that works in some cases. Take, for instance, a farmer who owns some sheep. He has to pay taxes on the sheep. Then the wool is clipped, and there comes in the jobber, and he has to pay taxes on the wool. Then the wool is taken into the factory, and there again is the tax on the machinery. The wool has to be dyed, and it is dyed with taxed dying-stuff; and then when the cloth is produced it goes to the merchant and he has to pay taxes on it, and then the tailor has to pay taxes. Now you can see how often taxes have to be paid upon almost one and the same article. Who after all has to bear the tax burden? The man who buys and wears the clothes. The man who is only too often least able to pay taxes. This is the principle of incidence so often overlooked by the people, but of its evil and wrong effects the poor man is never relieved.

A third fundamental principle of taxation is certainty. There must be a certain taxable object, but the uniform taxation system does not consider that. It imposes taxes upon property it can never reach. Of what benefit to the merchant are outstanding debts he never can collect? And of what benefit is it to the state to put on the tax duplicate personal property that cannot be reached? People say you can force the owners of such property by law. Experience has shown us that force in that respect is inefficient. It is human nature we have here to grapple with. We must take mankind as mankind is. We cannot change human nature. Experience teaches us that when it comes to the payment of taxes upon personal property, people try to evade it as much as possible. It is true, it should not be so. When people take into consideration that they live in a large commonwealth where they enjoy all the blessings of justice and liberty, where they live in affluence and prosperity, they should feel happy and glad to pay taxes and nothing should be farther from them than evasion of taxes. They should consider the day when they go to pay taxes a holiday and they should put on the best of their attire. But not all are so built, and we cannot change human nature. What can be done? Shall the people who have personal property not be taxed at all? That is not the idea. There is only one way by which that evil can be considerably remedied and that is by lowering taxation on personal property. People have money in bank. The money in banks amounts to millions. If you tax it one per cent you cause a great calamity because the people will withdraw it and it will be driven out of the state, but if you tax it at a low rate, let me say one-quarter of one per cent, most of the people will be satisfied, because they know the government has to be supported by tax revenues; and the same thing will be true of foreign stocks. You cannot derive any benefit from it at present, but it will bring millions into the county treasury if only a very small tax is imposed on them. And it will not be different with mortgages. In New York and Philadelphia they have a very low, almost nominal, rate in taxing of mortgages, and to my knowledge it works very satisfactorily. Millions and millions are derived from the lower taxation, while formerly people escaped with paying nothing.

The fourth fundamental and just principle of taxation is to tax the income. It is just because it does not change the prices. It is not an influence upon values, and a man who has an income can better afford to pay than one who is dependent upon agriculture or anything else.

The students of economy were very often perplexed to find a test of taxation. Some thought taxation should be fixed according to the expenses of a man. If a man has large expenses, he ought to pay more taxes. Others again thought property should be a standard of it. They overlooked that property without the right man behind it cannot always be made profitable. Others again thought production was the best test of taxation, but also this was found to be incorrect. My friends, the real test, the real standard of taxation, should be the income of a man. If you raise the taxes on real estate it will at once affect the rent upon factories and stores. If you have a license tax, it has a certain effect upon the capital itself. The license has to be paid, though the capital, however small, is thus much crippled. In business again much depends upon the stringency of money. Much depends upon hard or good times. But the man who has an income, why should not he pay taxes on the same? But even the income tax should not be uniform. A distinction should be made between permanent incomes and such as are merely temporary. The income from a source that can at any moment dry up should not be taxed as high as an income from a permanent source.

We should also have in this state an inheritance tax. There is nothing wrong in it. When people pass away and leave behind them fortunes, society should get a share of them. When the minister stands at the grave of a rich man saying, "Dust to dust and ashes to ashes, the soul returns to God who has given it," the tax collector should have a right to join saying, "And a portion of the fortune that was left behind shall go to society whence it came." But even the inheritance tax to be fair and proper must not be uniform.

A further fundamental principle in taxation is that taxes shall not impair or diminish the source from which the taxes come. Uniform taxation often kills the goose that lays the golden eggs.

My friends, I am for classification in taxes, because I think it is beneficial and in conformity with the fundamental principles of the science of taxation mentioned here. Let us bear in mind that no matter what our principles or ideas or ideals may be, we have to accommodate ourselves to the economic conditions of the age and we have to consider the forces that are constantly transforming society. Gentlemen, I thank you for your kind attention.

Mr. HURSH: I guess there is no question that those who are familiar with my ideas upon this subject of taxation—

The PRESIDENT: The member from Fayette was to be recognized, and the member from Hardin was not recognized for the purpose of making a speech. The president thought he was going to propound a question to the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. HAHN].

Mr. HURSH: It puts me in an embarrassing position to make a motion without giving the reasons for it, and I do not care to do it at this time.

Mr. JONES: It has been said that there is no question so great or so complex—and that is well illustrated in the experience of lawyers in the trial of cases—but that the whole matter may be reduced to one or two controverted propositions, the determination of which will settle the whole matter involved.

It has occurred to me in listening to the discussions upon this taxation matter that that was eminently true here. We have had a great deal of discussion upon the matter by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] which was largely if not wholly theoretical, and we have had a great deal of discussion from other members along the same line with reference to this matter of classification, but reduce it to its last analysis and it occurs to me that it involves simply one question. It appears to be conceded from what I have been able to hear, and I have been listening intently to those who have been advocating the classification of property, that the uniform rule of taxation is the most desirable one, provided it can be properly enforced. I say by everyone, but I notice Mr. Doty shaking his head. I will modify that and say, by everyone who is not in favor of the single tax. But all of those who hold to the theory that taxes should be raised upon property, and to the correlative theory that the taxes should be paid in proportion to the ability of the person to pay, recognize, as I say, as fundamental that the amount of taxes ought to be regulated according to the amount of property that the person has, plus the modification of his ability to pay. I mean by that that those who have but little property, it is conceded by all, ought not to pay much if anything; that the great theory, particularly of a democratic form of government, and the ideal situation in society that we would all like to see exist, is that every man should have a competence, and no man should have an excess; that all men should be well situated, and no man excessively rich. We should have no poor and we should have no rich. Upon that theory we all agree, that this rule of laying the taxes according to the amount of property a man has should be modified by this other principle of the ability of the person to pay the tax, that that should be taken into consideration upon the grounds of public policy to which I have referred. We should do what we can to bring about these ideal conditions, where every man will have a competency and no man more than he needs. For that reason you have not heard a note of dissent here in all this discussion, against the inheritance tax, and you have not heard a note of dissent against the graduated income tax, and the sense of this Convention upon that question, and the sense of the people at large is, that those who are best able to pay ought to pay the most, and the tendency of the time is to go further than that, and we are drifting to a consensus of public opinion that the point ought to be fixed in the levying of income taxes beyond which a man could not accumulate. There is a point where the public should be able to say that a man shall not have any more of the wealth of the country. You have also noticed an entire absence of objection to any inheritance tax proposed, and for the same reason.

Now the objection that you have heard to all that is embodied in this measure is founded upon two propositions—the first, that you ought to have classification of property, that this uniform rule of laying taxes is all wrong, and second, that you ought to have an exemption of municipal bonds from taxation, which is simply another method of stating your objection to the uniform rule, which is another method of asserting the claim that property should be classified. We have just heard from this floor a reference by the distinguished member from Cincinnati to a number of eminent men in this country who have written upon this economic question, and that they are all of one view with reference to it, and I listened carefully to see if he would do more than merely make that statement. It occurred to me that it was simply a rehash of the old stock argument that we all indulge in when we are not fortified with good reasons for the position we take, and say that some great man, in the present or the past, has taken a view that coincides with ours, without giving our hearers the benefit of any reasons for that view. And we are now here—at least I am, upon this question, because I have had to a certain degree at least an open mind upon it—we are all sitting here, and doubtless many others of the Convention are in the same attitude that I have been, seeking for light. I am seeking for some argument that will sustain this claim that the uniform rule of taxation is a failure and is unsound, and that the only proper rule is the classification of property, and I have come to the conclusion after all I have read upon the subject, and I have endeavored to read everything obtainable upon it—for with other members of the Convention it has been a subject of great interest to me for many, many years—I have read extensively, but I had hoped to hear something new in this Convention upon this subject; but after all, I appeal to you, gentlemen of the Convention, have you heard one other argument than the old stock argument that has been adduced everywhere the question has been touched upon, merely that you cannot make people return their intangible property? Is there any other argument that has been offered when it is reduced to its last analysis?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will you allow a question?

Mr. JONES: I prefer not to be interrupted unless you insist.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I will not insist, but the question is very short, and can be answered yes or no.

Mr. JONES: All right then.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Has the member from Fayette read the two books, Seligman's Essays on Taxation and Taussig's Political Economy?

Mr. JONES: I think so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: And you have found no reason to sustain classification?

Mr. JONES: I say, when you boil it all down to its last analysis, it amounts to the argument persistently adduced before this Convention that the reason why the uniform rule of taxation should not be adopted is solely that we cannot get the property on the tax duplicate under it. What greater elaboration would anyone desire than the honorable gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DORV] gave us in the two or three hours' speech he made upon this subject?

Mr. PECK: What better reasons do you want that the system is impractical?

Mr. JONES: Then it is all brought, as Judge Peck's question suggests, to the simple question whether or not that is a good reason, and we don't have to determine that matter by the sayings of great men upon the one side of the question or the other; but we are now dealing with affairs in the state of Ohio, and we are examining and determining for ourselves now whether that argument is sound as applied to the state of Ohio.

Now it will be admitted right at the start that there has been a lamentable failure under the uniform rule to get out the intangible property in Ohio, and to put it on the tax duplicate.

Mr. PECK: Does not that settle the whole question?

Mr. JONES: Let us see if it does.

Mr. PECK: Assuming that the attempt has been made in good faith.

Mr. JONES: And assuming some other things I want to call attention to. Now, if that failure be an inevitable fact, one that cannot be avoided, then I am for classification of property. Then I concede at least that the position of the gentlemen in favor of classification is justified. Let us then inquire as to what has been the reason for this failure; and have you observed among the gentlemen who have spoken upon this question any difference as to what that reason is? Is it because men are dishonest? They all say no, because the great majority of us are reasonably honest. Is it because men do not want to bear their fair share of the burdens of government? They all say, "No; they do, that it is only one in a hundred that does not want to do so." Then what is the reason these owners of intangible property have not borne their fair share of the burdens, and have not exercised that honesty in the matter of returning their property for taxation that they exercise in the ordinary affairs of life? They all say that the amount that you are asking of them is unjust and inequitable. Has there been any other reason assigned?

Mr. DOTY: Quite a number.

Mr. JONES: Aside from Brother Doty's single-tax notion?

Mr. DOTY: It has nothing to do with the single tax.

Mr. JONES: Has there been any other reason suggested to us in this Convention why men do not return their property for taxation except, as said by the gentleman from Cincinnati, that you are seeking to impose an injustice and a wrong upon them in making them pay an amount in excess of what the common judgment of mankind says is reasonable? He says they will pay a reasonable amount, up to a quarter or a half of one per cent. They will pay that. Why? Because that is a reasonable amount. But he says when you put the amount up—and he says in some jurisdictions five per cent has been charged—that it is so shocking to the ideas of human justice that not only the man owning intangible property says it ought not to be paid, but there cannot be found a man in the community who would say he ought to pay it.

Mr. PECK: Suppose you put it upon the ordinary desire in everybody's breast not to pay any more than he can help.

Mr. JONES: That is not true.

Mr. PECK: It is true. That is an assumption of human nature, and it is correct.

Mr. JONES: The natural impulse of every man is to bear his fair share of the burdens of government.

Mr. PECK: No, sir; the natural impulse is to get away as easy as he can.

Mr. JONES: The natural impulse of every man is to be honest, and if you put the question to a hundred men, "Are you willing to pay your share?" how many of them will say no?

Mr. PECK: Not one of them. They would all say they were.

Mr. JONES: And would they be telling you the truth?

Mr. PECK: No, sir; not one of them. Every one would be lying.

Mr. JONES: If that be true, it is a sad commentary on our citizenship.

Mr. PECK: Well, it is true, all right.

Mr. JONES: Are ninety-nine men out of a hundred willing to pay their obligations in business?

Mr. PECK: Yes, because if they don't they will suffer from it.

Mr. JONES: Yes, but back of that there is something that forms the foundation of society, because we could not have society but for voluntary association, and if we did not do anything except what we are compelled to do we would not have any society. What is it that produces this condition where the men who own intangible property have said "We will not return it" for the reason given by every speaker, "because it is unjust and wrong to ask us to do so."

Mr. PECK: What is the reason that a farmer wants to get his farm appraised as low as he can?

Mr. JONES: What has brought about that situation? Simply this; that under our system of administering the uniform tax rule we have proceeded upon the theory that everybody should pay just as little taxes as possible.

Mr. PECK: That is true, that everybody pays as little as he can. That is human nature absolutely.

Mr. JONES: Judge Peck says that is true. We have been proceeding upon a false theory with reference to the administration of our tax laws, and what have we done? We have said when an election comes around for a land assessor, "How are you disposed toward farm lands, in favor of putting them high or low?" "I am in favor of putting them low." "How are you disposed to value real estate?" "I am in favor of putting it low." And we have elected men upon the promise that they will put the property down low. What was that? That was simply another way on our part of evading taxes. Now if every landowner is going to engage in evading taxes, in what position is he to object to the holder of intangible property who engages in evading taxes?

Mr. PECK: Not any. That is what I say exactly. I am glad you caught onto the matter finally.

Mr. JONES: I think that it is susceptible of demonstrating that a remedy for all this can be found without classification.

Mr. PECK: Let us see the remedy.

Mr. JONES: We all know as a matter of fact, as far back as our recollection can go on these matters, and mine goes in active business life for thirty years, that it has been practically true that none of the invisible property got upon the tax duplicate, money or credits or the other forms of invisible property. And we all know further that the real estate and visible personal property of the country has not gone on the tax duplicate at any thing like its value; that the real estate of Ohio for taxing purposes has probably during the last fifty years been assessed at not over twenty-five per cent of its value. In effect that was for every owner of real estate to evade three-fourths of his taxes. I think it is true that the values of visible personal property have been placed a little higher upon the tax duplicate, but certainly not more than half its actual value. The result of this was to constitute an evasion to the extent of fifty per cent by the holders of the visible personal property. Right there is another thing, and a queer sort of thing. Even with the prejudice that has existed for the last fifty years or more against banks in the state of Ohio, and you only need to read the debates on the subject of banks in the Convention of 1851 to see how violent it was here at that time, but with all that prejudice against banks that has existed in every community in Ohio for the past fifty years, what have you today? You have had until during the past year the county auditors in every county of the state, and you have had the state auditor, voluntarily and without any authority of law, after a bank had made its returns, cutting off one-third of it, and public sentiment approved it, notwithstanding the violent sentiment against banks; and they did it upon the theory that while the owner of real estate is evading three-fourths of his taxes, and the owner of visible property evading at least one-half, they ought to let the banks evade one-third of theirs, and up to within two years ago, for practically forty years, we were cutting off one-third of the returns of the banks.

What else has existed? A most remarkable thing that I never could understand. With this prejudice against banks, and still cutting off one-third of their property that should be taxed, and cutting down visible personal property to the extent of fifty per cent, and cutting down land three-fourths of its value, at the same time you have had a queer public sentiment in Ohio that said if a man owned a note, even though not secured by a mortgage, he must return that note at its full value. If he had a mortgage on land, he must return that mortgage at its full value. If he happened to have money in bank, he must pay upon the full amount of the money. There was no public sentiment in Ohio that permitted a man owning money to cut it in two as a man who owned a farm or hay or corn or merchandise. It would not be permitted for a moment. If he had notes or stocks that were taxable, he could not cut down those even as much as the returns of the banks were cut down, but he had to put them on at full value, and submit to a rate of three or four or five per cent. Evasion by the owner of intangible property was created solely by this evasion on the part of the landowner, this evasion on the part of the owner of visible personal property, and this evasion upon the part of the owner of every other form of property than these I have mentioned, money and credits. I never was able to understand how that sentiment was developed. I cannot see how or why it continued with the existing sentiment with reference to all the other subjects of taxation. That sentiment which has existed in Ohio for the last half a century with reference to money and intangible personal property, together with the practice of evasion on the part of everybody else, is the reason why you have not had this property on the tax duplicate. If that is sound reasoning, if that is the reason why it has not been on the tax duplicate, it necessarily and logically follows that, if you remove the reason and the cause of it not being on the tax duplicate, you will get it on the tax duplicate.

Mr. WATSON: Can it be removed?

Mr. JONES: That is another question that I am coming to.

Mr. PECK: These things grew up because of the question of appraisement. The supreme court of the United States decided as to the banking business you have been speaking about, and let out the national banks on the sixty-six and two-thirds basis on the ground that property generally in Ohio was taxed at that rate. The statutes of the United States permitting the taxation of the federal banks provides they shall not be taxed at a greater rate than any other property in the state, and the supreme court of the United States having before them the fact that in the state of Ohio property generally, including real estate and land, was not taxed at over sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of its real value, said that is as much as you can tax national banks, and that is the basis of your claim. The trouble is the appraisement. The difference between money and anything else is that money appraises itself, but when you come to land or personal property there is room for a difference of opinion. One man thinks this, that or the other thing, and it all comes down to a question of appraisement, and there is where you get into all sorts of trouble.

Mr. JONES: I want to notice that a little further on. I will notice your suggestions a little later. It is true, as Judge Peck says, that this question first arose with the federal banks, and it arose because the federal courts had jurisdiction in that class of cases, but that doesn't make an excuse for applying it in taxing state banks.

Mr. PECK: Yes; it does.

Mr. JONES: Or applying it to private bankers.

Mr. PECK: The private bankers came along and said, "Here is a national bank and it is only paying so much, and we ought not to pay any more."

Mr. JONES: Will it be said for one moment that notes and bonds and mortgages in the possession of private bankers, simply because they are engaged in the banking business, are less susceptible of exact ascertainment of value than if an individual owned them?

Mr. PECK: They don't go into it that way.

Mr. JONES: Ah, they don't go into it that way! I am referring to the fact of that queer situation with reference to public sentiment in Ohio with regard to these intangible forms of property.

Mr. DOTY: Do you know of any rule by which various men can appraise the value of various things in various portions of the state?

Mr. JONES: That is a matter involved in the same subject suggested by Judge Peck, and if you will let me answer it in the order in which I am approaching the subject I shall be obliged to you.

Now, if, as I have said that manifest injustice to the owner of notes and the owner of bonds and other forms of invisible property has been the cause of his not returning his property, then if you remove that injustice you will get the property upon the tax duplicate to the extent but not entirely—to the extent of the honestly disposed men who hold that kind of property, and to the extent of the men holding that property who are willing to bear, not an excessive share of the burdens of government, but who are willing to bear their fair share of the burdens of the government.

Mr. DWYER: Suppose a building association has a mortgage upon a man's home or farm. That mortgage secures the note. What do you say as to the return of that note for taxation by the building association?

Mr. JONES: My theory is that everybody who has anything that comes under the denomination of property ought to pay taxes on it. That is another thing I want to reach later, if I do not trespass too much on the time of the Convention.

Now how are you going to remove these things that have caused this failure of the intangible property getting upon the tax duplicate heretofore? The right steps are already being taken, and it is entirely too soon for any man to say that this plan, even crude as it may be in its inception, will not substantially accomplish the end. What does that involve? As a first proposition it involves this: That every owner of real estate must submit to its being put upon the tax duplicate at its fair cash value; that every owner of visible personal property must submit to its being put upon the tax duplicate at its fair cash value. You all admit that is easy of accomplishment?

Mr. DOTY: No; we don't.

Mr. JONES: It will be with the exception you have referred to, and I will discuss that when I get to it.

Mr. DOTY: You cannot prove it.

Mr. JONES: I say it is easy of accomplishment, and I will discuss that. Mr. Doty says, "No, that cannot be accomplished because you are going to have a great number of different men value the property. You have to depend on the judgment of different men, and you cannot standardize the appraisement of property. You cannot have any rule for measuring it as you can with reference to money. You cannot therefore have any uniformity, because you cannot have any uniformity of value." Theoretically that is true, and that being true is the trouble with the whole of Mr. Doty's argument. It is a very fine argument theoretically, but in the ordinary affairs of life we do not split hairs that closely. In the ordinary affairs of life we approximate things, and necessarily have to approximate things. His argument applied to the ordinary business transaction, to a division of estates, for instance, leads to absurdity. The rule is to make equal division between the heirs, but Mr. Doty says you cannot have absolute equality of division among heirs. Why? Because they have to have that property appraised by someone. This set of appraisers may appraise the property at one figure, and another set of appraisers may appraise the property at another figure, and that especially will be true in different sections of the state, and men are called upon to appraise it who do not know anything about its value; they may be going into a strange community, and they have to estimate it. Theoretically his argument would be just as applicable to a division of an estate as to an appraisement for the purposes of taxation.

Mr. DOTY: There is nothing similar to that. You cannot find any similarity.

Mr. JONES: Take any of the ordinary affairs of business life, where the rights of parties are to be determined according to value of property.

Mr. DWYER: Are you not depriving all parties who hold notes and mortgages from using the courts of the state to enforce their claims unless they return their notes for taxation?

Mr. JONES: That is a matter of remedy.

Mr. DWYER: What is your idea?

Mr. JONES: Anything that would get the property on the tax duplicate I would favor.

Mr. DWYER: What would you say about refusing them recourse to the courts?

Mr. JONES: That would be a mere matter of detail, but I am coming now to a proposition that Mr. Doty makes—I have not heard anybody else make it—that this thing is a dead failure because of the inability to get anything like a fair value of the property. We only have, as I say, to look around and observe a little of the actual transactions of business in our ordinary life to see the many, many instances where the rights of parties, to an extent far greater than that involved in levying taxes, are determined by valuations put upon property, valuations put by different men and by different means. It occurs to me that that whole argument is too flimsy for me to take up further time in answering it. It is possible to get fair values of real estate. Are you taking into account that you swear men to appraise property for purposes of taxation at its full market value? What reason is there that they cannot approach that market value for the purposes of taxation just as closely as if you were sending them out to appraise it for the purposes of a sale on execution, or on a foreclosure of a mortgage, or for any other purpose? It is nonsense, gentlemen of the jury, to talk about not being able to fix a basis for the appraisement of property—

Mr. WATSON: "Gentlemen of the jury?"

Mr. JONES: That is force of habit. Now, if that can be done with reference to real estate as a practical proposition, not theoretical, as Brother Doty has said, but as a practical, every-day proposition, if you can arrive at the substantial value of real estate, what is there in the way of arriving at the value of tangible personal property? Take wheat or corn, and does anybody pretend to say that any reasonably intelligent man could not go out in a township in which he was born, reared and lived all his life and get a fair knowledge of the value of the property, and tell you the value of the corn and the wheat and the hay in that township? Could it not be done for the purposes of taxation as accurately as for any other purpose? And there are dozens of other purposes for which a man may be called upon to appraise property that are far more important than the levying of a one-half of one per cent tax. Is there any form of visible property the value of which cannot be ascertained with substantial accuracy? Take the stock of merchandise of a merchant, do you say that cannot be ascertained?

If you were going to sell it you would ascertain it pretty quick, and would ascertain it with reasonable accuracy, and there are well-known available means for doing that. If you were going to sell anything of that sort on execution you would get at its value. If you can do that with regard to a thing of that sort, why in the name of common sense, for all practical purposes, cannot you do it for the purpose of ascertaining how much he would have to pay on it at a rate of one-quarter of one per cent in the way of taxes? You can get at it with substantial accuracy and substantial justice to all concerned. Now, if you can do that with regard to visible real estate and visible personal property, they have never complained that you cannot get at the value of invisible personal property.

Mr. DOTY: You have not stated how you get at it.

Mr. JONES: I have not heard any claim that you could not value invisible property. The main argument against the taxing of invisible property is that you have not any way of determining what the value of visible property is.

Mr. PECK: The main argument on invisible property is that you cannot find it. It is utterly invisible.

Mr. JONES: Then it comes down to this proposition: As I have said, there is no trouble in ascertaining the value of money. The people for fifty years have not had any trouble on that. If a man has money it is worth one hundred cents on the dollar. They all say if he has a note which is good that it is worth one hundred cents on the dollar.

Mr. DOTY: No; it is not.

Mr. JONES: Theoretically it is not, but practically it is.

Mr. DOTY: Don't you hold notes in your bank that are not good?

Mr. JONES: Take the millions of dollars of transactions that occur every day in banks all over this country. What do they all involve? They involve the exchanging of money at one hundred cents on the dollar for this intangible personal property. In banks all over the country notes, checks, bills, etc., are passed through and handled and appraised every day. Every transaction that occurs involves an appraisal not for the purpose of paying one-half of one per cent taxes on it, but for the purpose of a man or bank parting with the full value of that property, and you arrive at substantial accuracy. Now, are there very many mistakes made? If there were, all the banks would be broken in a short time, and the men engaged privately in lending money would go out of business. But we all know that as a practical business proposition you can substantially arrive at the value of all this kind of property.

Taxation.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you pretend that the passing through the bank would help you to place it on the tax duplicate?

Mr. JONES: No, sir; but every time they pass through the bank they must for some purpose be appraised, and it is possible to appraise them with substantial accuracy, or these transactions could not be carried on. Now, if you can appraise these invisible assets of millions of dollars every day for the purpose of business transactions between men, why in the name of common sense can you not appraise them with reasonable accuracy for the purpose of taxation?

Mr. HALFHILL: Do I understand you to say that the ordinary business transaction of passing credit through the bank involves an appraisal?

Mr. JONES: I say in a sense it involves the valuation or appraisal of the party's interest in that form of property, because when a man parts with his good hard cash for a note, he is necessarily called upon to judge of the value of the note. When a bank does that it does the same thing.

Mr. HALFHILL: Does not the fact involve a guarantee by everybody who passes on the credit?

Mr. JONES: Not necessarily. If a bank buys it without recourse the question of appraisal of value would be the only one involved. Of course it may have somebody else behind it, and if it does that is one element of value.

I say there is no way in which you can view the matter but what you must conclude that for practical purposes, leaving aside the fine-spun theories of Brother Doty, that it is practically possible to arrive at a fair valuation of the property for the purposes of taxation. But as suggested by my venerable friend to my left, that is not the material matter or the most material.

Mr. PECK: If you are referring to me as "venerable" you are going to get whipped.

Mr. JONES: Then, my "youthful" friend. Now the gentlemen from Cincinnati [Mr. HARRIS] and others who have spoken on this matter say, "Yes, you can get at it if you make the rate reasonable." That involves the question of what is going to occur if you get all of this visible property on the tax duplicate at its full value. What effect is that going to have on the rate? If the rate is going to be made reasonable, and if, as the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. HARRIS] argues, a reasonable rate is going to bring out the great majority of it, the effect of raising all the other property to its proper plane of value will be to make the rate reasonable. That involves a simple matter of calculation, and it does not need any elaboration or discussion to make it apparent. If it is true, and I have not heard any contradiction, and I do not think I shall hear any contradiction of it—if it is true that real estate heretofore has not been valued at over one-fourth of its value, or not over one-fourth of what it should have been, and if visible personal property has not been valued at over one-half of what it should have been, and if the banks have not been paying over two-thirds of what they ought to have paid, and if all these other corporations throughout the state have not paid over one-third of what they ought to have paid, and all that is brought upon the tax duplicate, the inevitable effect will be to make the rate low. It would make it very low except in those cases where the municipalities have unfortunately in a lapse of good judgment gone farther in debt than they should have gone.

Mr. DWYER: Do you not think it is an extravagant statement that real estate has only paid one-fourth of its value?

Mr. JONES: I do not think so.

Mr. DWYER: It may be that way in Fayette county, but it is not so with us.

Mr. JONES: Take the tax duplicate and the way property sells and you can tell.

Mr. PECK: The understanding with us is that it is assessed at sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of its value.

Mr. JONES: We all know that was erroneous.

Mr. PECK: I thought it was about right.

Mr. DOTY: What do you put it at, Mr. Jones?

Mr. JONES: I think somewhere between twenty-five and fifty per cent.

Mr. DWYER: We always figured two-thirds.

Mr. JONES: We always flattered ourselves that we were doing all that we ought to do, but down in our hearts we knew we were not.

Mr. PECK: You have some human nature in Fayette county?

Mr. JONES: I think we have some.

Mr. PECK: I told you nobody wanted to pay any more than he had to pay, but you wouldn't believe me.

Mr. JONES: The excuse for doing it is the same old one, that the other fellow is doing it. That is human nature, but it is equally true that it is human nature that every man will do as much as his neighbor in the performance of any civic duty. "I will not permit any man to do more for the state and the public good than I will do," says the average man. That sentiment runs all through mankind.

Mr. PECK: Once in a while they have a spurt in patriotism, but it doesn't last long.

Mr. JONES: When you appeal to them properly they will respond, and it will not be a spurt, but it will last.

Mr. HOSKINS: I think all of these spurts are for public exhibition only.

Mr. JONES: I think not. All you have to do to test that is to jeopardize the state of Ohio or the United States. Let either of them be imperiled at any time, and you will see democrats and republicans, rich and poor, black and white, vying with each other in contributing their part toward defending the country and performing all the civic duties that rest upon them. When you appeal to men and have that appeal based upon right and justice they are willing to contribute their fair share to the support of the government and to the maintenance of the courts that protect their lives and liberties and secure to them all the benefits of organized society. Why, when you are in a situation to appeal to a man in such manner, where is the man who will not respond? It is not one in a thousand.

Taxation.

Mr. PECK: Is this a matter of sentiment?

Mr. JONES: The argument in favor of classification has been entirely a matter of sentiment. The whole argument has been that if you would put the thing in such shape by classification and low rates where men would say it was reasonable, they would be glad to come up and perform their part of civic duty, and that we would have a solution of the whole matter. I say it is all based on sentiment, upon that well-known element of human nature that nearly every man desires to do the right thing. Suppose there was something here that we were called upon to do, the one hundred and nineteen members of this Convention, and we were all interested in the object to be accomplished and one man would say, "I want the rest of you fellows to do more than I do." You would put your stamp of disapproval on that man so quickly there would not be a man in this Convention who would look at him any more. Apply that to your own community. Let every man who owns real estate or visible personal property come up and say, "I am paying and am willing to pay all that I ought to pay." The rate is cut down to a reasonable one and every man, or nearly all, will come up and pay on his invisible property. A few may say, "My theory of life is to have the other fellows do more than I do." Will there be any lack of prosecution against that fellow? Will there be any one who will say that that man is justified in refusing to return his property for taxation, and that he is justified in committing perjury, or that he is justified in the evasion in which he is indulging? No, sir; the public sentiment would be so strong against him that he would be absolutely ostracized.

Mr. PECK: Have you any taxdodgers in Fayette county?

Mr. JONES: Yes, sir; lots of them, and in my whole recollection of that business we have never had a single prosecution in Fayette county against a man who evaded his taxes, not one.

Mr. PECK: And you never will have.

Mr. JONES: I do not agree with that. The reason is because every man in the county was engaged in the same thing.

Mr. PECK: I thought you had a lot of human nature down there.

Mr. ANTRIM: I was wondering if, when we all came back Monday, it would not help us in the solution of this question if each one brought with him the returns that he made to the assessor last month? What do you think of that, Mr. Jones?

Mr. JONES: It would probably throw some light on the question.

Mr. DOTY: Yes; it would.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you not think that most of us want to keep that dark?

Mr. JONES: No; I do not. That will not be so for the very reason that the honorable gentleman has been urging upon the Convention, that if the people of Ohio can have reasonable assurance, and they wouldn't ask for absolute assurance either—but if they can have reasonable assurance that this reasonable rate is going to be a permanent thing, then you will have it occurring right along, that practically all men will return their property, and I predict that this year in my county the assessment now being made will more than double the amount of invisible property on the duplicate last year. I don't know how many times it was greater last year than the year before, but it was many times greater, and why was it? Because we were approaching a position where we could make the appeal to men which the honorable gentleman from Hamilton county refers to, that we are going to make and keep the rate reasonable, and can say that no injustice will be done to you, and you can now do what you have always been willing to do, bear your fair share of the burden of taxation.

Mr. KEHOE: Do you not think the public conscience is being aroused in the matter a little?

Mr. JONES: Not only a little, but a great deal, and you let this same thing go on for five years at the rate we have been going and the rates everywhere will become as low as the most extreme classificationist desires. Our rate in Fayette does not now average, outside the towns, much over one-half of one per cent. It will be less next year. Now, then, a man is going to be mighty little and mighty mean and be placed pretty low down by his neighbors who won't pay his proper share of taxes when the rate is only one-half of one per cent, and it will only be the fellow who is wrong constitutionally on that and everything else who will refuse to do it. We have enough more invisible property in Fayette county now, if it could be brought out and placed upon the tax duplicate, to further cut down our rate nearly one-half. What we want to do is right in line with this one per cent limitation of the tax rate in this proposition. Prevent the creation of a rate in excess of that, simply as a means of assuring and guaranteeing to the holders of invisible property that their property will not be confiscated in the future as has been attempted in the past. As a practicing lawyer I am probably no different from many lawyers in the Convention. Scores and scores of people have come to me in the past complaining about attempts to put their property on the tax duplicate in towns and cities where the rates were three and four per cent, where it was practically confiscation of the whole of their property, and they had been gotten after by the auditor or tax inquisitor. Such attempts have frequently been made in the past in my county, and everybody united in saying it was absolutely unjust and wrong to confiscate their property, and that they did not believe in the enforcement of that law. They would say, "We are willing to join you in helping to defeat it," but they will not be willing to join in helping to defeat the law when substantially all of this property comes out and gets on the tax duplicate, so that the rate will be very low. Now, I know of country districts where the tax rate, with all the property on the tax duplicate, will not exceed twenty-five cents on the hundred dollars. One quarter of one per cent will be the total tax rate in many of the rural districts when all the property comes upon the tax duplicate, and in the cities and towns the rate can be made not so low, because their requirements are greater, but nobody in the city objects to paying more, because they get more in the way of benefits and privileges and conveniences of life. Everybody is willing to pay more taxes in cities, but the rate can be brought down correspondingly in the cities, and I thoroughly believe, referring to the complaints now made regarding the city of Cleveland, that if even one-half of the invisible property in the city of Cleveland that now escapes taxation were brought onto the duplicate, there would not be a bit of complaint as to the one per cent tax limit.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like to have you state in short, concise language just what changes in the present constitution you are willing to subscribe to, or whether you are willing to let the constitution alone and not disturb the tax situation at all?

Mr. JONES: I would like to see two or three things done.

Mr. HOSKINS: What are they?

Mr. JONES: In the first place there is no reason for exempting municipal bonds from taxation. They should be taxed. They are property in the hands of the owners just the same as any other securities and they ought to be taxed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Assuming that all the municipal bonds were owned outside of the state of Ohio, why tax bonds and increase the rate of interest one per cent?

Mr. JONES: That all proceeds upon a false assumption. I do not think I shall have time to get to that, but if I do, I will show it to you.

Now I would have those bonds restored to taxation. I would have a limit not to exceed one per cent put in this constitution as a guaranty and assurance in the future that could not be easily taken away, that the rate would never become confiscatory in the future, and I would have, if it is necessary, and I believe it is, a straight-out provision that all property should be subject to taxation.

Mr. DOTY: We have that.

Mr. JONES: But you have some other things in there that put a limitation on it.

Mr. HOSKINS: What are those?

Mr. JONES: Stocks and bonds, securities, investments, etc. Leave off all of those words. The word "property" covers everything. All property should be taxed at its true value.

Mr. HOSKINS: You don't think any class of property has escaped?

Mr. JONES: Yes; I do.

Mr. HOSKINS: Would you tax stocks?

Mr. JONES: Yes, sir; I would tax all property. If a man owns property, why exclude one class and say that another shall be taxed?

Mr. HOSKINS: Would you tax stocks in a local manufacturing corporation in your town?

Mr. JONES: Personally I would.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do you mean that you would tax the plant and the stock that represented the plant?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You know that a certificate of stock represents a share of ownership in that plant. Suppose you had an elevator with 10,000 bushels of corn in that elevator; you pay taxes on the 10,000 bushels of corn and you say to Mr. Harris "I have 2,500 bushels, and I will pay taxes on that," and I give you a certificate. Ought that certificate be taxed?

Mr. JONES: Substantially your inquiry amounts to this: That if a certificate of stock represents merely an interest in the property of the corporation, when the property of the corporation is once taxed then your property is taxed, because your certificate merely represents your share of the property.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Correct.

Mr. JONES: That question is subject to the objection which I made against Mr. Doty's argument—that it is theoretically true.

Mr. DOTY: Practically true.

Mr. JONES: No, sir; and I will show it to you. Theoretically it is true if a bond is issued by that corporation secured by a mortgage on its plant and that money has gone to pay for some of the real estate or some other equipment, theoretically the holder of that bond has furnished part of the property held by the corporation. Now, theoretically you may say your bond is merely a paper showing that you are entitled to go into that property and take out, say $1,000, and the corporation would have only what is left. Theoretically you are a part owner in that property, and if a man borrow money on a farm theoretically the lender is a part owner of that farm because part of his money is represented by the farm.

Mr. DOTY: There is nothing theoretical about that.

Mr. JONES: Not according to you.

Mr. DOTY: As a matter of fact, according to your view.

Mr. JONES: They say, therefore, "Why, you ought not to tax a mortgage because that is really representing part of the farm?"

Mr. DOTY: That is true.

Mr. JONES: No, sir; and if you will be patient and quiet a while, I will tell you why. You ought not to tax a bond they say, because theoretically that is part of the corporate property, and the certificate of stock is also part of the corporate property.

Mr. HOSKINS: You would tax the stock the same as the bonds?

Mr. JONES: They are all on a par for practical purposes. Theoretically your argument is true, and if you are proceeding on theory you ought not tax the bond.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There is no analogy between a bond and stock.

Mr. KNIGHT: I would like to hear the gentleman specifically answer, would he take the stock of Ohio corporations engaged in manufacturing in the state of Ohio, which corporation pays taxes upon its property, and tax that stock? Suppose a man owned ten shares of that stock. Ought he also to pay taxes on that ten shares?

Mr. DOTY: He said yes, but he couldn't tell why.

Mr. SHAFFER: He said something about bonds, but what about the stock in the institution?

Mr. JONES: I say theoretically you ought not to pay on that, and theoretically you ought not to pay on a mortgage.

Mr. DOTY: But stock?

Mr. JONES: Theoretically you ought not to pay on that. Now the question is whether practically you should. Start with this proposition, that all taxes ought to be levied upon property, or that taxes ought to rest upon property held by the individual, and it is all answered by inquiring whether this stock certificate is property.

Mr. DOTY: Are they?

Taxation.

Mr. WATSON: A point of order: One at a time.
Mr. DOTY: He can take care of himself; he does not need your help.

Mr. JONES: I can take care of myself, and I think I can make it plain. I am not radical on the subject.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, no.

Mr. JONES: That all involves a simple proposition. If you start with the proposition that you are going to tax all property, then if this stock certificate is property it ought to be taxed. If the bond is property it ought to be taxed. If the mortgage is property it ought to be taxed, and if a note is property it ought to be taxed.

Mr. DOTY: Is the stock certificate property?

Mr. JONES: Is there any lawyer in this Convention who will say that a stock certificate does not come within the legal definition of property? If there is I would like to hear him.

Mr. HOSKINS: It is not property at all. It is simply an evidence of property.

Mr. JONES: If it is not property, it could not be levied on. Is there anybody who would say you could not levy an execution upon stock in corporations? Is there anyone who would say you could not seize a stock certificate upon execution and put that stock certificate up and sell it?

Mr. WINN: Or replevin it?

Mr. JONES: Or is there any lawyer here who will say you could not replevin a stock certificate and have it appraised by three men and a value put upon it?

Mr. PECK: Yes; a stock certificate doesn't appraise itself at all.

Mr. JONES: But it could be seized on execution?

Mr. PECK: A stock certificate is nothing but an evidence of property, and you would have to go to a court of equity and ask the court to give you an order compelling the corporation to transfer it before you could—

Mr. JONES: But you sell the stock?

Mr. PECK: You cannot sell the stock except you have an order of court.

Mr. JONES: You cannot sell the stock on an execution?

Mr. PECK: No, sir; and you will not find a proceeding for that purpose.

Mr. JONES: Mr. Peck is answering hastily.

Mr. PECK: You are confusing stock and stock certificates.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you say you can put up a stock certificate and sell it?

Mr. JONES: Yes. Suppose you have a stock certificate and there is an indorsement on it?

Mr. PECK: You don't have any indorsement if you seize it on execution.

Mr. JONES: If that stock certificate is attached as a collateral it is indorsed, and in default of payment you put up the stock and offer it for sale, and it sells and you transfer the title to that stock.

Mr. HOSKINS: You get another piece of paper. But when you sell a horse and don't get another horse.

Mr. JONES: But your stock in the corporation constitutes property that has value.

Mr. SHAFFER: Evidence of property.

Mr. JONES: No further evidence of property than a note. If I had the books I could give you the exact definitions, and I am sorry that I have not looked up the matter. The courts have settled it.

Mr. PECK: I am not denying that stock is property, but I deny your proposition about legal processes.

Mr. JONES: That admits my whole contention and I do not care to pursue the matter further. It is really not involved in this discussion, and it only came up by the inquiry of the gentleman. What we do want, and what I insist upon by way of change in the constitution, is that all property be made subject to taxation, and that a limit be put upon the rate, and that this exemption of bonds which now exists be taken away, so that there will be no property but what can be reached. One word, and I must close, with reference to the matter of the exemption of bonds. That is more important than some of the other things.

One of the great troubles that now exists, and that has existed, and that will continue to exist with reference to the enforcement of tax laws, is this very question of exemption of municipal bonds. We all know that the amount of tax-exempt bonds reported as being held by individuals is appalling in amount.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Why do they have to report them when they are not subject to taxation?

Mr. JONES: Here is a man that you know has money. You know, he has a lot of securities and lots of liquid assets. Everybody in the community knows it, and when you look at his tax sheet he has a great amount of municipal bonds. As a matter of fact he has these liquid assets in other forms of securities drawing him more interest than bonds, and he uses the municipal bond dodge as a pretext.

Mr. PECK: Is that an argument?

Mr. JONES: That is a good excuse for the removal of municipal bonds from taxation.

Mr. PECK: Men can lie about anything.

Mr. JONES: If you had municipal bonds not exempt would there be any man in the state who would have the hardihood to say that he had liquid assets in bonds?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Would not that man buy United States bonds?

Mr. JONES: Don't we all know he could not?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Because all the United States bonds are practically tied up in banks, which own them, as security for their circulation, so that the ordinary man could not get them.

Mr. PECK: There are lots of Ohio nontaxable stocks, millions of them.

Mr. JONES: It would take away opportunity for evasion of taxes by claiming that the money was in municipal bonds; and it would do another thing, it would make the man who owns these bonds do what he ought to do, and what he will be glad to do when the rate is reduced by all of them coming out and being taxed, to wit, pay taxes on those bonds. Now take municipal bonds at five per cent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There are not any.

Mr. DOTY: Where are they?

Mr. JONES: There are lots of them.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I would like to have that kindergarten adjourn and allow the Convention to proceed in the ordinary way.

Taxation.

Mr. WATSON: A point of order. A few days ago the chair in addressing myself ruled that I address the chair, and I insist upon that rule being observed now.

Mr. JONES: I am just handed a list of four and a half and five per cent bonds, some being five per cent at par.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will the member from Fayette permit a question?

Mr. JONES: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You say there are bonds bearing five per cent interest. On what basis are they sold? A five per cent bond may be sold on a basis to pay three and a half.

Mr. JONES: And it may be sold at par. We have had some in our section within the last year sold right close to par, a mere nominal premium.

Mr. SHAFFER: What was the matter with them?

Mr. JONES: Some small educational district and township bonds. They had elements that did not make them attractive, and they would not sell at the price that state or county or large municipality bonds would. A man who has municipal bonds at four per cent or four and a half per cent, why ought not he pay taxes on those bonds?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you not as a practical banker know, and is it not misleading the Convention not to tell them, that when a man buys a municipal bond yielding him only four per cent he is paying the tax of one and one-half in taking the lower rate of interest instead of taking six per cent?

Mr. JONES: He is not paying taxes in any practical form.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I say he is taking four per cent instead of six per cent because he does not have to pay taxes on them.

Mr. JONES: Those bonds do not sell to the public generally. The highest class of those bonds are selling at from 3.85 to 3.90, but the individual purchaser cannot get them at that price, but you can get more bonds than anybody can pay for on a four or a four and a half per cent basis. The large banks hold the highest class bonds practically as a reserve. They are almost as valuable to them for the purpose of meeting obligations, if they come suddenly against them, as if they had the money in bank, and that is the reason that character of bonds bear those rates; but take the ordinary average township, county or village bond, and they don't sell at those high rates for entirely different reasons. Now, who buys those four and four and a half per cent bonds? You can get all you want at four and a half and five. I know what I am talking about. They are just as good as any Cincinnati or Cleveland bonds where a person wants to use them simply as an investment. Now, if you make the rate of taxes only one-half of one per cent, would they or should they object to paying taxes on them? Bear in mind one other thing, and then I must close. Where does all this cry for classification and where does all this cry for exemption of bonds come from? Who appears before the legislatures and the constitutional bodies granting these exemptions, for the purpose of securing them? Is it the persons who are going to be benefited, according to the argument, to wit, the other taxpayers? Are they the ones who are making the demand? No; the only persons who ever make the demand for classification are those who are going to be directly benefited by it. The person who is going to make the demand for the exemption of bonds is not the general taxpayer, not the home owner or the farmer, or the man who is paying for a farm and live stock, but it is the person who has been claiming that you were confiscating his property by attempting to get it upon the tax duplicate. In other words, it is the owner of liquid assets who is making this demand for exemption of bonds; and the men making the demand for classification—take for instance, the parties asking for mortgages to be exempted, and who are they? Is it the farmer or the man who is borrowing money or the home owners, who are paying taxes on their visible real and personal property? No, sir; it does not come from them, but it comes from the parties who want to get a class of securities that are good, that they can put their liquid assets into and thus escape taxation.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not know that at the time the campaign was being prosecuted to get that constitutional amendment submitted that the mayors and the city organizations of the municipalities of the state of Ohio took an active interest, appeared before the legislature and were the real sponsors for putting that up and getting it submitted to the people?

Mr. JONES: I know this, that at least some persons in Ohio that were engaged in the banking business, and engaged in furnishing investments to other parties, were among those greatly interested, and I have been engaged in the business for the last thirty years of furnishing investments in large amounts to other parties, amounting to millions in the total, and one of the first persons that came to me to speak about getting that exemption matter through was a banker who was greatly interested in the handling of the liquid assets of the community.

Now, I am like Judge Peck in regard to this matter. Personally my interests would all lie in the other direction. I have been appealed to since being in this Convention, that I was ruining my own bank, that I would drive customers away from the bank, that we had customers who want these intangible assets, and who will not pay taxes on them, that I was injuring myself, but I am like Judge Peck in that matter. I cannot represent the people who are interested in the People's & Drovers' Bank. I cannot represent the people I have helped as my clients in making investments. I am looking out for the interests of the people of the whole of my county and the state of Ohio now, whom I promised when I came here to do what was for the benefit, not of the few, but what was for the benefit of all the people as nearly as I could ascertain it, what was for the good of the whole people, or at least the greatest number of them, and I believe, in the interest of the greatest number of the people, that bonds ought to be restored as subjects of taxation; and I believe that every form of property and every person ought to bear their fair share of the burdens of taxation; and whenever it is written in the constitution that property of the man who has invisible assets will not be confiscated by taxation, nine out of ten will voluntarily come up and do their duty, and I do not care about the other one-tenth, for they might not do their duty under any circumstances.

Mr. HURSH: I had not intended to say a word on this proposition, but in view of the fact that there are two propositions involved, I do wish at this time to say a little something upon the subject. I presume I, like a great many others, came here with a closed mind in regard to the proposition of taxation. As nearly all of you know, I am in favor of the uniform rule of taxation, and in saying that I believe I am saying it for ninety-five per cent of my constituents. I need not add any argument to what has been given in favor of the uniform rule of taxation. Plenty has been said upon that subject on both sides, but in talking with my friends and other members of the Convention, I find that, even among us who are known as in favor of the uniform rule of taxation, there is a diversity of opinion and considerable doubt as to whether it is expedient, whether it is just the thing to do, to incorporate into the organic law a limitation of taxation. We are all aware that the Smith one per cent law has only been in operation six months, and we have a very limited knowledge of whether it will work out practically, and it needs time to demonstrate whether that is going to be as successful as we all hope it will be. However, it does not involve the principle of uniform taxation by omitting the limitation from the constitution, and upon that point I wish to say as I did a few days ago that I came here not knowing very much about the cities' problem. I came here with the intention of giving the cities home rule, and if they knew what their problems were and could frame a proposition that was satisfactory to the cities, then it would probably be our duty to give it to them. I think the final vote upon the home rule proposal was a demonstration in itself that this Convention was willing to give the city government and city affairs over to the cities themselves.

Now I come to another point, or rather another place, in the proceedings of this Convention, in which I am somewhat in doubt. To whom must I turn? I have been told by the city members of this Convention that the proposal we are putting through here is crippling them and will cripple them in carrying out their ideas of reforms in city government. If this is the case, I guess it has already been demonstrated that we people who are in favor of home rule and have favored uniform taxation have the whole situation in our hands. We can do with this proposition just as we please. That has been demonstrated. And after all can we not afford to be generous to a vanquished enemy, and may it not be better that we concede that much to our city members in a spirit of fairness and not put this limit in the constitution? I have reason to make this statement to my friends on this side of the question, and in order that I may carry out my ideas effectively I move that the Winn amendment be now tabled.

Mr. WINN: I demand the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, "Shall the amendment offered by the delegate from Defiance [Mr. WINN] and that of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] be laid upon the table?"

Mr. WOODS: A point of order.

The PRESIDENT: State the point.

Mr. WOODS: Was not the last vote on that proposition?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Then it is out of order.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is entirely in order.

Mr. WINN: A point of order.

The PRESIDENT: State it.

Mr. WINN: The motion made to table this amendment and the amendment to it was voted down a while ago. Nothing has been done on the matter since, and its status has not been changed at all.

The PRESIDENT: The point seems to me to be not well taken. The question is, Shall the amendment lie upon the table? and the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 51, nays 46, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the motion to table was carried.

Mr. LAMPSON: I desire to offer an amendment which the secretary has. It was written to apply to the amendment of Mr. Fackler, and I ask permission to have the secretary change it to make it apply to the pending amendment to the proposal. It will be easily understood.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. Anderson to Proposal No. 170 as follows:

At the end of the amendment add the following:

SECTION 9. The maximum rate of taxes that may be levied for all purposes shall not in any year exceed twelve mills on each dollar of the total value of all property, as listed and assessed for taxation, in any taxing district wholly outside of municipalities and not to exceed fifteen mills, exclusive of sinking fund and interest charges, in any taxing district wholly or partially within municipalities. Additional levies, not exceeding in any year a maximum of five mills, for all purposes, on each dollar of the total value of all the property therein, as listed and assessed for taxation in any taxing district, may be levied when such additional levies are authorized by a majority vote of the electors voting thereon at an election held for such purpose.

Mr. LAMPSON: The maximum limit is fixed at twelve mills in taxing districts wholly outside the municipalities, and not to exceed fifteen mills, exclusive of sinking fund and interest charges, in any district wholly or partially within municipalities, and an additional five mills applicable to all districts upon a vote. Now, it is plain that the necessities for municipalities for taxes are greater than for country districts, so that the excess allowed in the municipalities is three mills greater than that allowed in the country taxing districts, and the fifteen mills limitation in the municipality is exclusive of sinking fund and interest charges. The courts would undoubtedly hold that way in Ohio, for they have held that in the ten-mill limitation in the Smith law. I think the fundamental difference in the necessity of the country and the city districts should be recognized if we are to place a limitation at all upon the taxing power of the various taxing districts, and I do not think a constitutional limitation ought to be down to bare living limit. This does not interfere with the law as it stands. The law is still there until the legislature modifies it. But a constitutional limitation ought not to be right down to the bare limit of levying taxes to meet the necessities of any taxing district. There should be a little leeway for the exercise of judgment on the part of the legislature. It happens in my county right now, in a little country district, that the state is furnishing money to help support their schools because they had to close them down on account of the ten-mill limit, and at Ashtabula Harbor they borrowed $20,000 in a special school district to pay the current expenses of a school district for this year.

Mr. Brown, of Lucas, was here recognized by the president.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I desire to offer an amendment, but I think I would prefer to have this disposed of first.

Mr. DOTY: Of course the member's amendment is very much better than anything we have been considering, but the argument he puts up ought to make plain to you the utter folly of one hundred and nineteen men today fixing a tax limit for any part of this state twenty-five years from now, or any other time from now. He called your attention to the fact that even right now an important school district of his own county has been compelled to borrow money to pay current expenses on account of the limitation put upon that community by the legislature, and now we are called upon to fix a limit, not one that can be changed easily, as the Smith law can by the legislature, but for all time. Who is there in this Convention who is wise enough to say what the tax rate ought to be in Ashtabula Harbor ten years from today? The man does not live. As I tried to point out last night, and I am not going to make my speech over—I just want to call your attention to this, that nobody including the member from Fayette, has yet answered my argument, that the tax rate is not a cause, but is an effect. The tax rate is the result of dividing one thing by another. Taxes are not high or low because of the tax rate. Taxes are high or low by reason of the necessities of the civil division expending the money, and when I say necessities I mean, of course, necessities including the mistakes which public officials sometimes make. There are not many, as the gentleman from Fayette said, but there are mistakes, and those are human and occur under any system, but here is the situation, we are attempting to fix something that ought not to be fixed, a thing that is the result of dividing the necessities by the wherewithal, or the wherewithal by the necessities, and that is a variable result. Both of those factors vary. There is not a time when one or the other or both do not vary. You cannot help that. Now you are attempting to put a factor in the constitution and fix it for all time when we know it is the result of two things, either or both of which may vary every year. It is perfectly preposterous for us to sit here and attempt to say what the tax rate of Ashtabula Harbor ought to be ten years from now.

Mr. DWYER: The idea you suggest in the past has been most vicious, as I have observed for many years. We levy a rate in cities as high as three per cent. Then comes the decennial appraisal, and possibly eight or ten millions of property are put on the duplicate the next year, and the same old rate will go right along, no matter how much the duplicate has been added to. They will always find a way to spend it. I am in favor of cutting down that arbitrary way of doing things which has been so bad in the past that we ought to have some limitation.

Mr. DOTY: I agree that there has been much abuse of this situation. The member is right. But this plan does not meet the whole situation. It simply makes our situation that much worse. We are attempting to fix a wrong thing, and if you will put a limitation upon what sum shall be expended—while I would not agree that that ought to be done—there is more reason to say that should be done than the way now suggested.

Mr. DWYER: If they cannot get it, they cannot spend it.

Mr. DOTY: They cannot get it because they cannot get it. If we didn't need something to run the government there wouldn't be any taxes. We do need a certain amount of money. That there is certain extravagance is true, but people can stop that.

Mr. DWYER: They have not stopped it.

Mr. DOTY: But we do not pay rates, but money. The tax rate is not what we pay. We pay money, and that amount of money that we pay is commensurate with what we have to pay as far as living expenses are concerned.

Mr. DWYER: I think you are too ethereal.

Mr. DOTY: I have been charged with being theoretical, and I am charged with being ethereal. Now, there is no rule about that. It is just a mathematical problem. The amount is fixed by the amount you spend. The amount is fixed by the amount of property you have. Now is it not true to get at the rate you must divide the amount spent into the amount you have on which to raise the money? And yet we have gotten into the habit of worshiping the rate instead of looking at what we spend!

Mr. DWYER: With our present rate everything is provided for, and I think we ought to have the limitation on the rate continued and fixed.

Mr. DOTY: In order to bring matters to a direct issue on this amendment, I move to lay it on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY [after consultation with members]: I withdraw that demand.

Mr. LAMPSON: Then I move the previous question.

Mr. DOTY: I now renew the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. PECK: I second the motion.

Mr. WATSON: That motion to lay on the table is too late.

Mr. DOTY: No; it is not. It takes precedence over the motion for the previous question.

Mr. LAMPSON: I demand the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken and resulted—yeas 41, nays 54, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Halfhill,	Redington,
Bowdle,	Harris, Hamilton,	Roehm,

So the motion to table was lost.

Mr. LAMPSON: I had a motion for the previous question, but I will withdraw that.

Mr. PECK: I move we adjourn.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I understood the chair recognized me.

The PRESIDENT: The chair did recognize the gentleman from Lucas.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 170 as follows:

In line 10 after the comma following the word "purpose" insert the following: "real estate when occupied as a bona fide homestead by the owner thereof, to an amount not exceeding in value one thousand dollars."

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I am now willing to yield the floor for a motion to recess, but I want to have the privilege of being heard when we reconvene.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that we recess until 7:30 o'clock tonight.

The motion was carried, and the Convention recessed.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess, and was called to order by the vice president.

Mr. STEWART: I move a call of the Convention.

The VICE PRESIDENT: A call of the Convention is demanded. The sergeant-at-arms will close the door, and the secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson	Harter, Stark,	Rorick,
Beatty, Wood,	Kehoe,	Shaffer,
Brown, Highland,	Kerr,	Smith, Hamilton
Cunningham,	King,	Solether,
Dunn,	Leete,	Stalter,

Elson,	Miller, Fairfield,	Weybrecht,
Evans,	Norris,	Wise,
Farnsworth,	Peck,	Worthington,
Halfhill,	Price,	Mr. President.
Harter, Huron,

The vice president announced that eighty-five members had answered to their names.

Mr. WOODS: I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I yield to Mr. Stewart.

Mr. STEWART: I am inclined to believe that there is no question of constitutional law or statute law that in its last analysis will not have some bearing somewhere upon the subject of finance or taxation. For this reason a discussion of this question will take a wide range.

It is my desire to speak upon only one phase of this question, which I think is pertinent to the question now before the Convention.

I believe that the only way to keep down the tax levy is to keep down the expense.

The over-willingness with which political subdivisions are disposed to go into debt, resulting in the piling up of great sums of bonded indebtedness, has reached a condition which, unless checked, portends nothing but financial disaster. The piling up of bonded indebtedness for the distant future to pay has, strange to say, met with ready and popular approval.

It is time that a warning should be sounded, and I sincerely hope that this Convention will lay down some rule which will absolutely govern the creation and the time of payment of all public debts. Because of this enormous growth of bonded indebtedness it has become a most important question to determine the best and safest method for its control and liquidation. To this end and purpose I beg the indulgence and attention of the Convention for a brief discussion of this question. There are two methods.

One is known as the "sinking fund;" the other as the "partial-payment plan."

Taxation.

To say that there are advantages in both systems is true, but I believe the greater merit is in the partial payment plan.

The sinking fund is designed to hold the accumulations of money raised by taxation to meet debts which fall due at some future date. If this fund were always wisely and honestly handled there would be no objection to it. It is sound in theory, but it cannot be placed beyond the "pale of human weakness," and because of this there is always some speculation and doubt as to its ultimate outcome. I believe that no debt should be created unless a part of the principal is paid each year, together with the annual interest that is due. The history of sinking funds is that they have too often failed.

As to the reasons:

First. Because the officers are of varying degrees of efficiency, integrity and ability—some dishonest, some incompetent.

Second. Unwise or unfriendly legislation may deplete the sinking fund.

Third. It has been charged that the sinking fund perpetuates a "system" and gives "opportunities" in buying and selling bonds and the investment of funds for commissions and bonuses on the side.

Fourth. Sinking funds are often depleted and the proceeds diverted from the purpose for which they were intended.

To illustrate: The English government for over one hundred and fifty years tried to have a sinking fund, with more failure than success. To quote an English author (Sargent, page 28):

The very name of a sinking fund has become unpopular and is regarded even by judicious men as a word of reproach; so that to pronounce any scheme to be a sinking fund is to say that it is worse than Eutopian; that it is something like a swindle on the public.

The first sinking fund was established in 1716 under Walpole, and set apart, as a "sacred trust never to be touched" to meet the principal and interest of the national debt, and to no other use, intent or purpose whatsoever, so the law read. But notwithstanding this it was employed to meet current expenses.

Gladstone, Beaconsfield and many others of lesser note tried schemes to perfect and establish a permanent sinking fund, but all fell short of their expectations because either later legislation interposed and diverted the funds, or the demands of war and extraordinary expense depleted the fund. Whenever there was money in the sinking fund and extraordinary conditions came about, they always drew on the sinking fund rather than raise by taxation the money that was needed for present use.

The party in power would proclaim the fact that they financed a war, made some great public expenditure, some great public improvement, and never raised the taxes. Then again, a succeeding administration, for political purposes and false economy, would reduce the sinking fund levy. This is where unfair and unfriendly legislation can come in. These changing conditions made the term "sinking fund" one of reproach. The payment of the debt was not the point. The desire for party prestige looked only to keeping down the rate of taxation by providing payment for only the interest and letting the future generations take care of the principal.

In the United States the sinking fund appeared in the treasury accounts in 1868. Under the law one per cent of the debt was to be paid each year. Explicit as this has been the secretaries of the treasury have exercised their own discretionary powers and suspended the operation of this law so that today the treasury owes the sinking fund over $500,000,000. I mention this to show historically that the sinking fund is depleted even in this country, where it was supposed to be held in trust and administered according to special laws.

In municipalities it is even worse. Many laws have been passed tending to make the sinking fund safer, but laws do not always control the frailties and weaknesses of those who have control over those funds.

I would place the debt-paying obligations outside of the pale of the incompetent or dishonest official.

I would make the payment of debt under a rule laid down as a constitutional requirement, that those who buy bonds must know that the recital on the face of the bonds must comply with the constitutional requirements.

Then and not till then will the payment of public debts be placed on a safe basis.

One of the great hardships that is imposed upon municipalities is that officials will issue bonds to fall due in a sum total at some future time. By this method they go on piling up indebtedness, making no provision to pay the principal, but only meeting the interest each year, till there comes a time when it takes all the money that can be raised by taxation to meet the interest and leaves nothing to pay the principal.

You say that they are criminally liable in not providing for the principal and interest. So they are, but what are you going to do when the sinking fund trustees who were derelict to their duty have perhaps years before passed out of office, and others, equally derelict, have in turn succeeded them and then in turn been succeeded by others? A situation that will permit conditions like these to come about is vicious and bad. To add further to the iniquity of the situation the proceeds of the bonds have often been used for purposes for which they were never issued. To illustrate: I know a community which refunded its bonded indebtedness and placed the maturity of the entire issue at a future date. The amount was for $30,000. Today it is several years before the bonds will fall due, and that municipality has spent about $40,000 for interest and not one cent of the principal has been paid.

I know another town where it takes over half of its public revenue to meet its interest charge. In other words, it takes more money to meet the interest charge than for all other public expenditures put together. Only the fixed interest charge and the running expenses can be met. They are at the limit of their levy and cannot make provision to pay one cent of the principal.

A system of law that allows such conditions to come about is vicious and bad. I believe no debt should be created unless some provisions are made that will make it mandatory to pay some portion of the principal each year.

MR. FACKLER: Would you make that limit of taxation right in the constitution so that the municipality could not possibly liquidate its debts?

Taxation.

Mr. STEWART: Wait until I get through, and then if I have any time I shall be glad to answer your question.

I believe that it should be obligatory by constitutional provision. Then those who buy bonds will take notice that the constitutional recitals have been complied with. As it is the recitals on the face of the bonds that all the statutory requirements have been complied with, and that an examination of the transcript of the council proceedings has been made showing formal and regular proceedings, will always make a bond valid in the hands of an innocent purchaser, when they may have violated the law in the recitals on the face of the bonds (such as issuing for some certain purpose when the money was devoted to another use), and also when the transcript would not disclose the real facts and proceedings of the council. Council proceedings have been doctored in the past and will be in the future.

I am in favor of a constitutional requirement making it obligatory that some portion of the principal be paid annually. Let me mention the requirements of another state: In Colorado the various municipalities are required to report and have registered all bonds issued, and the county auditors are compelled to levy annually a tax to meet some portion of the principal and interest.

Another grave fault in not having annual payments is that it is unfair to issue bonds that will not fall due until after the original improvement may be "dead and gone." It is unfair to have a bond issue all fall due at the same time. It is bad practice to get in the habit of always refunding and never paying any of the principal. Cities and villages do this, while if an individual "always renews" and never pays, his credit will soon be at a discount.

Take a municipal water plant, a municipal electric light plant, wherein the bonds all fall at a future date, all at the same time. You may have a worn-out plant before it is time to pay the bonds. Then it is more bonds to improve the plant.

It would be wrong to allow a condition to exist that will force the people thirty or forty years from now to meet the whole burden of paying off a debt which will represent at that time, not the newly installed and well-equipped plant, but a plant thirty to forty years old, worn out and obsolete.

It is by such shortsighted methods that municipalities get into such deplorable financial conditions. You say that it is criminal if we do not guard carefully the sinking fund. That is true. Of course, they violated the law.

Each newly elected council may bring in a new sinking fund commission. Each in turn, designedly or ignorantly, does what its predecessors have done, whether it be legal or not, so in a few years you have a large portion of the citizenship of that community who are parties to this violation of law. Then what are you going to do?

I will concede the fact that in some of the larger cities their sinking funds are managed all right. This is because the cities are in the center of large financial districts; have better opportunities for investment, both in buying securities for investment and in selling same, when they have to meet maturing bonds. They also have a better opportunity to place men on the sinking fund board who are schooled in handling financial matters. But the smaller municipalities of the state have limited opportunities for investment. Their meagre experience in handling financial matters, their narrow limit for the sale of securities that must be sold to meet maturing bonds, puts them at a disadvantage in handling the sinking fund even if they are honestly disposed to comply with the law, while if they are mercenary the sinking fund may be plundered. How can this be done?

1. By making no levy.
2. By using the sinking fund to meet general expense.
3. For political purposes, by lowering the levy to only enough to pay for the interest, leaving the future to pay the principal.

Such practices as these have prevented the one per cent Smith law from being a greater success than it has been.

The only way to "sink" a debt is to pay it.

Make your sinking fund one of partial-payment rule, then there will be no uncertainty as to what is due and when it is due. In this way you reduce the principal annually and also the interest charge.

Now, as to the methods that I would suggest as to the amount that should be paid each year. I recognize that cities are often called upon to make large bond issues to cover the cost of some public improvement, and in this they have to build for the future. A city's future is fixed. It is a center of trade, manufacturing and all kinds of commerce. It, when building, has to take into consideration the city's future growth, and must necessarily make its improvements far beyond its present needs, such as extensive water works, extensive electric light plants. This being the case I can see where their bond issues should run a longer period and why future generations should pay their share of the debt. On the other hand, the growth of the smaller municipalities of the state is uncertain; they are prosperous today and on the decline tomorrow. For this reason they should not be allowed to incur long-time indebtedness.

To adjust properly the situation between these two extremes, I would say that not less than two per cent of each bond issue should be paid off each year. This would make a bond issue run fifty years, meet the requirements of cities as to long-time issues and at the same time would place smaller communities upon a basis of paying annually some portion of their indebtedness. As it is many smaller municipalities provide only for the interest and make no provision for the payment of the principal.

Personally, I think that all smaller municipalities should pay from five to ten per cent of their debt each year, but to take care of the extraordinary conditions that often overtake growing cities I am willing to place the amount at two per cent. It is the absolute requirement that some portion of the debt be paid each year for which I contend.

No other single thing that this Convention might do will accomplish more to place all political subdivisions of this state on a solid financial basis than this one thing of forcing the payment, each year, of some certain portion of its public debt.

I hope that the Convention will see the wisdom of the partial-payment plan and write it in the constitution. There it will be beyond the whim or caprice of legislative bodies. The partial-payment plan will work automatically. There can be no mismanagement, dishonesty or manipulation. Neither can any unwise or unfriendly legislation interfere.

It is safe to say that the greatest evil in any debt is in having to pay the debt over and over again in the form of interest and never paying any part of the principal.

The desire on the part of tax-levying bodies to make a good showing in keeping down the levy causes them to resort to illegal drafts on the sinking fund to meet general expenses. There can be no juggling of funds for political purposes or for dishonest practices. While the sinking fund may be administered with profit, it may be plundered. It may be incompetency, it may be dishonesty, it may be in the loss of securities held, but the fact remains that there is always a possibility of loss in the sinking fund.

With the partial-payment plan there can be no loss or diversion of the funds. Which system will you have, one that shows sometimes a profit and sometimes a loss, or a system that admits of no loss whatever? The success of the sinking fund depends entirely on the honesty, the integrity and the clear business judgment of the officers in charge, regardless of the laws that are devised to protect said fund, while with partial payments, no matter whether the officers in charge are honest, dishonest or incompetent, the payment of principal and interest cannot be avoided. You should provide for the payment of some part of the principal each year, because great progress is being made in perfecting and improving machinery every day, which often makes a plant obsolete in a few years. You should force a gradual payment of the debt, so that, while you are wearing out your plant or improvement, you at the same time are wearing out your debt.

Let me illustrate the partial-payment plan by the good roads bond issue as suggested by the printed example which you all have seen. There a debt of fifty millions was to run for thirty-five years, and in the end would amount, principal and interest, to $86,570,000, while, if you will put the good roads bond issue on the partial-payment plan, according to the plan which I have worked out, you pay off the debt in twenty-five years, instead of thirty-five years, and save $17,320,000. Under the twenty-five-year partial-payment plan, your average rate is four hundred and sixty-one one-thousandths of a mill; under the thirty-five-year plan your average rate is four hundred and thirteen one-thousandths of a mill, a difference of only forty-eight one-thousandths of a mill as to the average levy. In other words, the partial payment plan on each $1,000 of taxable property involves a payment of only four and eight-tenths cents more each year, but pays off the entire debt in twenty-five years and saves $17,320,000.

I want to put a limit to the authority to spend money. Force a payment of some portion of your public debt each year and the people will take care of the levy.

At the proper time I shall offer an amendment providing for the addition of the following section:

No bonded indebtedness of the state, or of any political subdivision thereof, shall be incurred, unless at least two per centum of such indebtedness is paid each year, together with the annual interest on such bonded indebtedness.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I shall be very brief in this matter. I will read the clause as it would read if the amendment I suggested is adopted. It is the exemption clause of the present constitution. The language that is important starts out as follows:

But burying grounds, public school houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, real estate when occupied as a bona fide homestead by the owner thereof, to an amount not exceeding in value one thousand dollars and personal property, to an amount not exceeding two hundred dollars, for each individual, and deductions of bona fide debts from credits, may by general laws, be exempt from taxation.

Mr. DWYER: Is the word "cemeteries" in that?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: "Burying grounds." The only change I made from the exemptions in the present constitution is to add the words "real estate when occupied as a bona fide homestead by the owner thereof, to an amount not exceeding in value one thousand dollars." This provides that that may by general laws be exempt. Now bear in mind under the present constitution and under the language employed in both the minority report and the Anderson substitute the exemption is permissive only. The general assembly may, if it sees fit, by general law, make these exemptions, and those laws may at any time be repealed, and the policy of the state in that particular may be reversed. What I am trying to do is to take the burden from home-owners to encourage home-owning. At the present time a thousand-dollar homestead is exempt from execution and is exempt from every debt except for taxes. You may have your home and it shall not be taken away from you unless you fail to pay taxes, and then it may be confiscated piecemeal by the state. Now the purpose of the homestead exemption is to save a man who is not able to pay his debts to the public from being a public charge. The theory is that it is better to owe some one person debts up to $1,000 than to be supported by the public and be a pauper.

Mr. HOSKINS: I didn't catch the reading of that amendment exactly. Does that permit the exemption of a homestead regardless of value? Suppose I live in a homestead worth $10,000?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: The first $1,000 could be made exempt by the general assembly. The general assembly could exempt $1,000, and then if I owned a $5,000 homestead it would be exempt only to the extent of $1,000, and $4,000 could be levied on.

Mr. STOKES: You are proceeding under a different rule of exemptions than obtains as to executions.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: In what particular?

Mr. STOKES: The home is exempt from execution up to $1,000?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Yes.

Mr. STOKES: But if the home is worth $10,000 you can take the whole home.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: The $1,000 would be saved to the man who has a $1,000 home.

Mr. HALFHILL: If I understood the purpose of your amendment correctly, the legislature could frame a law whereby it would only grant that exemption to the small owner and make it exclusively apply to the small home-owner.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: The general assembly, under this language, could exempt any amount by way of homestead, not exceeding $1,000, and I have no idea that the general assembly could exempt the full $1,000 at the start, and perhaps never. It might not be considered the part of wisdom to do it. The reason I said $1,000 is because the exemption law exempts from every other claim, except the claim of the state, $1,000 of the homestead owner.

Mr. REDINGTON: Do you not think that that language would exempt that $1,000 without any act of the general assembly?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I think not. I think the general assembly would have to frame the law. I cannot think of any principle upon which you are going to exempt a homestead from execution and yet allow it to be confiscated by the state for taxes. The principle under which the property is exempt from execution is sound enough and broad enough to justify us in keeping the man from losing his home on any obligation. As I have said the theory on which the $1,000 is exempt on general obligations is if you do not exempt it the man may become a charge on public charity, and the same would apply if the state takes his property for taxation. What is the class of citizens you want to encourage? Is it the man who lives in a rented house or is it the man who lives in his own property? Which citizen is the best citizen for his state, the one who moves the first of every month or the one who is rooted to the soil? Which citizen is it that throws tin cans in the street and paper on the pavement and lets the property he is using go to rack and ruin; is it the man who owns it, or the one who rents it and stays in it until it becomes such a nuisance that he can stay no longer? I say to you that in my opinion we cannot do anything which will be better calculated to make our state happier and more prosperous and sound politically and sound morally and sound socially than to encourage home-owning, to place a premium upon the home-owner. At the present time $200 is exempt to a man, if he wants it, in personal property. He does not have to pay taxes on that, but if he puts it in a home it has to pay taxes. I say to you that encourages men not to own homes, but to live in rented property and to get their money in personal property. This suggestion, if adopted and if the general assembly sees fit to carry it into effect, and the governor sees fit to approve it, and some of you do not see fit to circulate the initiative and referendum petition against it, will encourage our people to become home-owners, and the man who lives in his own home would be relieved from taxation, but the man who lives in a rented house will have to pay taxes on the rented house because the landlord puts that in the rent. In my judgment this will encourage home-owning. I believe this will be a very popular matter to put into the work of this Convention, and if the general assembly and the governor and the people in their collective wisdom under the referendum shall see fit to let it go into effect no harm will be done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Would it not have the further advantage of encouraging the ownership of small farms?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Certainly it will, and little garden patches, and everything of that nature.

Mr. WOODS: I want to demand the previous question. This proposal has not yet been engrossed. We have been talking about amendments on it for a couple of days, and it has not yet reached that stage. Now I think it should be brought to that stage. It will not prevent future amendments being made. If the previous question is demanded you will vote on the pending amendment, and that will take it over two days for second reading. For that reason I demand the previous question.

Mr. HALFHILL: I renew my request made this morning for the privilege of the Convention for a statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The vice president cannot allow debate at this stage.

Mr. HALFHILL: I ask the privilege of the Convention.

The VICE PRESIDENT: As to whether it is the privilege of the Convention the Convention will have to decide. If there is no objection Mr. Halfhill may speak on what you may deem the privilege of the Convention, although the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. PECK: Not ordered, but demanded.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] be allowed to make any statement he desires.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The vice president cannot allow that motion because the previous question has been called.

Mr. LAMPSON: I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] may make his statement.

Mr. COLTON: I second the motion heartily.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Is there any objection? If none, Mr. Halfhill has the floor.

Mr. HALFHILL: I want to recall the situation here, the same thing I called the attention of the Convention to this morning, when, immediately upon convening, after the president had recognized the member from Scioto [Mr. EVANS], the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] was on his feet to demand the previous question. I inquire, what are we trying to do here in this matter? When this question came in before the Convention from the committee on Taxation, it was expressly stated by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY], and agreed to by the Convention, that we enter into a full discussion of all of the elements of the two reports before us just the same as if upon second reading. We have started out to discuss it in that way. There has been an attempt two or three times since then to seize this question and drag it out of the Convention into the committee room in order to reform something and bring it back here, and move the previous question, and rush it through the Convention. Are we here to treat these questions as men knowing the responsibility we are under? If we are, then do not at this time shut off this debate. Here are matters that ought to be presented by way of amendment, not in a committee room, but threshed out by the Convention; and under the arrangement that was agreed to unanimously we should proceed to discuss these questions that are before us; because I know what it means, and you all know what it means, if you shut off this debate. You frame up a situation so as to take a vote, and you are violating the confidence that each reposed in the other when we started in to discuss fully this question before the Convention. I submit that it should be discussed right here, and under the arrangement that was made there is no occasion for the previous question, because when we have threshed it out under that arrangement made and understood and agreed to by everybody, we have done the work; and your votes that have been taken from time to time, veering from one point to another, a few coming one way on a motion to lay on the table, and the same motion going the other way at a different time shows that this question is not understood. I know it is not understood in all of its details by the members of this Convention. There are matters involved that I have received much enlightenment upon in these debates, especially today; and there are questions that have not been discussed that I can throw some light upon if I have an opportunity to do so. On a matter that affects us and our children after us, and affects every dollar's worth of property in the state of Ohio, and every industry in the state of Ohio, this greatest question before the Convention, you propose to dispose of by some short-cut parliamentary procedure. I insist that we shall observe the faith, each with the other, that we declared when we started in here, and that we thresh out every feature of this proposal before we proceed by a parliamentary maneuver to put it in such shape that further debate or attempt to add anything by way of amendment before the Convention will be a futile and useless effort.

Taxation.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer must state to the Convention that unless the Convention agrees, under the heading of a privilege of the Convention, we cannot go on and debate if the previous question is demanded. Of course, if the Convention says it can be done, I am helpless.

Mr. WOODS: I am not trying to take advantage of anybody, but I cannot for the life of me see how the demanding of the previous question would do that. This previous question does not apply to the final passage on second reading. This proposal has not been engrossed. After it is engrossed it is subject to amendment and debate of all sorts. What I want to do is to get this to a point where it can be engrossed, so that it won't take a two-thirds vote to do anything with it.

Mr. HOSKINS: Did we not pass a motion of the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] that we would discuss this as if under second reading?

Mr. WOODS: There was a motion of that sort, that we would debate the minority report and the majority report as if on second reading. We disposed of the majority report, and the minority report is before the Convention. I think we made a mistake in not engrossing the report at the time, but I do not want to take any advantage of anybody. I want everybody to do all the talking he wishes to do, but I cannot understand why we cannot engross this, and get along to the usual step.

Mr. MAUCK: My understanding is that we are on the Anderson amendment. You ought not to pass on this in the absence of the delegate from Mahoning. The Anderson amendment would have to be disposed of before the bill could be engrossed.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question is not on the Anderson amendment, but on the engrossment of the minority report. The proposition is simply one of engrossment, and the motion is made for the previous question.

Mr. DOTY: A parliamentary inquiry. Of course, the pending amendment must be disposed of before the engrossment?

The VICE PRESIDENT: That is not binding.

Mr. DOTY: Yes; it is. How can you engross anything while amendments to it are pending?

Mr. MAUCK: May I ask what is going to be engrossed while the amendments are pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT: Whatever the Convention decides.

Mr. LAMPSON: The proposal is—the presiding officer wants to know whether you want this thing to continue when there is a way out of the parliamentary tangle?

DELEGATES: No.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is on the previous question.

Mr. PECK: On what?

The VICE PRESIDENT: On engrossment.

Mr. WINN: This is my understanding, that if the previous question is ordered, then the first question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Lucas [Mr. BROWN]; then upon the next amendment, then on engrossment.

Mr. DOTY: That is right.

Mr. WINN: And then it is open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT: That is right. The question is, Shall the debate now close?

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 45, nays 45, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Taxation.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion is lost, and the debate will continue upon the engrossment.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Does this open the debate on the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I think this amendment ought not to pass. There are a number of towns in my county that, if this amendment were to pass, would not pay one dollar of taxes. They have not a house in them that anybody would pay $1,000 for, and the result would be that the whole town would not pay one dollar's taxes, and all over the state of Ohio that condition would apply, and that would reduce the value of real estate approximately one-half. I know there are towns in our county that would not pay a dollar, plenty of them. Now, why should we do it? There is no good reason, and the result will be that if you have $1,000 for a home-stead that will mean $2,000, and in the very town in which I live, which is supposed to be reasonably well-to-do, I venture to say that half the houses in the town would not pay $1 of taxes. You do not know what you are doing if you pass this proposition. You are reducing the tax duplicate wonderfully. It is unavoidable, and I repeat again that one-half of the towns in Harrison county will not pay $1 in taxes upon any house in them.

Mr. TETLOW: I would like to ask how many homes in Harrison county in the mining district are owned by the men living in them?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I don't know. We haven't any mining district. There are a few miners living in the southern end of the county.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Do you understand that this thing simply makes it possible for the general assembly to make an exemption from one cent up to $1,000, if the general assembly sees fit, all subject to the approval of the governor and the people of Ohio; that this does not exempt the home of $1,000?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: It is probably fair to consider that the legislature might have more sense than this Convention. That is possible. But what is the use of running that risk?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Do you understand that that is what the language does —

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: No; the trouble about this matter is that if it would stop at $1,000, it might not be so bad, but it will not stop here. A house worth $2,000, and that in reality sells for that, goes on the tax duplicate for $1,000, and that house is exempt from taxation. You build a house in any little town in the state and it will not sell the next day for half of what it cost. Take the town of Dearsville. It has three or four hundred people and is off the railroad, and there is not a house in it appraised at $1,000 for taxation.

Mr. RILEY: Does the gentleman understand that if this is adopted a thousand dollars may be taken off of every man's house, rich or poor?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Yes.

Mr. RILEY: That increases the exemption and loses the tax duplicate a great deal.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Yes. If my property and your property are now valued at $5,000, they can go on the duplicate at $4,000. I am certainly opposed to this amendment. It would be disastrous to many townships in our county, and it is the same I should judge in every locality in the state.

Mr. Antrim was here recognized.

Mr. ULMER: Mr. President —

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer will state that the president has left a list to be recognized in turn, and if anybody wants to speak, if he will send up his name it will be placed on the list. Mr. Antrim has the floor.

Mr. PETTIT: I would like to see the time when the rules that we have adopted in this Convention will be employed, and not one man's rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT: This is not one man's rule. The gentleman from Van Wert has the floor.

Mr. ANTRIM: Mr. President and Gentlemen: By way of introduction to my remarks I would like to propound a conundrum to the Convention, and my conundrum is this: How is it possible that two men engaged in the same line of business, both being presumably normal men, when it comes to certain subjects, like taxation, in which they are both very much interested, should arrive at diametrically opposite conclusions? That is a conundrum I would like to have some one answer, and come to me privately and give me the answer after I have finished speaking.

Just before the recess we had an excellent address by the gentleman from Fayette [Mr. JONES]. The gentleman from Fayette [Mr. JONES] made the statement that he had studied the subject of taxation for thirty years, had read some learned books to which reference was made by the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. HARRIS], and was thoroughly well informed on the subject, and yet his study of this great subject caused him to conclude that the only thing is the uniform rule. And of all the rabid uniform-rule men I have ever met in all the course of my life he certainly is the most radical. I do not claim to be the most ardent advocate of classification in the Convention, yet I believe in it, and think a sort of elastic scheme of taxation is the most logical thing that can be adopted. If we study the trend of things as far as taxation is concerned, we shall find that it is away from uniformity. All I ask you to do is to investigate the history of the various great nations of the world, and you will find this to be the case in absolutely every great nation. In Europe the tax on intangible property has almost entirely ceased, and in its place we have the income tax, just as they have in the state of Wisconsin, the only state in the United States that has the income tax in place of the tax on intangible personal property and some other forms of personal property. We find that in eleven states of the Union there is no constitutional restraint in the matter of taxation. This afternoon the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. HARRIS] gave the names and the constitutional provisions of other states that have provided for classification of property in their constitutions, for example, Oklahoma and Arizona. There are other states that have the uniform rule, but they have made the uniform rule somewhat elastic.

Now, as far as I have been able to learn, no state or county that has started on the way toward elasticity in matters of taxation has ever returned to the uniform rule. I am very much in favor of elasticity when it comes to our currency. I do not know whether the gentleman from Fayette [Mr. JONES] is. I know a great majority of the bankers of the country are. And just as I am in favor of elasticity of the currency of this country, which is the one thing that we need, so I am in favor of elasticity in matters of taxation, and if we adopt a uniform rule like that advocated by the gentleman from Fayette [Mr. JONES] we shall be tied down for years to come, and we shall not be able to make any taxation progress. In my investigation of this subject of taxation, and I do not claim to be as well posted as the gentleman from Fayette [Mr. JONES], although I believe if I were to study it as much as he has studied it I would not arrive at his conclusion, even after thirty years—but in my study of it I find that the people who advocate the uniform rule are chiefly the people who own land. On the other hand, I find that the people who advocate classification or elasticity are the people who also own land, but who own at the same time a good deal of personal property; and I find too that the people who advocate classification or elasticity in matters of taxation are the great scholars.

Taxation.

Now, the gentleman from Cincinnati wanted to know if there was one great reputable scholar, a professor of economics or expert in matters of taxation, anywhere in the world who advocated the uniform rule, the nobody in this Convention could mention the name of one such person.

A great many reasons have been given during the course of the debate why the classification of property for taxation purposes is desirable. My idea will be to consider briefly a few of the reasons that have been considered less fully.

I find upon investigating the history of the value of property that real estate and tangible property have gradually increased in value; that is, the tendency has been since the constitution was written in 1851 for real estate and tangible property to gradually increase in value, and particularly has this been the case in the last ten or fifteen years. On the other hand, we find that the tendency has been for intangible personal property to decrease in value. Now all you have to do in order to verify this statement is to turn to the census reports, and you will see by the census reports that are just out, or the census reports of the previous decades, that this is absolutely the case. Why is it that real estate and tangible property have gradually increased in price, and that intangible property that we classification people want to classify, has decreased? Here is the one great reason: Because gold, the measure of value and the medium of exchange, has greatly increased in the world. Away back in 1851, when our present constitution was written, there was very little gold. It was very scarce, and the result was that intangible property was really in a sense more valuable than real estate or tangible property; but gold was discovered in California in 1849, and the amount of gold mined gradually increased, with the result that today we mine annually half a billion dollars of gold. Twenty-five or thirty years ago we mined only about $100,000,000 of gold annually; today there are five times as much, and you can readily see my point, that if the medium of exchange increases to any great extent, the things for which we exchange the gold naturally decrease. In short, it takes more money today to buy a farm, or to buy almost any form of tangible property, than it did ten or twenty or thirty years ago, for the sole reason that gold is more plentiful today than it was ten or twenty or thirty years ago.

Mr. WINN: Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANTRIM: At the end of my remarks, not now.

I want to give you a case to illustrate this fact, and I am quite sure it will be clear to everybody who listens to it.

In the year 1900 in Van Wert county I bought an eighty-acre farm for $2,850. In six weeks I sold that farm at a profit of $300, so that at the end of six weeks I had $3,150. I loaned that money out and it netted me five per cent per annum. Now the interest for ten years, until 1910, was $1,575. So the interest and principal, including the profit, amounted to $4,725. That represents money. Now, suppose on the other hand I had kept that farm that cost me $2,850. If I had rented it out there is absolutely no question that at that price I would have realized fully fifteen per cent per annum. Fifteen per cent per annum for ten years would mean $4,250, making $7,100. At the end of ten years, or in 1910, that farm sold for $10,000. Now, let us take the difference between the $2,850 and $10,000 and we have $7,150. Then if we add all this together we have $14,250. Deducting for taxes an ample amount, $500—that is more than the taxes would have been, but still, deducting $500 for the taxes, and $500 for the keeping of the farm in the condition in which it was when it was bought, we have $1,000, which leaves $13,250. Now deduct from the $13,250 the amount of money I had as the result of the loan I made, and we have a difference of $8,525. That is the amount I actually lost by not keeping that farm. That is a concrete example of what happened when tangible property was converted into intangible property. If I had kept the land, as the result of keeping the land I would have had $8,525 more money. That proves the point I make, that tangible property and real estate have been gradually increasing in value, whereas intangibles have gradually decreased, for the reason that gold has become more plentiful in that time.

Now I am going to take the celebrated case given by Mr. Colton the other day. Professor Colton says there are two men living in his town of Hiram, and one has $10,000 in notes, and the other has $10,000 in a farm. The man who has a $10,000 farm pays taxes on it, and the man who has the $10,000 of notes is under just as much obligation to pay taxes on the full $10,000 worth of notes. Of course he is a pretty mean man if he doesn't pay some taxes. Let us analyze this case. In the average township where there is no city the tax rate is very low. For instance, we have many townships in my county where the rate is much lower than one per cent. In the cities the rate is much higher. Now in one township I have in mind the rate is .44, so that a man having a $10,000 farm in this township would pay a tax of only $44. In Van Wert—I do not know what the rate is in Hiram, but possibly near the same—the rate was $1.38 last year, so that if a man had returned full $10,000 in notes, he would have had to pay $138 in taxes. Here is the difference. The man who owns a farm gets more from the farm than the man who has money, and the man who has money pays three times as much taxes as the man who has the farm, and this further point should be taken into consideration: The man who has the farm has something that may increase in value, and as a matter of fact it has increased in value in the last few years very materially; so he not only pays a less rate, but his $10,000 has increased to $11,000 or $12,000 or $13,000. Whereas the man who has the notes, saying the notes are good notes, gets only $10,000 and accrued interest, whatever that may be. So, is it fair that the man who has the $10,000 of notes should be put upon the same basis as the man who has the land?

The question was asked the other day, would men be more honest if we were to introduce classification of property, and I think it was answered that they would be. It seems to me that there is no question that men would return and return fully their personal property if they felt they were being dealt fairly with. Even the gentleman from Fayette, who is such a rabid uniform-rule man, intimated that he had confidence in all men, and I think it is absolutely true that if we put a fair rate on intangible property that is gradually going down at the expense of tangible property and real estate we will find very much better returns.

Now what is true in the countries and states where they have introduced classification of intangibles? Take Minnesota. It is a fact that after the rate was reduced to three mills intangible property increased eight times; that is, eight times as much intangible personal property was returned under the three-mill rate as had been returned under the original rate before the three-mill rate became effective. Pennsylvania was also mentioned. In Pennsylvania they have $1,000,000,000 returned at four mills. Iowa has intangible personal property on a five-mill basis.

We hear it said by many that classification of property will hurt the farmer. Like the gentleman from Lorain [Mr. REDINGTON], I own several farms, and I think it will benefit the farmer to have classification of property. I think if we classify intangible personal property more money will be received as taxes, and the farmer will be benefited by the decreased amount that he will have to pay. And before I leave the question I want to say that there are thousands of people crying for lower rates in order that they may be honest and may make proper and correct returns.

Take Massachusetts. In Massachusetts we find a rate of two and a half mills on savings deposits, and they have a billion dollars returned. All the personal property of all kinds returned in the state of Ohio only makes two billions, so you see how much larger the returns are in Massachusetts than they are in Ohio.

Maryland was referred to by the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. HARRIS] as having returned so much more under the lower rate, and New York now at the present time almost exempts intangible property, and we find in the city of New York alone over twice as much money as in the state of Ohio, and as a result the rates in New York are as low as two and a half per cent, and men can borrow money at a lower rate in New York than anywhere else in the United States.

Let us next take mortgages. A great deal has been said about mortgages. Suppose we had in place of a tax on mortgages a recording tax like that in the state of New York. There is no question that all local people with money to lend would put it in mortgages, and the result would be that men in any particular county would be able to borrow all they wanted from the local money lenders. What is the case at the present time? In a great many of the counties loans are made by insurance companies, and what do the counties realize? Not one cent. So that really the counties are the losers, whereas if we had a smaller tax nearly all the money could be found in the counties themselves that the farmers and home-owners need, and the counties would get the benefit in the way of a recorders's tax.

I cannot offer any amendment now, but if I have the opportunity I shall offer an amendment that has to do to a certain extent with exempting money, and I would even be liberal enough to allow the banks to pay the amount that we would fix on money if it were not too high. I think we should show our liberality. This matter of taxation is rather a selfish matter, and I would be willing for the banking institutions that receive deposits to pay the money if the tax were a reasonable tax. Then we would get a tax on a billion dollars in the state of Ohio, and the result would be that the deposits would vastly increase, and all the people would be benefited from the fact that with more money the rate would be lower. Then Mr. Thomas, of Cleveland, would never have to pay six per cent on a mortgage on his house, but he might get the money at five per cent or even lower, from the fact that there would be more money in Cleveland to lend than there is now, and instead of the banks lending money at six, seven and eight per cent, money might be loaned at four, five and six, as is the case in France, where farmers get money at three and a half and four per cent.

Now, another obvious advantage of a partial exempting of money would be that those who would need protection would be the very ones who would get protection. As was very well said by the gentleman from Lorain [Mr. REDINGTON], it is not the rich people of the state of Ohio who have money on hand and that need protection; it is the people in moderate circumstances, the laboring man, the clerk and many others, who have money on deposit in banks, and the small sums they have aggregate large sums. Take, for example, the city of Cleveland. We have been told there is one bank that has one hundred thousand depositors. Now, if that bank has that many, how many depositors have all the banks, where there are three hundred millions on deposit? Mr. Anderson made the statement that there is a bank in his town that has over thirty thousand depositors. So if you take the state of Ohio as a whole you will find thousands upon thousands and hundred of thousands of depositors. We find that the average deposit will not run over $1,000, and that means that the people who have the deposits are not the rich people. It is the middle class of people who have money on deposit. The rich people who keep the industries going are the people who borrow money. The many people who deposit small amounts are not the people who are running large businesses.

Again, if we were in a measure to exempt money, we would prevent the loss of a great deal of money. At the present time all money is taxed, no matter whether earning anything or not. What is the result? A great many people who know nothing of investments go into get-rich-quick schemes and drop their money. Sometime back the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. STOKES] made the statement that over $5,000,000 are lost annually as the result of going into these get-rich-quick schemes. If people could put their money into banks and know they were not going to be taxed on their money, the result would be they would leave it in the banks at three and four and five per cent, and that large sum mentioned would be saved to the people who can least afford to lose.

What would be the advantage of increased deposits? Suppose we could increase the deposits of the state of Ohio from a billion to a billion and a quarter. Do you not think that would tend to reduce rates of interest, not only to the business men, but to the farmers and everybody who borrows? Take the example of New York. Interest rates in New York are considerably lower than in Ohio. Why is that? Because they classify property in the state of New York and they partially exempt many forms of intangible property. And this would mean lower rates to the farmers, who were so eloquently spoken of by Mr. Lampson in connection with the good roads proposition, and to the home-owners and those who want to own homes. If they get lower rates it is a great saving, and a dollar saved is a dollar earned. Finally, if money were to be partially exempted it would have a tendency to decrease perjury, the concealment of intangible property and evasion of law. There is this tendency among men, that if they begin evading one law, they get so in the habit of evading law that they do not have the respect for all law that they should have. So the result of evasion and not making proper returns leads to our not having proper respect for all law that we should have. So at the proper time I shall offer an amendment along the line of partially exempting money on deposit from taxation.

Mr. COLTON: Before we pass too far from the amendment of the gentleman from Lucas [Mr. BROWN] I wish to say a word upon that amendment. It is proposed to exempt from taxation every person living in his own home to the extent of $1,000 of the real estate. It seems to me that this is a very dangerous proposition. There are in the state of Ohio twelve hundred thousand voters. Just how many voters have homes is a little difficult to determine. I do not remember to have seen any estimate of the number of homes, but suppose that there are half of the voters who own their own homes. Then there are 600,000 homes. Now suppose that one-third of those homes are not occupied by the owners, then we have 400,000 homes occupied by the owners, and from these 400,000 homes you exempt $1,000 each, or $400,000,000. According to the last valuation of real estate the value of all the real estate in the state was just a little over $4,200,000,000. If the exemptions reach $400,000,000, we are exempting about one-tenth of the real estate in this state. That is, we are putting it in danger of being exempted. That I think a very dangerous thing to do, and the movement is not at all justified.

It has been objected, and very well, that this relieves the rich man, who does not need relief, as well as the poor man. Possibly the legislature might make an adjustment to avoid that, although I do not know that it could. It has also been said that the legislature will not exempt $1,000, and that we might submit this to the people as a sort of referendum and let them decide. I do not propose to vote in this Convention for any measure to go to the people that I will not vote for when it goes there, and I will not vote to put in this constitution any clause that I cannot vote for when the constitution goes before the people. When that time comes I want to be able to tell the people that I voted for every clause there because I believe in that clause. I am sure that to pass this amendment in this form would be a very dangerous thing to do.

Now another remark concerning the spirit in which this discussion has been carried on. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] that there has been a movement to withdraw this proposition from the Convention, and get it in a committee room, and reshape it and bring it back for the purpose of ramming it through. I disclaim any knowledge of such a movement on the part of myself, or of such other members of the minority as I have been able to get in communication with. I make the same disclaimer for them. This morning there was an understanding that discussion should go on as far as we were concerned, and we have no opposition to it, and we mean to keep that understanding in good faith and let the Convention decide on the matter. However, realizing that this proposition ought to be engrossed I voted against the motion to postpone. I feared there might be an effort to cut off discussion. Upon consultation I find there was no such intention, and this proposition can be engrossed and discussion can go on as freely as it is going on now. I am sure it is the intention of those who support the minority report to allow the discussion to go on, and with that understanding, I demand the previous question on this matter.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. COLTON: I now move that this amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. LAMPSON: After the main question has been ordered the motion is on the amendment, and the motion to table it cannot be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion to table at this time will be declared out of order and the vote will be on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted — yeas 32, nays 54, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Now the vote is upon the Anderson amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question now is upon engrossment. If there is no objection, it will be engrossed.

Mr. WINN: I now move that the Convention order the proposal to be read the second time.

Mr. DWYER: I want some information as to what we have voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT: We voted on the amendment of the gentleman from Mahoning that last vote.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order as to the motion made by the delegate from Defiance [Mr. WINN]. The matter lies over two days.

The VICE PRESIDENT: It is placed on the calendar for the second day unless the Convention by a majority vote otherwise orders.

Mr. HALFHILL: Does that mean a majority of the Convention, or a majority of those voting?

The VICE PRESIDENT: The matter is entirely in the hands of the Convention by a majority vote of those present, provided the total vote shows a quorum.

Mr. LAMPSON: In order that there may be perfect understanding, it may be read now, and then it is open to debate or amendment, or motion to postpone until tomorrow or any other time.

Mr. DOTY: What is it that is proposed to be done now?

The VICE PRESIDENT: To put it on its second reading.

Mr. DOTY: I demand the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 57, nays 25, as follows:

Halenkamp,

So the motion was carried.

Mr. HOSKINS: I move that this Convention adjourn until next Monday at two o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion to adjourn is out of order. The proposal is up for its second reading, and has not been read yet.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HOSKINS: I now move that we recess until two o'clock Monday afternoon.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that we postpone further consideration of this proposal until Monday next, and it be placed at the head of the calendar, and that it be ordered printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion before the Convention is the one made by Mr. Lampson.

The motion was carried.

Leave of absence for the remainder of the week was granted to Messrs. King, Evans, Stamm, Norris, Kerr, Rorick, Anderson, Fox and Hoskins.

Leave of absence for Friday, Monday and Tuesday was granted to Messrs. Beatty, of Wood and Kehoe.

Mr. DOTY: I now move that we adjourn until tomorrow morning at nine o'clock.

Mr. LAMPSON: I second that motion.

The motion was carried.

SIXTY-EIGHTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

FRIDAY, May 3, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the member from Knox county, the Rev. Mr. McClelland.

The journal of yesterday (legislative day of Wednesday) was read and approved.

Mr. STEVENS: I demand a call of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: A call of the Convention has been demanded, the doors will be closed, and the roll will be called.

The roll was called, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson,	Harter, Hurón,	Price,
Beatty, Wood,	Hoskins,	Riley,
Brattain,	Hursh,	Rorick,
Brown, Highland,	Johnson, Madison,	Shaw,
Brown, Lucas,	Jones,	Smith, Hamilton,

Eby,	Malin,	Tetlow,
Elson,	Marriott,	Weybrecht,
Evans,	McClelland,	Wise,
Farnsworth,	Norris,	Worthington.
Fox,	Peck,

The PRESIDENT: There are seventy-eight members who have answered to their names.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I want to call attention to the fact that eighty-six members promised to be here this morning.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The PRESIDENT: The second reading of proposals, and the first thing in order is Proposal No. 134.

Mr. HALENKAMP: If there be no objection we would like to have this informally passed, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT: If there be no objection the proposal will be informally passed and the next business in order is Proposal No. 227.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I move that that be informally passed and retain its place on the calendar.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 16—Mr. Elson.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Athens, the author of the proposal, is not present, and I think this matter ought to be informally passed on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT: If there is no objection the proposal will be informally passed. The next will be Proposal No. 15—Mr. Riley.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. RILEY: Mr. President and Gentlemen: I am somewhat taken by surprise that this matter should come up this morning and I have been almost persuaded by my friends not to go into the matter now, but it is something of such self-evident merit that I think it is safe to submit it to a majority of the Convention at any time.

If there is any one thing that there is universal complaint about it is the law's delays and especially the delays and failures to prosecute indictments for crime. Our governor was present some time ago and called attention to some of the features of this proposal, but the proposal had been before the committee for quite a time before he spoke.

There was a time when those charged with crime had no sort of a show for a fair trial. That time happily passed long ago and we went to the other extreme of regarding criminals with great tenderness, entirely too much so to accomplish the ends of justice.

Every presumption has always been, and we do not object to that rule continuing, in favor of one charged with crime. The presumption of innocence attaches until the person is clearly proved guilty. I would not have that otherwise. But we have in this country utterly failed in the prosecution of criminals as compared with other countries. Statistics have been furnished on this floor since the Convention met showing these facts, but I am not disposed to call attention to them. A very small per cent of those charged with crime, and who are undoubtedly guilty, are punished. This is because of the laxity of our laws and the extreme liberality shown to those accused of crime. Right here in this proposal is one thing which illustrates what I had in mind. For a long time it has been possible for a person charged with crime in any degree to take depositions, but there has been no provision in Ohio for depositions to be taken on behalf of the state under any circumstances. We do not propose to change the rule that the defendant shall be brought face to face with his accusers, but we do think where it is possible the state should be allowed to take depositions in this state, and if possible, with safety, beyond the state, though this does not refer to that matter. It will be possible to secure such testimony by arrangement with sister states and it may be possible to take the defendant across the state line, but this provision ought to be enacted whether that arrangement can be made or not, because it often happens that there are witnesses whose testimony could be taken if the defendant could be taken to the place, from the court house, and be confronted with the witnesses, where the testimony could not be secured, if they cannot be brought to court on account of the physical condition of the witness.

I remember a few years ago, when a witness who had been shot by the defendant was taken into the court room and testified when the witness could not have gone any distance and the defendant would have been acquitted if the witness could not have testified. So the first provision in this proposal is to provide for the taking of depositions on behalf of the state when the defendant's presence can be procured so as to comply with the old rule of bringing the defendant face to face with his accusers.

Another provision of this proposal that was not in my original proposal was taken from a proposal submitted by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. BOWDLE], and it is this: "No person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel."

The rule has been in this state for a long while—I do not know how many years—that the defendant in a felony case could testify for himself. I know that in some of the neighboring states it is a comparatively new proposition, passed within twenty or twenty-five years. It was formerly the rule that a defendant was not permitted to testify, but since he has been permitted to testify it has been a matter of choice with the defendant whether he would testify. If he does not testify, the rule has been inflexible that no comment shall be made by the prosecution on his failure to testify. Now there is no good reason for that rule in my judgment. If he fails to testify I have never been able to see any reason why the fact might not be commented upon. It may be truly said in many cases where there was a doubt the defendant had it in his power to make clear what his counsel said was doubtful, and if the defendant will not do it on the stand it seems to me that is a fact that should be held against him in such a case and the comment on that fact would be proper.

My proposal as originally drawn modifies the last clause of this proposal, because this re-enacts a section of the bill of rights, and copies, in line 27, the words "no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense." I propose to ask the Convention to amend this clause by making an exception there in the case of a failure to convict by error of law. If a defendant is found guilty he may have a new trial. He may make a motion in arrest of judgment. He may take his case through the courts, to the supreme court of the state, once or twice, or as often as convicted, but where a verdict of "not guilty" is rendered in favor of the defendant the rule is he shall not be again put in jeopardy, no matter what the nature of the trial at which he was acquitted. My original proposal provided that, if the acquittal was procured by fraud, perjury or bribery or misinstruction of the court, he should not be considered as having been in jeopardy, but might be retried. That was the matter the governor referred to when he addressed us and suggested that there might well be a provision for a new trial, and why not? Why should there not be even-handed justice? Why should not the interest of the public be considered as well as the interest of the criminal? If the courts err—and every judge knows, and every lawyer and almost every layman knows, that judges are liable to make mistakes, and do make mistakes—and if they do make a mistake in favor of the defendant why should not the defendant be detained and the prosecutor have an opportunity to take the case to the supreme court, if need be, and have that error corrected and the man put on trial and have justice done? So in proper time I propose to offer to so amend that for error of law there may be a new trial. I read this morning from Colorado—and that is the only state that has taken that step—that in Colorado they have made that provision, not only for taking depositions, but also that for error of law a new trial can be granted to the state, and that the defendant in such cases should not be considered as having been in jeopardy. Now I do not deem it necessary to detain you further at this time.

Mr. ROEHM: You say the amendment you propose to make to this proposal has been adopted in Colorado?

Mr. RILEY: Yes.

Mr. ROEHM: Has the United States supreme court construed that provision?

Mr. RILEY: I am not certain whether the United States supreme court has construed the provision or not, but the United States courts have construed many such provisions. The provision of the constitution of the United States that no person shall be put twice in jeopardy refers to the practice of the United States courts and the trials under United States laws, and has no reference to our state trials. This has been many times so decided.

Mr. KRAMER: I want to ask a question with reference to the matter of taking depositions. Do you think it would work any hardship on the accused, remembering that two-thirds of the criminals or those charged with crime have no means, if they were compelled to go into different parts, even, of their own state?

Mr. RILEY: They are authorized to take depositions now.

Mr. KRAMER: But if the state were to compel them to go into different parts of the state?

Mr. RILEY: The state would see to it that the defendant is taken. He would be if charged with murder.

Mr. KRAMER: But take this case, where he has no right to be furnished an attorney. Would it work any hardship?

Mr. RILEY: I have not known a murder case or a felony case tried without an attorney for the defendant.

Mr. KRAMER: But below that the state does not furnish an attorney. Now wouldn't it be likely to work a hardship on the accused in those cases in which the state can not furnish him with an attorney?

Mr. RILEY: You assume that the state can not do something that it always does.

Mr. KRAMER: Not below felonies?

Mr. RILEY: This does not apply to anything below felonies.

Mr. KRAMER: I guess that is right.

Mr. STILWELL: What was the amendment you suggested?

Mr. RILEY: In line 27, that when a defendant is acquitted on error of law there may be a retrial and he shall not be considered as being in jeopardy.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: What has the proposal now about jeopardy?

Mr. RILEY: We simply copy the provision in the present constitution because we are amending the entire section, section 10 of article I, and we are copying all except the new matter and that is in italics in this proposal I believe.

Mr. PECK: Why not prepare and present your amendment about twice in jeopardy?

Mr. RILEY: I will do that. Mr. Pettit has one substantially in the form I desire.

Mr. NYE: I see you provide in the taking of depositions the accused shall meet the witnesses face to face. Suppose the man charged with crime and under indictment is unable to give bail, and you want to take depositions out of the state; how would you manage to have the defendant meet the witnesses face to face?

Mr. RILEY: We could not take the depositions out of the state without taking the defendant out of the state, and that could not be done with safety unless some arrangements were made between the authorities of the different states and this state, but this proposal ought to be passed without reference to that, because it often happens within the state, in the same county perhaps, that there is an absent witness whose testimony is needed.

A DELEGATE: What is the object of putting in line 25 there, "but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel?" Is there anything in the present constitution that prevents that?

Mr. FITZSIMONS: Yes.

Mr. RILEY: If there is not it is in the statute. There is such a rule in force now.

Mr. MAUCK: Has not the clause, "no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself" been construed so as not to permit any comment on the fact that he fails to testify?

Mr. RILEY: That is where it comes in.

Mr. WOODS: Is it not a fact that where the defendant does not take the stand, if the prosecutor refers to it in any way in his argument to the jury, it is error and the case is reversed?

Mr. RILEY: Most assuredly, and this ought to be written in here. That is the very reason.

Mr. BOWDLE: I offered a proposal here which is the last part of the Riley proposal referred to, but the Judiciary committee thought it wise to incorporate my proposal in the Riley proposal, and, of course, I assented. This is a subject in which I have been rather deeply interested for some years. I suppose no matter how we are labeled in this Convention, whether whig or tory, radical, progressive or reactionary, we are all identified in this one thing, that we desire to get ahead. I should like to aid a little in this, making the common sense of the street the common sense of the court room. Of course we know that the common sense of the street is today not the common sense of the court room, that when a man goes from the street into a court room an opaque curtain is rung down between the personality of the street and the personality of the court room and when he gets into the court room he loses his street personality and common sense. If judges and jurors, spectators and counsel really preserved in the court room the personality they have on the street, no trial could be conducted, because we should all break down with laughter.

It is not conceivable that the common sense of the street can become the common sense of the court room unless constitutional conventions of various states will aid a little in this respect, and this proposal of mine was introduced in a spirit to help us all move on and up.

In the olden times, when there were hundreds of crimes punishable with death, they had the jack and the thumb screws in order to extort all sorts of confessions, some of which were true and some false, and when we set up shop on this side of the Atlantic, in our effort to stand straight we fell over backwards, and we went to the extreme, and said that not only should a man not be compelled to testify against himself, but the slightest reference to the fact that he had not testified should be reversible error in the court above. It is just as though I should go home and somebody should accuse my secretary of having stolen from the cash box—which usually contains very little—and I ask the secretary about it, and the secretary would say, "Now under the law of which you are an apostle, I am presumed to be innocent until I am proved guilty. Therefore I am innocent because I have not been proven guilty under the constitution. I can not be compelled to testify against myself, and therefore, being presumed to be innocent and not being required to testify against myself, and not being required to answer your question, I stand before you as a blameless person."

Of course, if we were not too high up I should fire the secretary through the window for a speech like that, and yet that is precisely what goes on in our legal affairs. A great pork-packer, with a triple chin, accused of an infraction of law, can cross his legs in the court room and say not a word, and deny to the court and the jury the right to draw any conclusion from that silence, although he may not be laboring under any mental or physical disqualification. That is what we want to get away from. We can not compel the accused to take the witness stand, but we can at least smoke him out, by a process of allowing the court and counsel to do that which the court and counsel can not now do—by allowing them to draw conclusions from his failure to testify and comment upon those conclusions.

The bar has not been so backward in this matter. All over this country from time to time lawyers and judges have spoken as to the obsolescence of the present system of things. Here is a pamphlet on "The Duty to Obey the Law," an address by Justice Rousseau A. Burch, of the Kansas supreme court. The address was delivered at a state conference of county attorneys of Kansas. He says:

Attention has been called to the fact that laws and institutions suffer in the estimation of the people because, having been established for conditions now outgrown, they resist their own improvement too long and are inadequate to meet the needs which social progress has evolved. A single illustration from the criminal law may be considered. Many a guilty man escapes punishment, to the confusion and humiliation of the law and order forces, because he can not be required to testify, and because, as a corollary, his failure to testify cannot be considered to his prejudice. The prosecution must disclose everything to him. The names of all known material witnesses for the state must be indorsed on the indictment or information at the time it is filed. The accused then sits by until the last item of evidence against him has been introduced at the trial, when he springs a defense carefully prepared to suit the exigencies of the case, or, if he chooses, remains silent while the court in solemn phrase instructs the jury that he is presumed to be innocent of every element of the offense charged against him and that no inference can be drawn from his failure to testify. The existing rules had their origin in humane efforts to protect unhappy prisoners who had no counsel, who could not testify at the trial and who could not appeal, from star-chamber practices and from the barbarities of a penal system which is now regarded with feelings of horror. At the present time there is no valid reason why a person charged with crime should not be required by law to testify at any stage of the proceeding precisely the same as any other witness with knowledge of the facts. Should a defendant decline to testify at the preliminary examination he should be denied the privilege of doing so at the trial, and a refusal to be examined at any time should raise the presumption that the evidence withheld would be incriminating.

Depositions by State and Comment on Failure to Testify in Criminal Cases."

Justice Burch is not alone in this view.

It is very interesting to observe how all the republics on this side of the Atlantic, when they set up shop, followed the declaration of Massachusetts and New York. Take up the constitutions of South America, and every one of them was so impressed with the language that each one, with the single exception of Brazil, copied what New York had used, but they went ahead and amplified a little. In the republics of Ecuador and Peru they provide that not only shall a witness not be required to testify against himself for any criminal offense, but this privilege extends to substantially every member of his family. They carried it really further than members of the family. The constitution of Ecuador provides:

No husband or wife shall be compelled to testify against each other in a criminal case. No person shall be forced to testify against his relations, whether in the ascending, descending or collateral line within the fourth civil degree of blood relationship or the second degree of affinity.

So nobody in the entire family can be asked to take the stand. In Peru it is precisely the same, and likewise in Bolivia. Argentina broke away from that and confines the privilege to the accused himself, but it was all done pursuant to that parrot-like element in human nature that influenced them to believe, when we of the North set up our government successfully, and had this in our constitution; that they had to do the same thing.

I have a number of pamphlets by distinguished lawyers throughout the country on this subject and all to the same purpose.

Mr. STEVENS: Is that privilege extended in South America as a privilege of the witness or a right of the accused? That is, can the accused ask that the witness be not called?

Mr. BOWDLE: I really do not know. I simply know that they can not be required to testify.

Brazil, taking her jurisprudence from Portugal, has not the provision. The republic of Mexico, getting her jurisprudence from the Code Napoleon, left out anything of that sort.

In Mexico we have this situation: Instead of making the right of silence a constitutional guaranty, they seem to assume that a man has the right to talk, and they give him the privilege of having his preparatory statement made in seventy-two hours.

Mr. ROEHM: Does not that privilege or right look as though those republics down there had intended to encourage murder to prevent revolution?

Mr. BOWDLE: Yes, and the murder mill has been running as rapidly down there as here. It operates day and night ceaselessly.

Mr. KILPATRICK: Do you say the failure of the defendant to testify can be considered by the court? In your opinion how would you have the court to consider that? It is charged to the jury, and if he does not consider it in his charge to the jury where would he consider it?

Mr. BOWDLE: I take it it would simply mean that the court may consider it as a fact and may speak of that fact to the jury. To what extent the court might be allowed to interpret the fact beyond saying that the man has failed to take the stand and appears to be laboring under no disability, I can not say, but conclusions might be drawn from the silence and those conclusions might be stated by counsel to the jury. Of course if the witness is laboring under any disability, it would not be proper to refer to his silence, and his disability might be explained.

Mr. HALFHILL: What would we do with a case like this, where the evidence is purely circumstantial evidence? Would not the court charge that one circumstance taken with another circumstance must so co-ordinate toward the guilt of the accused that the jury could not reach any conclusion based on other than a hypothesis of guilt? Would that be proper?

Mr. BOWDLE: I think so.

Mr. HALFHILL: In other words, if those circumstances were consistent with any theory of innocence the judge would charge that the defendant would have to be acquitted?

Mr. BOWDLE: Precisely.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now, in a case like that, where it was purely circumstantial evidence, and the man was innocent, but could not explain it, would not he be in a desperate situation if the prosecuting attorney would mercilessly flay him because he kept silent?

Mr. BOWDLE: He might avoid that merciless flaying by frankly and honestly getting on the witness stand and submitting himself, as an honest man should, to the ordinary processes of examination and cross-examination, and I can not see why he would suffer thereby.

Mr. HALFHILL: But circumstantial evidence forms a piece of chain as it were, one, two or three links, and a man might be wholly unable to explain one and two, but still could explain three, but in explaining the third he would put himself beyond the rule.

Mr. BOWDLE: He could enjoy the privilege of saying he could not possibly explain those circumstances if he is in such a curious predicament as that.

Mr. HALFHILL: Have you considered the other part of the proposal about taking depositions?

Mr. BOWDLE: I have really given little attention to that, save only as one of the members of the Judiciary committee, listening to elaborate discussions that went on there.

Mr. HALFHILL: Did the constitutions of South America have anything on that point?

Mr. BOWDLE: No, sir; and for the ordinary and usual reason that in South American countries people are not given to rapid travel as in this country and can not easily remove from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. That is probably the way that is accounted for.

Depositions by State and Comment on Failure to Testify in Criminal Cases.

Mr. HALFHILL: Would you not think one charged with a felony, if he were transported beyond the state to meet his witnesses, ought to have his expenses paid by the state?

Mr. BOWDLE: I would think the legislature in elaborating a scheme pursuant to the powers given by this proposal might fairly and justly arrange for some sort of method by which the accused and his counsel could go to the point where the evidence is to be taken. We have today a practical and thoroughly barbarous way of evading, by the notorious third degree, the present constitutional privilege given to the accused person. The police get hold of a man accused of some first-class crime and, knowing he can take refuge in utter silence, they endeavor by all sorts of devious sweating processes to get him to say something, which amounts to a confession, which can be used against him, so that having uttered some word that looks like a confession, the police can take the stand themselves and thus challenge him to come out by producing on the witness stand what looks on the face of things like a confession. That has happened every day in the big cities, and it has become a subject of congressional investigation. All of that will be avoided if you create a condition of things in the constitution that will require the defendant to come into the light of day and take his place on the witness stand and state his version of what has occurred or what is alleged to have occurred.

Mr. OKEY: In the proposal you offered to the Judiciary committee the wording was a little different from what it is now?

Mr. BOWDLE: Yes.

Mr. OKEY: You had it, "may be regarded by the court and jury as a fact"?

Mr. BOWDLE: And the words "as a fact" in that proposal are cut out.

Mr. DWYER: Only the right of comment was allowed.

Mr. BOWDLE: I did not agree with the committee then and I do not agree with it now, but I do not know that the matter is worth talking about. Of course it is a legal fact.

Mr. DWYER: Would it not have to be considered in some way and how would it be considered?

Mr. BOWDLE: It would be considered as a fact, as a negative fact. It is not competent, of course, for court or counsel to consider anything but facts. Facts may be of two kinds, positive and negative. His failure to testify is a negative fact. I had worded my proposal to include what Judge Okey indicates, that the failure of the accused to testify may be considered as a fact in evidence, and it was thought wise to strike out "as a fact in evidence" and it was left out and made to read "considered by the court and counsel."

Mr. REDINGTON: In regard to depositions, do you not think we could provide some way by which the officers can take the accused from the state to take depositions?

Mr. BOWDLE: That is one of the things that is, so to speak, up to the legislature. The legislature must get to work if it sees fit to exercise the powers conferred on it and devise some scheme by which, if the depositions are to be taken in a criminal case, they may be taken fairly and justly.

Mr. REDINGTON: If we put into the organic law the right to take depositions how can the legislature abridge the defendant's right in this regard?

Mr. PECK: The right of the defendant to take depositions below now exists.

Mr. BOWDLE: There is an excellent pamphlet by Edward S. Wilson, of the Ohio bar, and I want to read from it at page 5:

This protection of the criminal is furnished by the bill of rights of our Ohio constitution, the amendment, improvement, or reconstruction of which should be a part of our most serious purpose. President Taft said in a recent address: "The administration of the criminal law is a disgrace to our civilization." Shall we not do something to remove that disgrace, and make our country as free from crime as Spain, Russia or Italy, not to speak of England, France and Germany?

The sanctity of this bill of rights is built upon its antiquity—a weak and fragile basis upon which to construct human progress. All the exactions of the bill of rights, so far as the treatment of crime is concerned, is contrived to meet a condition that no longer exists. Two hundred years ago, there were one hundred and seventy capital crimes; then we needed to protect the individual against society; now, we need to protect society against the individual. We are not doing it. The statistics of crime prove that beyond doubt.

So fixed and arrogant had become these old dogmas, that men have revered them almost as divine decrees. But lately there is a tide against the ancient fetish and able men are denouncing it with eloquence and power. The old doctrine of the presumption of innocence is losing much of its force as a result of its misuse and prostitution, but upon this controversial feature of the problem I do not dwell here, preferring to speak of things about which there should be but little, if any, controversy.

Mr. HALFHILL: The difficulty I have always observed those encounter who approach the bill of rights with the idea that it guarantees too many rights, and who are of the belief that it should be abolished altogether, because it is a relic of ancient days, is the fact that there are at least three classes of criminals that come before the court. Now, if we could abolish all of the bill of rights as against one class of criminals it would be a good thing.

One of these classes of criminals embraces those who are surely enemies of society. They are criminal by nature or by instinct, or as the result of environment and training. At least they belong to the criminal class. They are the kind of human beings who in the event of a great catastrophe, like a fire, flood or earthquake, go out and plunder the dead. They ought to be shot on sight. There is a great number of that kind of people in the world, and the constant fight between the police, representing organized society, and the confirmed criminal is a thing that every good citizen tries to help by taking the side of organized society as against the criminal class. It is well enough at all times to keep that class in mind.

But there is another class that are criminals by accident or environment, and many of them are young. They are the class of criminals which the great philanthropists try to help and which men like Judge Lindsey spend their lives in trying to start on the right path and in trying to reform, so that they may be brought back and made good citizens.

There is yet another class that is not criminal at all, but they are charged with crime, and no man of experience at the bar or any place else who has lived to about the half century mark, has failed to observe where good citizens have been charged with crime and sometimes heinous crime. It is a condition like that that the bill of rights intends to reach to and protect, but unfortunately, in reaching to and protecting the good man who is unfortunately placed, it gives too much latitude to the bad man who belongs to the criminal class. One of the most heartrending things I have ever encountered in the world was to stand by a man that I believed to be innocent and who was proved to be innocent in the end, though it took years to do it; and yet public opinion at the time, especially if the bill of rights had unshackled and let loose all the force of the law, would have confined this man to durance vile. Those are the situations that confront anybody that observes these things. If you could amend the bill of rights so as to reach the criminal and yet protect the rights of those unfortunates charged with being criminals, but who are innocent, I would be in favor of it.

Mr. BOWDLE: Has it not been your uniform observation that innocent men charged with crime uniformly do not fail to take the stand and uniformly do not seek the protection of the bill of rights?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have observed cases and tried cases and have defended cases where it was impossible for an innocent man to take the stand by virtue of circumstantial evidence in the case, and although they are not numerous, I have cases of that kind in mind, and they have caused me to have possibly too great a regard for the bill of rights. It may be that I prize it too much, but I want to be sure of protecting the rights of innocent men that are wrongfully charged.

But now I think this idea suggested here of the right of the state to take depositions ought to be further modified so that if the state does take depositions there will be no question that it would transport the one who is charged to the place where the deposition is taken, because I have seen innocent men from other states put in prison in this state, even where counsel had to be appointed for them and where juries have eventually acquitted them, that could not possibly have been able to confront the witnesses unless the state furnished the means.

Mr. OKEY: Do you think it is possible for us to provide in our constitution anything that would enable us to take depositions out of the state?

Mr. HALFHILL: I think we could. We could pass a constitutional provision broad enough to allow depositions in criminal cases before a notary public or justice of the peace in any other state on notice, just the same as a civil case.

Mr. OKEY: What would you do with the criminal after he is out of the state?

Mr. HALFHILL: You mean, is it feasible to take the criminal out of the state?

Mr. STILWELL: In order to meet the witnesses.

Mr. HALFHILL: You mean that he might be released after taken out of our jurisdiction?

Mr. OKEY: Yes; under habeas corpus proceedings.

Mr. HALFHILL: That might be permissible under our system of government. It might be that there is insuperable objection to the provision. I do not know.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL], how are you going to compel the attendance of witnesses in a foreign state to take testimony provided you once get there?

Mr. HALFHILL: Of course that is a very pertinent inquiry. It would be impossible to compel the witness in a foreign state unless by treaty the courts of that state would issue some order directing the attendance of the witnesses before the officer.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then our constitutional provision would be perfectly worthless unless the other forty-seven states would recognize it to the extent of compelling the attendance of witnesses when we desired them?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes; I think so. There would perhaps have to be something like treaty relations with the other states. I think that is what it would lead to.

Mr. MAUCK: Has any treaty been necessary to take depositions in civil cases or for the defense in criminal cases heretofore?

Mr. HALFHILL: No.

Mr. MAUCK: If not, why would any treaty be necessary to take depositions in behalf of the state?

Mr. HALFHILL: I can not say it would be necessary, but in taking depositions as you take them now you are compelled to secure a commission from the court here to somebody in the other state, appointing him as commissioner to take those depositions, or you are compelled to go to the executive or to the courts of another state and get authority issued to some official in that state to subpoena the witnesses and secure their testimony. You have to do that now.

Mr. MAUCK: Do you mean to suggest that there is a state in the Union that does not provide for the taking of depositions before some proper officer?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have not heard of such a total failure as that existing in any state as to civil cases, but the methods for securing such testimony are cumbersome.

Mr. MAUCK: Why would you suggest the treaty as necessary because we extend the mere rule of evidence in Ohio?

Mr. HALFHILL: I used the word "treaty" thinking everybody would understand it related to an agreement made between sovereign powers, and it does so relate, and the fact of it is that the states of the Union are sovereign powers in relation to surrendering fugitives, and many executives refuse to honor requisitions from other states.

Mr. MAUCK: Still it might be true that it would be inexpedient to take a man from jail and send him over in custody of an officer lest he might be taken under writ of habeas corpus, but would that at all exist where you are taking depositions for the state and the accused is out on bond?

Depositions by State and Comment on Failure to Testify in Criminal Cases.

Mr. HALFHILL: I did not catch that question.

Mr. MAUCK: You have said that you feared if a man were taken to another state to take depositions against him that he might be taken by habeas corpus proceedings from the custody of the sheriff or whatever officer had charge of him. But suppose the accused person is out on bond. Why not take the depositions against him then? He is at liberty to go to any state if he so desires.

Mr. HALFHILL: I did not say I feared it as a practical thing, but I say it might be done and undoubtedly is done. There are habeas corpus proceedings brought to liberate witnesses in other states frequently, and the conflict has arisen between the United States and different states on numerous occasions.

Mr. MAUCK: That theory could not operate against the public in the case of an accused person out on bond, because he would be at perfect liberty?

Mr. DWYER: The ability to give bond is very rare in those cases. Those people are seldom able to give bond.

Mr. HALFHILL: There is many a man who can not give bond who is an innocent man. Now, if you can modify the bill of rights, reach the criminal class and also protect the man accidentally charged with crime, I am for it; but I am not for this proposal.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: In lines 25 and 26 we have the language, "but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel." How far would that justify a court in charging the jury that the criminal's refusal to testify would create a presumption of his guilt? Would that justify a court in so charging?

Mr. HALFHILL: The court might not go so far as to say it was a presumption of his guilt, but the court might say to the jury, "You may consider all the circumstances in the case, including the circumstances surrounding the prisoner and his appearance and the fact that he did not testify in this case when he had the opportunity to do so." That would amount virtually to an overthrowing of the presumption of innocence.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Might not the legislature provide how far that should extend as a matter of law?

Mr. HALFHILL: As a matter of court procedure it is pretty hard to draft a statute which would control the charge of the court to a jury, if there were such a broad constitutional provision as this authorizing the passage of the statutes. If the provision here were not so broad and more specific of course you could pass the statute which would preserve the right of the defendant as suggested, but this gives all latitude and sweeps away all barriers, according to my way of thinking.

Mr. DWYER: The present law provides that neither court nor counsel can comment on the failure of the defendant to testify.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. DWYER: All we want to put into this proposal is that the court and counsel may comment on that failure.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. DWYER: And it appears to me that is going far enough. Suppose a man is charged with crime and his counsel sees if he puts him on the witness stand the jury will not believe him anyhow because he has a bad record. That record is open to the prosecuting attorney who may go into it and convince the jury that he is guilty. I have known cases where the counsel says, "The defendant has a bad record and has been in the penitentiary; if I put him on the stand, the jury won't believe him, it will expose his record to the prosecuting attorney and it will make a bad impression." There is that dangerous result from it, if you go too far.

Mr. HALFHILL: That is very true, and it is a known fact in the history of English criminal procedure that within the last very few years they have originated the right of review of criminal proceedings. There was a long time that the harsh rule of the common law obtained in the criminal procedure in England, and there was no right of review. Even the charge to the jury could not be reviewed. That practice was done away with only a few years ago in England, and while we are talking about the great number of criminals that escape here under a lax bill of rights do not forget that in England they have changed the law and have given rights of review in criminal cases; and it is said that the first case reviewed was where a man was charged with offering a counterfeit shilling to a barmaid, and having a work-house record and fearing he was again going to be taken in custody, he fled and left the shilling on the bar. He was captured, indicted and convicted, and the reviewing court found the barmaid was not even able to identify the shilling left on the bar, and it was further found the defendant was excluded from showing where he got the shilling he had left on the bar. In other words, he was an innocent man, and under the recently created right of review in criminal cases he was acquitted, and that happened in England within the last decade.

Mr. RILEY: Something like that happens frequently in this country.

Mr. HALFHILL: I am saying the right of review of the first case under the new law in England resulted in the reviewing courts freeing an innocent man, who by the old procedure would have been convicted.

Mr. RILEY: They have adopted the idea of giving the government a chance as well as the defendant.

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; they have adopted our idea of giving a review in a criminal case—that is to say, permitting the prisoner to have his case reviewed, and that did not exist in England until within the last decade.

Mr. PECK: Do they not apply it both ways there, to the crown and to the criminal?

Mr. HALFHILL: I am unable to answer that, but I do know the prisoner never had any right of review until by act of parliament this procedure was humanely changed within the last decade.

Mr. RILEY: Questions have been asked relative to taking the prisoner out of the state, and what might happen if you took a prisoner out of the state to take depositions. Do you see anything in the provision about taking depositions out of the state? There is nothing whatever. I stated a while ago that there is a necessity for this sort of a provision for witnesses in the state and even in the county where the court is sitting. It often happens that you can not get the witness in court. Now why not go out in the county or any place in the state, and why would it not be wise to take prisoners beyond the state to take depositions?

Depositions by State and Comment on Failure to Testify in Criminal Cases.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you intend to have this broad enough so that the state can be permitted to take depositions beyond the state line?

Mr. RILEY: That is my idea, but that is left to the legislature, if you want to "safeguard" it as we have gotten in the habit of doing every thing, it could be done. It certainly could be done anywhere within the limits of the state, and I do not think it is necessary to consider the other matter, as the legislature is not likely to pass a law by which the prisoner can be taken out of the state.

Mr. HALFHILL: I suggest that you prepare that amendment and put it in its proper place. I will be glad to withdraw my objection on that point then.

Mr. PETTIT: I have that amendment prepared and will offer it.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 15 as follows:

By changing the period to a comma, in line 27, and adding the following: "but if the judgment be reversed for error of law, or if judgment be arrested after verdict he shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy."

Mr. PETTIT: I am heartily in accord with the idea incorporated in the proposal of my friend Mr. Bowdle to start with. It is a notorious fact that crime is becoming too rampant, in the state of Ohio especially. We have had a good deal of talk in this Convention about the fact that there were very few men charged with crime that are convicted and it is a good deal on account of conditions existing in connection with the trial. Talking about progress, if we take up isolated cases referred to by my friend from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] we would not have any reform at all. There is a possibility, of course, at some time, of an innocent man's being convicted. I have been connected with a good many criminal cases in my county, murder cases and those of a minor degree, and when I was representing the defense we would stand up and say to the jury, "This man stands here clothed with a mantle of innocence from head to foot and until you prove every single element of crime you can not remove that presumption." Now, under the present system, it makes no difference whether an acquittal is produced by bribery or perjury; if there is a verdict and judgment for the defendant that is the end of it, so far as the state is concerned and so far as the defendant is concerned. But a defendant can take any conviction to the higher court and on the slightest technicality, and sometimes without any reason he gets a new trial. It is all one-sided as the matter stands, and it seems to me if the prisoner has the right to take depositions beyond the state or in the state the state should have the same right and have the defendant there meet the witnesses face to face. I am in accord with that, but I think we ought to go even further than that amendment, because it does not embrace the two matters I spoke of. An acquittal is brought about by bribery or fraud and the state's hands are tied. We may know absolutely when the verdict is brought in that it was produced by bribery or perjury and yet the state has no relief. I submit that is not right. As Mr. Bowdle said, it is time to begin thinking about protecting society from the criminal class.

Mr. FACKLER: Do you not think your language is a little ill chosen? You say, "he shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy." Don't you think it should be "he shall be deemed not to have been in jeopardy?"

Mr. PETTIT: That is grammatical and I accept it as best.

Mr. FESS: Would not the question whether the verdict was secured by perjury or bribery necessitate another trial to establish that? How would that be determined?

Mr. PETTIT: By witnesses. I have a case in my mind that occurred in my county. I am just as well satisfied as I am that I am here that the verdict was secured by bribery. It was one of the worst murder cases ever tried in my county. Judge Sloan was defending the criminal and on the first trial the jury was not out longer than fifteen minutes and came in with the verdict of murder in the first degree. On the second trial there were eleven for conviction on the first ballot, but one man hung the jury. He would stand and look out of the window and everybody knew he was bought to hang that jury and the man was not convicted of murder in the first degree. There should be some remedy.

Now, Judge Dwyer suggested that a man's character may be very bad and he may not want to have the prosecuting attorney bring it in. If the defendant does not put it in issue the state cannot attack it.

Mr. RILEY: Have you accepted the amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER]?

Mr. PETTIT: Yes.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM [Mr. Doty]: That correction has been made by consent of all parties.

Mr. FESS: To this amendment, it seems to me, there is a really serious objection. I believe in the purpose of this amendment fully. I give my hearty indorsement to it with this exception, that it seems to necessitate a second trial or a trial anew to determine whether the verdict was secured by bribery or perjury.

Mr. STILWELL: "De novo?"

Mr. FESS: No; I didn't say that.

Mr. RILEY: That is not in the amendment.

Mr. MAUCK: This amendment by the gentleman from Adams would be entirely wise if it were not entirely unnecessary. The supreme court has decided that when a judgment of conviction has been reversed and a new trial is granted the accused has not been in jeopardy, and where a motion has been made in arrest of the verdict and the motion is sustained, it is virtually held there has been no trial and the accused has never been in jeopardy. The amendment, therefore, is not needed.

Mr. FACKLER: That is true if the verdict below has been a verdict of conviction, but in case there is a verdict of acquittal the state has no right under the law to take it up and get a new trial. The amendment would make it so that the state could go to the higher court and have the judgment set aside and then the state could try it again.

Mr. MAUCK: I did not understand that that was the purport of the amendment. If it is I am against it for another reason, because I think one opportunity is enough for the state against the accused.

Depositions by State and Comment on Failure to Testify in Criminal Cases.

Mr. WOODS: I hope this amendment will be adopted and that this proposal will be adopted.

As to the first proposition, that the defendant can sit in court and be represented there by the attorney and never take the witness stand nor say a word to throw any light upon the matter being tried, and then that the prosecutor can not say anything to the jury about it, is ridiculous. I think we all admit it is ridiculous. The prosecutor ought to be allowed to say anything to the jury about the fact that the defendant is sitting there and knows more about the facts than anybody else, and yet can sit there and not say a word and the prosecutor can not refer to it. I have tried many cases and I have had to dodge around and shy around that and get as close as possible.

Mr. PRICE: If a defendant took the stand, would he not open up all the conduct of his life? Suppose he has been a bad man and has been guilty of several crimes and has been sent to the penitentiary, would not that come out? And suppose he is innocent of the present charge, would he not be justified in remaining in his seat? Now to what extent are you going to allow the prosecuting attorney to comment on the fact that he remains in his seat?

Mr. WOODS: That may be taken care of by statute. A statute might be drawn and this might be abused, but I say it is ridiculous that the prosecutor should not have a right to call the attention of the jury to the fact that the man who knows more about the affair than anybody else will not take the stand to say anything.

Mr. PRICE: Why should he be compelled to take it?

Mr. WOODS: He knows more than anybody else, and why not compel him?

Mr. STILWELL: Suppose he is innocent and doesn't know anything?

Mr. WOODS: Yes, but just the same you can not imagine a case where you or I would be charged with crime, and where, if we were innocent, we would not be glad to stand and tell the jury that we were innocent. Of course, if we were guilty we might not want to take the stand.

Mr. HALFHILL: You don't have to imagine those cases. They actually occur in everybody's experience and can be cited.

Mr. BOWDLE: In your long experience, how many innocent men accused of any crime have taken refuge behind this silence?

Mr. HALFHILL: A whole lot. [Laughter]. What was that question?

Mr. BOWDLE: In your experience how many innocent men accused of crime have taken refuge behind silence?

Mr. HALFHILL: Oh, I didn't understand your question.

Mr. PETTIT: The member from Perry [Mr. PRICE] said that a man might have a bad record and for that reason he might be slow about going into the witness box. If he has a good character he can prove that.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. PETTIT: There is one thing in our criminal trial that is absolutely wrong, and this proposal does not take care of it. If the man has a good reputation he is going to refer to it. He may be the worst man in the state and the prosecutor can not show anything against him unless he opens up the door himself.

Mr. PRICE: Is it not a prejudice to open the door?

Mr. PETTIT: No, sir; it is not a prejudice that will injure an innocent man.

Mr. PECK: In this matter of a person taking the stand he is the same as any other witness?

Mr. PETTIT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: And is it not true that the court in this matter of cross-examining witnesses as to collateral matters, as to previous conduct, etc., has entire discretion in the matter and the judge can regulate that and cut it off whenever it is being abused?

Mr. PETTIT: Absolutely.

Mr. PECK: And the prosecutor has no right to ask such questions except by permission of the judge?

Mr. PETTIT: And the judge on the bench will protect the defendant every time. The defendant has the right to go into the character of all the witnesses against him.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do I understand the purport of the amendment offered by the member from Adams is to give the state a chance to attempt the second trial of a man once found innocent by a jury?

Mr. PETTIT: Yes; if that judgment is reversed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not know what you lawyers are going to do, but we laymen will not vote for any such proposition.

Mr. WOODS: I can cite you a case that I have here in the supreme court. I helped the prosecutor in my county try a case this winter and the judge ordered that jury to acquit the defendant. We came to the court with a prosecutor's exceptions to have that statute determined. If the supreme court holds we were right, and that that man was guilty, he has gone scot free, and we cannot try him again unless we get another case like that. If the court holds we were right, why should not the state have a right to put the man on trial again? The defendant has the right, and why should the state not have it? I believe in giving every man a fair trial, and giving him every presumption he now has, and I believe in making the state prove beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the crime, but when you have done that you have given him a fair show. If a man is found innocent by a jury and it turns out afterwards that the jury was bribed, or something like that, and the verdict of acquittal was brought about by that means, you cannot try him again, and that certainly is a miscarriage of justice. Why not correct it?

Mr. WINN: If, for a moment, I believed that this amendment offered by the member from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] would result in allowing the prosecution to go to a reviewing court by error proceedings, reverse a verdict of acquittal and then have a retrial, I could not find language sufficiently strong to express my opinion against it. To say such a proposition is monstrous is putting it too mildly.

In the trial of criminal cases there are many things. The court says to the jury that when this man was accused and presented by indictment the law put around him a presumption of innocence. The law never clothed any man with a presumption of innocence, but upon the contrary, when a grand jury of twelve men have convened behind closed doors, and after an inquisition or examination into his guilt or innocence have brought into the court an indictment, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a presumption of guilt is immediately established in the minds of the average man. Take the cases pending against these men recently. How many on the floor of this Convention didn't immediately think they were guilty?

Mr. WOODS: Is it not a fact that when you impanel a jury the trial judge and the attorney for the defendant have a right to ask every one of those men whether they have any presumption that the man is guilty?

Mr. WINN: Yes, and our humane statute says that no difference what may be the opinion of the juror, if in answer to the trial court he says, "Notwithstanding my opinion I will render an impartial verdict," he is a qualified juror. No one need tell me about those things. Since this Convention met the state board of pardons filed with the governor a recommendation for the pardon of a prisoner who has been confined in the penitentiary for eleven years. This recommendation by the board is based upon the ground that the prisoner in question was convicted upon perjured testimony and the board of pardons reached that conclusion after a careful and thorough consideration of the case extending over a period of eighteen months. The record and files of the case with the recommendation of the board of pardons are now in the hands of the governor awaiting his examination and action thereon.

Mr. WOODS: You are opposed in the case of an acquittal to the state having another trial?

Mr. WINN: Certainly.

Mr. WOODS: Suppose a man is acquitted and it turns out that that verdict was based upon perjured testimony. Has there been a trial of that proposition?

Mr. WINN: It does not take a lawyer to see the fallacy of that suggestion. How are you going to determine whether or not he was acquitted upon perjured testimony? That means a trial of the question of whether the witness has testified truthfully or falsely, and then after that you would go into another court.

Mr. PETTIT: A point of order. That has nothing to do with the amendment and is not before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. WINN: After having determined that question, the question might be brought up whether that determination was arrived at by perjured testimony. I see it is not in this proposal, but it was originally in the proposal, and I am astounded that a lawyer who has given any attention to criminal practice would think of such a thing as putting that in this proposal.

But now on this other matter; suppose the court says finally to the jury, "The fact that this man has not taken the witness stand shall not be considered by you." That is a fiction. Do you believe there ever sat twelve men in a jury box, where a man did not take the stand in his own behalf, that the jury did not consider that fact? If it were possible for the law to say, "Wherever a guilty man has failed to take the witness stand, there shall not be any objection to referring to that," it would be all right, but think of the hundreds of cases where some weak man or weak woman or child, by advice of a lawyer, refrains from taking the witness stand because counsel knows how dangerous it will be for that frail man or weak woman or child to commit himself or herself to cross-examination by skilled counsel on the other side!

Mr. KRAMER: I want to ask the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] a question.

The PRESIDENT: The time of the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] has expired.

Mr. KRAMER: I just intended to ask, does he think when a judgment of acquittal is reversed and a case retried, that that is monstrous? That is all it can mean. It cannot mean anything else. It simply means that the strong arm of the state is on one side and a weak man on the other, and he can be dragged to the supreme court and back again, just as any other case can be taken there. I should say it is monstrous to say that a weak man or a weak criminal, or a man charged with crime, can be dragged from one court to another and a judgment of acquittal reversed, and be dragged back again to the court of common pleas and retried upon some technical error in the law.

Mr. WOODS: You don't think he could be dragged into the supreme court?

Mr. KRAMER: Certainly; if the prosecutor takes the case there, he takes it on a prosecutor's bill, and the court, at the instance of the county, appoints a lawyer.

Mr. PETTIT: I think the matter is all one-sided. If the defendant is convicted the state furnishes him a transcript and a lawyer.

Mr. KRAMER: But if he is declared to be innocent by the jury the state has no right to say that that man who has been declared innocent shall lie under that charge for four or five years by taking him up to the supreme court and then back to the common pleas court again. I say it is monstrous, and in order to test the feeling of the Convention, I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] on the table.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded, taken, and resulted—yeas 54, nays 15, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Beatty, Morrow,	Harbarger,	Moore,
Brown, Pike,	Harris, Hamilton,	Nye,
Campbell,	Harter, Stark,	Peck,
Cody,	Henderson,	Peters,
Collett,	Hoffman,	Pierce,

So the amendment was tabled.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Hamilton.

Depositions by State and Comment on Failure to Testify in Criminal Cases.

Mr. STEWART: I move the previous question.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Hamilton was recognized.

Mr. PECK: Is there any other amendment pending?

The PRESIDENT: No.

Mr. PECK: Then we are on the proposal as recommended by the committee.

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: Gentlemen of the Convention: This proposal was for a long time under consideration by the Judiciary committee. The number of the proposal is 15, and it was one of the first that came to us, and we had it under consideration for two months. At last, after long consideration, we reported it in its present form. Personally I think it is a good proposal as it now stands, and that it ought to be adopted. We had a great deal of difficulty with this very amendment that has just been voted down. We finally, among ourselves, by a bare majority, rejected the amendment that has just been voted down, and the proposal was sent to you in the way it appears in the books. As I said to you the number of the proposal is 15, and the amended proposal is just ahead of the other one.

There are two or three propositions in it that are important. The first is about taking depositions. I do not see any objection to that at all as it stands. I doubt if it is feasible to take depositions out of the state, or whether the general assembly can make any arrangement to do so, but if it is not, it is feasible within the state, and to that extent the relief should be given. This thing of having criminals escape by reason of testimony not being produced in court happens too frequently. Sometimes the testimony is in the state and could be procured by this procedure and ought to be had. Now there is no doubt in the world that the criminal procedure of this country needs speeding up. There is no greater reproach to American jurisprudence than the present condition of criminal misuse and administration. The whole machinery is to acquit. Everybody's sympathy is worked up for the poor prisoner. We hear it now from those who are in the habit of appearing on that side of the case. That is one of the difficulties here. We have too many men whose minds are prejudiced from the fact that they have been in the habit of defending criminals. They have cases now pending, and we are told about them. Obviously the mind of that delegate is prejudiced by that and other similar cases. He never sees the other side of the matter. Now here is our friend from Medina who sees the prosecutor's side, and he is inclined perhaps to see too much of that side, and to go too far on that side.

Mr. HALFHILL: Agreed.

Mr. PECK: Yes, you are agreeing there, but not when I refer to the other side. That is the trouble with the arrangement. In every bar there will be fifty lawyers who are in the habit of defending and only one prosecutor. There are fifty who see it from the side of the defense and only one from the side of the state, and for that reason it is almost impossible to get anything done for the state. The fifty are opposed to anything because their precious clients may not get out and they cannot get fresh fees.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is not that so in every lawsuit, civil as well as criminal, that the counsel are prejudiced on their side of the case?

Mr. PECK: Yes, but they are on different sides of the case civilly. They vary. One time they are for the plaintiff, and the next time for the defendant, but in criminal cases you are on one side all the time. You are always for the defendant.

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; I have been appointed to help the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. PECK: Maybe you were when you first got admitted, and were kind of practicing, and they threw you a case to give you a fee or two. Then you may have been advocating the pleas of the state, but you haven't been many times since.

Mr. HALFHILL: I have been appointed several times to assist the prosecutor in important cases.

Mr. PECK: That is unusual. All the prosecutors are regularly elected, and are regularly paid prosecutors, and all the rest of the bar is against the prosecution, and so get more or less prejudice in favor of the defendant. That is true of a majority of the bar in this state. In England the prosecutors are selected from term to term from the bar. One time a man may be a prosecutor, and the next time he may be for the defense, and the prejudice is not always one way there, and they get a better system than we do. They see it from both sides. Here our attorneys see it from only one side, generally the side of the prisoner, and they are afflicted with the same conservatism that afflicts the bar in everything that pertains to their precious practice. In the matter of depositions there is no reason why depositions should not be taken by the state when the defendant's presence can be had.

Mr. STILWELL: Do you not think, Judge, that it would be wise to add at the end of line 26 "as may be provided by law"? That refers to the right of the prosecutor to comment upon the fact that the defendant does not take the witness stand.

Mr. PECK: That would simply permit the legislature to nullify the law, and under the leadership of the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] and others they would probably proceed to do it, and I am opposed to that.

I do not think anybody can find any reasonable objection to this matter of taking depositions. Now I want to say, in order to save this proposition, if there is any part that can be carried, I shall ask that it be divided, and shall ask a separate vote on each of the propositions contained in it.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member ask for a division of the question at this time?

Mr. PECK: No; not now.

The PRESIDENT: The chair will take note of the fact that the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] has demanded a division of the question.

Mr. PECK: Now about the last three lines, "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself?" That is a repetition of the present constitutional provision, but it has outworn its usefulness, yet, in deference to the opinions of many other people, I have agreed it should remain. But just a word on that. Whenever anybody in your household is charged with doing anything wrong, who is the first person you interrogate? It is the person charged. So in business transactions, if a man is charged, who is the first person to be put on the witness stand? The man charged. That is the natural mode of procedure, and there is no other system of jurisprudence on earth in any civilized country which prevents it except ours. We have it, and it has come down to us with the wisdom of the fathers, although the wisdom of the fathers may not have a confounded bit of sense in it. Yet it was their wisdom, and we bow to it. But we added to it this: "But his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel." The defendant is already authorized to testify. The law permits him to do so, and that law was passed in the interest of the prisoners. I know the case out of which it grew, a famous case in the annals of criminal jurisprudence in Hamilton county, where the party accused was the only person present when the crime was committed. He desired to testify, and between the time the act was committed and the trial, the law was passed, and it was passed at the instance of his counsel. That is the way the criminal law in this state has been moulded, by those in favor of the criminal. Now I do not see any objection to the last part of that. The defendant is not bound to take the witness stand. He can stay off of it if he wants to. This does not affect anything as to his obligations on that subject, except that it may be alluded to or considered by the jury. In nearly every case the jury does consider it. There is generally somebody on the jury smart enough to see that that defendant has not testified on his own behalf, and they ask the question in the jury room, "Why didn't that fellow get up and testify?" If the man who knows most about it does not tell what he knows it raises a strong presumption against him in the minds of the persons trying any case. The jury does consider it, and this only authorizes them to do what they do do as a matter of fact. The prosecutor ought to have the right to allude to it. If it results in a great many of them taking the stand and testifying, what harm is done? Someone says, "Oh, they may be cross-examined and something may be gotten out of them about their former life; it might bring to light some of their former evil deeds." Dreadful calamity. It would be perfectly dreadful to prove that a man had had several terms in the penitentiary! But, as has been said, the court always has it in its power to protect the witness against that sort of cross-examination; cross-examination on collateral matters is always at the discretion of the court, and the court can always stop it when it thinks proper, and the judges will furnish all the protection needed in that line.

Depositions by State and Comment on Failure to Testify in Criminal Cases.

Look at the thousands of crimes that are committed here. The statistics are dreadfully against this country on crime. Why, we have more in proportion to our population than any country in the world! And why have we so many lynchings? What brings greater disrepute than a lynching? I want to tell you, if you go across the water and read the newspapers, you will find that there is nothing they gloat over over there as much as the details of an American lynching. Every one of them is published in full, with all the details, in the London papers.

Mr. HALFHILL: Are you not in error in stating that there are more homicides in this country to the population than any other country on earth?

Mr. PECK: No, sir; this country very greatly exceeds any civilized country. There might be some in Africa that would exceed it.

Mr. HALFHILL: Italy is civilized.

Mr. PECK: Yes; and they are not equal to us in homicides.

Mr. HALFHILL: I call your attention to the fact that the latest statistics show that there are 105 homicides per million inhabitants in Italy, and that is more than in the United States.

Mr. PECK: I have seen a comparison of statistics and the percentages figured out and the actual numbers given, and they have been very much against this country, and I thought everybody knew it. If I had thought everybody did not know it I could have brought them here.

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not want to dispute your authority without giving mine. I am referring to an article on "Crimes and Criminal Procedure" in the Encyclopedia Britannica, tenth edition. These statistics are gathered together and given.

Mr. PECK: I do not know anything about that article. The article I was referring to was a magazine article. Perhaps it was in Collier's. I saw it, and there is no doubt as to its substantial correctness. But suppose there are more in Italy than here. Do we want to lag at the tail-end of the procession in a matter like this? Do we want to be at the bottom, below a country notorious for crimes, like Italy? Are we to be put on a par with the country that has the Blackhand, the Mafia and the Camorra, or are we trying to be civilized and are we trying to stop crimes and criminals? Are we trying to suppress homicides?

I tell you, this is an important proposition. There has not been a more important one before this body. We must do our duty, and we must not let our professional notions keep us from passing this proposal. The trouble with the lawyers is that they have heard all these old legal maxims and legal saws until they have come to look upon them as a sort of ten commandments. We are likely to think that they are entitled to as much sanctity as the ten commandments. We represent a state, the people of the state, a law-abiding people and a law-abiding state, and we are not here to represent lawbreakers, or to facilitate the escape of lawbreakers, or to make specious pleas for the poor, weak, miserable criminal. Pleas may be made to a jury for them, but not here. What we want is to convict that poor, weak criminal, and not let him do it again. It is to the interest of society that punishment should be prompt. I am opposed to extreme punishment. I think the length of terms in this state are all greater than they need be. In England imprisonment for a long term is not much given, but the certainty and promptness of the punishment are the two elements for the prevention of crime. The criminal elements there understand that just as sure as they commit a crime they will be brought to book and the law applied to them, and as a result you see a diminution in the commission of crime.

Mr. RILEY: In view of the fact that there are comparatively few present, I move that further consideration of this proposal be postponed until tomorrow, and that it retain its place on the calendar.

The motion was carried.

Reports of Standing Committees—References of Proposals to Committees—Petitions and Memorials.

The PRESIDENT: If there are any reports from any committees now is a good time to offer them.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 330—Mr. Dwyer, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all of said proposal after line 3 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Until further provided by law the state is hereby divided into ten appellate court districts as follows:

The present first, third, fifth, sixth and eighth judicial circuits shall each constitute with the same numbering, counties and boundaries, the first, third, fifth, sixth and eighth appellate court judicial districts.

The counties of Preble, Darke, Shelby, Champaign, Miami, Montgomery and Greene shall constitute the second appellate court judicial district.

The counties of Brown, Adams, Highland, Pickaway, Ross, Pike, Scioto, Lawrence, Gallia, Jackson, Meigs, Vinton, Hocking and Athens shall constitute the fourth appellate court judicial district.

The counties of Lake, Ashtabula, Geauga, Trumbull, Portage and Mahoning shall constitute the seventh appellate court judicial district.

The counties of Columbiana, Jefferson, Belmont, Harrison, Carroll, Monroe, Noble, Guernsey and Washington shall constitute the ninth appellate court judicial district.

The counties of Franklin, Madison, Clark and Fayette shall constitute the tenth appellate court judicial district.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Dwyer the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEES OF PROPOSALS.

The following proposals on the calendar were read the second time by their titles and referred as follows:

Proposal No. 335—Mr. Dunn. To the committee on Taxation.

Proposal No. 336—Mr. Read. To the committee on Education.

Proposal No. 337—Mr. Watson. To the committee on Initiative and Referendum.

Proposal No. 338—Mr. Dunn. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

Proposal No. 339—Mr. Dunn. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

By unanimous consent the Convention took up resolutions laid over under Rule 96.

Resolution No. 109—Mr. Stilwell, was taken up.

Mr. Lampson moved that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Thomas moved that Resolution No. 110—Mr. Thomas, be informally passed.

The motion was carried.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. Halfhill presented the petition of W. B. Bradshaw and twenty-one other citizens of northwestern Ohio protesting against the initiative and referendum proposition adopted by the Convention, protesting against any compromise with the interests and praying the Convention to submit to popular vote a proposition that will provide for genuine and unrestrained government of the people, by the people, and for the people; which was referred to the committee of the Whole.

Mr. Halenkamp presented the petitions of Sullivan Walter and eighteen other citizens of Cincinnati; of F. Steffen and nineteen other citizens of Cincinnati, asking for the abolition of the legislature; which were referred to the committee of the Whole.

Mr. Ulmer presented the petition of E. P. Gauder and thirty-eight other citizens of Lucas county, asking for the abolition of the legislature; which was referred to the committee of the Whole.

Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, presented the petition of W. H. Palmer and fifty-two qualified electors of Fairfield county, disapproving of the majority report of the taxation committee and urging favorable consideration of the minority report of the committee; which was referred to the committee on Taxation.

Mr. Nye presented the petition of James B. Morrow and twenty-four other citizens of Lorain county, requesting that an amendment shall be proposed to the constitution providing for the abolition of the legislature and for the passage of laws through initiative of the people by direct vote; which was referred to the committee on Legislative and Executive Departments.

Mr. Farnsworth presented the petition of George Prendergast and forty-seven other citizens of Lucas county, asking for the passage of the initiative and referendum; which was referred to the committee on Initiative and Referendum.

On motion of Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, the Convention adjourned.

SIXTY-NINTH DAY

AFTERNOON SESSION.

MONDAY, May 6, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president, and opened with prayer by the Rev. Dr. Louis B. Bradrick, of Columbus, Ohio. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. Lampson offered the following resolution:
Resolution No. 118:

Resolved, That the foregoing amendments to the constitution shall be submitted to the electors of the state at an election to be held on the _____ day of _____, one thousand nine hundred and twelve, in the several election districts of this state. The polls at said election shall be open at five thirty o'clock a. m. of said day, and remain open until five thirty o'clock, p. m. of said day; the said election shall be conducted and the returns thereof made and certified to the secretary of state, as provided by law for annual elections of state and county officers. Within twenty days after such election, the secretary of state shall open the returns thereof, in the presence of the governor; and if it shall appear that a majority of all the votes, cast at such election, on any of said amendments, are in favor of such amendment or amendments, then the governor shall issue his proclamation, stating that fact, and said amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution of the state of Ohio, and not otherwise. That said amendments submitted shall be numbered in the order in which the proposals were adopted by the Convention on second reading, and each amendment shall be designated by such number and a title which shall suggest its subject matter. Said proposals with the number of the amendment corresponding thereto are as follows, to-wit: 54 (1); 118 (2); 100 (3); 151 (4); 91 (5); 2 (6); 184 (7); 236 (8); 93 (9); 212 (10); 163 (11); 5 (12); 249 (13); 62 (14); 64 (15); 242 (16); 122 (17); 209 (18); 24 (19); 7 (20); 261 (21); 309 (22); 169 (23); 72 (24); 304 (25); 241 (26); 166 (27); 322 (28); 252 (29); 272 (30). The ballots at such election shall be printed in the following form, with each amendment designated by number and title thereon; those voters in favor of all of said amendments may vote for all of said amendments by placing an X in the circle at the top of the ballot, or by placing an X in the space before the word "For" in each and every title; those voters opposed to all of said amendments may vote against the same by placing an X in the space before the word "Against" in each and every title; those voters who desire to vote for certain amendments and not for other amendments may place an X before the word "For" in the title of such amendment or amendments; those voters who desire to vote against certain amendments and not against other amendments may place an X in the space before the word "Against" in the title to such amendment or amendments. Ballots marked with an X within the circle at the top of the ballot shall be counted for all of said amendments, except such amendments as may be erased or marked within the space before the word "Against" in the title. Ballots not marked shall not be counted for or against any amendment. Ballots so marked as to clearly indicate the intention of the voter shall be counted.

RESOLUTIONS LAID OVER.

Resolution No. 110—Mr. Thomas, was taken up. The resolution was again read.

Mr. THOMAS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: One of the first proposals adopted by the Convention was one relating to the issuing of $50,000,000 of bonds for good roads. I am informed by the officers over at the postal savings department of the post office that the money which is deposited there is turned over to the banks at two and one-half per cent interest, and the banks are permitted to lend that money out at different rates of interest, whatever they can get for it. The security the banks give is to deposit with the United States state or municipal bonds, and it strikes me, if we are going to build good roads by the issuance of bonds, the state of Ohio could save money by asking Uncle Sam to lend the money from the postal department at two, and one-half per cent interest, the same as it is given to the banks. I think the money would be better placed with the people as a whole than with the banks, and I therefore request the adoption of the resolution so that congress, which is now in session, may take the matter up.

Relative to Postal Savings Banks—Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: How is this to be transmitted to congress? When the legislature petitions congress there is something said about the secretary of state's transmitting it.

Mr. THOMAS: I think it should go from the secretary of this Convention.

Mr. KING: I do not know whether I would be for the resolution as a separate matter or not. But I am not sure that the substance is worthy of consideration here. I submit that we are not here either to petition or to instruct the United States congress. We have a specific duty to perform here, and when we are through with that we should go home. I am against this resolution.

The resolution was lost.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The PRESIDENT: The next order of business is the second reading of proposals, and the matter in hand is Proposal No. 170—Mr. Worthington. The proposal has been read the second time. The chair recognizes the delegate from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL].

Mr. HALFHILL: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: To frame the organic law of Ohio so as to permit a better method of taxation than now exists is probably the most important work to be considered by this Convention, affecting as it does the temporal well-being of all of us and our children after us.

In the ten years last past the population of Ohio has increased fourteen and five-tenths per cent, the tax duplicate has only increased thirty-five per cent and the amount of money raised by taxation has increased sixty-eight per cent.

The foregoing figures show that the cost and expenses of administering the agencies of government in Ohio are too excessively high and there is a crying demand for an effective remedy. Very likely it would be incorrect to say that the per capita cost of running the state machinery should be no greater per head of population than it was ten years ago. In conducting private business we find that many of the fixed charges are higher than ten years ago, and the state in its organized capacity is only a great public business with many departments. The cost of living has advanced so far as the price of most food stuffs is concerned, and there are many thousands of mouths to be fed and bodies to be warmed, cared for and clothed in the asylums, hospitals, reformatories and other charities that care for the unfortunate of the state.

To prosecute an inquiry into the why and wherefore of the increase in the money levied for taxes and to show why the increase in this item is so much greater in per cent than the increase in population and in the tax duplicate, is a greater task than I can hope to thoroughly or successfully accomplish. It would mean nothing less than a review of, first, the constitutional provisions; secondly, the entire statute law on the question of taxation, both before and since the adoption of the present constitution; and thirdly, the decisions of the courts in construing these laws. The subject is a technical one, governed by economic principles as true as mathematics, but hard to demonstrate, and it is especially hard to say anything on such a subject that does not sound stilted and academic. One who could enlighten us in popular language and conduct us through the maze of inconsistencies and contradictions that envelop the whole theory of taxation in Ohio, and could lead us to an understanding of a practical, intelligent, progressive and up-to-date system of taxation, would indeed be a public benefactor.

The tax laws of Ohio are unscientific from the standpoint of the political economist, work the grossest kind of inequalities in distributing the burdens of taxation and are generally bad. The general property tax, substantially as we have it today, was adopted in 1846 and was written into the constitution in 1851 in the language of section 2, article XII, which is as follows:

Laws shall be passed, taxing by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, or otherwise; and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money, excepting bonds of the state of Ohio, bonds of any city, village, hamlet, county, or township in this state, and bonds issued in behalf of the public schools of Ohio and the means of instruction in connection therewith, which bonds shall be exempt from taxation; but burying grounds, public schoolhouses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property to an amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars, for each individual, may, by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published as may be directed by law.

The exemption from taxation of state, county, township and municipal bonds has been added to this section by the amendment of 1905, but otherwise it is as originally adopted. Here is the "cast-iron rule" that has worked the grossest inequalities and hardships, under which no satisfactory tax system can be established in this state without removing the following:

Laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, or otherwise; and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money.

Taxation.

In 1906 Hon. Andrew L. Harris, then governor, appointed an honorary commission composed of Wade H. Ellis, then attorney general of Ohio, Atlee Pomerene, since elected a United States senator from this state, and three other efficient and able citizens, to investigate the tax laws and make recommendations for their improvement. In this commission's report to the governor, they have this to say concerning the above quoted cast-iron rule governing the making of tax laws:

The general property tax has long ago served its day. The requirement that all property, tangible and intangible, should be taxed by a uniform rule answered well enough for a time when nearly all property was tangible. The attempt to tax stocks and bonds in the same way as cattle and farms seemed entirely feasible in an age when there were few stocks or bonds. The effort to secure from railroads and similar corporations a fair contribution to the public revenues in return for their public franchises, by methods identical with those adopted as to other classes of property, disclosed no hint of failure in a day when there were only two locomotives in Ohio and less than twenty miles of railroad track, and before telegraphs were in use or telephones or electric lights or transportation had been invented.

Nearly every state in the Union which followed Ohio in the establishment of the general property tax has either long since abandoned it or is now struggling with an effort to get rid of the system. No state has adopted such a plan of taxation in recent years. Many of the more progressive states have never had any specific restriction upon the power of taxation, and no state which has once abolished the general property tax has ever returned to it.

Governor Harris in a special message to the general assembly indorsed this report and its recommendations and this was the beginning of a desperate attempt on the part of the legislature to better conditions if possible. This resulted in submitting to the electors in 1908 a constitutional amendment doing away with the uniform rule and giving the legislature practically unrestricted power in levying and collecting taxes, but this proposed amendment was defeated. Later was passed the Smith one-per-cent maximum general levy, to which is added emergency levies and sufficient to meet the requirements of the sinking fund and interest on outstanding bonds. This is a desperate if not an heroic attempt to overcome inequalities and bad conditions imposed by the uniform rule of valuation fixed by the constitution, but it is only an experiment, and the axe should be laid at the root of the tree.

This Smith law is an attempt to secure a better return of personal property for taxation and take off from the home, the business block and the farm some of the burdens of the iniquitous general property tax saddled there by the laws framed under the uniform rule of valuation prescribed by the present constitution. Such laws have produced, and ever will continue to produce, an increasing burden upon real property and an ever-diminishing share of the burden that should be borne by personal property in the support of the state that gives equal protection to both. The total value of all the property of Ohio as returned for taxes in 1910 is the sum of $2,484,315,574, only one-third of which is personal property, but under the forced appraisalment of 1911 made necessary by the Smith law, the grand duplicate shows $6,000,000,000 and the former proportion between real and personal property is preserved.

It is a safe estimate that under any law now in existence, or any form of law that can be drawn under the restrictions of the present "uniform rule of valuation at its true value in money" rigidly fixed in the present constitution, not ten per cent of the moneys, credits, stocks and bonds or other intangible property is ever listed for taxation, and not fifty per cent of the tangible personal property, both as to amount and valuation thereof, is returned for tax purposes. If the visible and invisible personal property of the state could be reached under just and equitable laws the aggregate valuation would exceed that of all real estate in Ohio by a ratio of two to one, and exactly reverse present conditions. This startling fact is the hope of the single-taxer, who, by a system of false philosophy claims that he will unfetter all industries and help labor by removing taxation altogether from personal property and placing the entire burden on the land.

And this, too, means all the land, including that used and held by churches, schools, colleges and charities not maintained by law as public institutions, which doctrine is nothing but the madness of the commune and socialistic to the last degree.

The inequalities and injustice revealed in the working of every tax law that has been enacted, or that can be drafted under present constitutional restrictions, makes one wonder that the existing system has been so long perpetuated, but the very complexity of the subject permits concealment of its workings. Some of the more apparent evils may be summarized by condensing the report of the commission mentioned as follows:

1. The first and most important of these is that the general property tax bears unjustly upon the owners of real estate, whether farm lands or city homes, and permits with increasing advantage the escape from taxation of all forms of personal property, and particularly of that class of personal property which can be most easily concealed from the taxing authorities.

2. The next in importance is that which has developed among the owners of real property by reason of the infrequent valuation of such property for purposes of taxation and the inducement on the part of local assessors and taxing boards to assess the same as low as possible in order to shift to other communities their own share of the uniform levy for state purposes. This has been remedied in part by the laws creating the tax commission with power to arbitrarily increase valuation in any county, township, or municipality; but the exercise of such arbitrary power without right of appeal has already worked many instances of injustice.

3. Another inequality is that existing among the owners of personal property caused by the attempt to tax, by a uniform rule and according to its true value in money, tangible chattels on the one hand, such as live stock and farm implements, merchants' and manufacturers' goods and the like, which ought to be easily found by the assessor, and intangible property on the other, such as money, mortgages and bonds, which are not returned unless their owner voluntarily admits the ownership.

4. Still another inequality is that existing between the individual owner of real and personal property on the one hand and the owner of certain classes of corporate property on the other, as a result of the requirement that all property, however used and benefited by public grants and franchises and whatever its earning capacity, shall be valued for taxation by a uniform rule and subjected to one fixed method in determining the contribution it shall make to the support of state and local government.

5. Finally, there are many instances of peculiar hardship between classes of corporations caused by an effort from time to time, and without any consistency of plan or purpose, to avoid constitutional obstacles in securing a just return from those who enjoy special privileges in the control and management of such property.

One of the evils most easily understood or of most frequent occurrence is double taxation. If John Doe owns a farm worth $10,000 and borrows from Richard Roe $5,000, secured by a mortgage on his farm, Doe must pay taxes on the full value of the farm and Roe must pay full taxes on the $5,000 mortgage, all of which is equally true of the owner of a small home. One struggling to become a home-owner finds a house and lot that can be purchased for $1,500, and by paying one-third down and executing a mortgage for the deferred payment of $1,000 the expectant home-owner is given a deed, and immediately he pays taxes on three times the value of all that he actually owns. In each instance the land and lot owner should in justice only pay taxes on the value of the equity that they have in this property; but those illustrations might be multiplied many times in other classes of property, to show that the general property tax in Ohio has long since served its day.

Between 1889 and 1908 there were six amendments proposed to section two of article XII of the constitution, but only one adopted, when, in 1905, the voters provided for exempting state, municipal, county and public school bonds from taxation, and this was by a vote of five to one in nearly a million votes.

I do not pretend to say that I could devise anything approaching a perfect system of taxation, for that is a work for the highest and best experts on questions of political economy, finance and statecraft, yet I do know that a much better system than the one now existing can be devised and put into execution. There is no occasion, reason or sense for the continued existence of the present general property tax in a state like Ohio, with its ever-increasing burden upon real property, when personal property of all kinds, if it could be got at, would exceed the value of real estate twice over.

The state's statistics for the year 1910 reveal some astonishing facts, as, for instance, the total value of all credits, moneys invested in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, annuities or otherwise, plus the value of all moneys in possession or on deposit to order, equals the pitiful sum of $139,685,578, although the actual bank deposits of the state in the year 1910 exceeded the sum of $500,000,000. For a long time in Ohio under the uniform rule a corporation like The Western Union Telegraph Company returned for taxation only so many poles, so many miles of wire and so many brass instruments, but finally the legislature found a constitutional way to get at the actual value of the good will, privileges and franchises of this and similar corporations, and the present state tax commission under its power has materially enlarged the tax duplicate with this kind of property.

Evidently the general assembly should have a freer hand, with right to classify property for taxation according to equitable rules, uniform as to each class, with a proviso that no laws should be passed authorizing the levying of a special tax upon one class of property for the purpose of benefiting another class, and at all times avoiding double taxation. Some such amendments to the constitution looking to this end or something similar, have been proposed and defeated, for it seems the people do not want to trust the legislature entirely without restrictions as to taxing power, and the problem is how to give the legislature a freer right and yet not make the right absolutely unlimited.

The most unjust, unfair and inequitable taxes are imposed in those states of the Union whose constitutions are similar to ours, and the best systems of taxation are in those states where the legislature is practically unhampered by constitutional restrictions. Thus when the "uniform rule" of the present constitution is removed, as I firmly believe will be accomplished in the near future, even if this Convention fails to do its duty to the people of Ohio in that respect, there are yet certain safeguards which in my judgment should always be provided:

First. The legislature should be prohibited from contracting away the right to tax by making any irrevocable grants of exemption. The converse of this proposition is true, and the constitution should not expressly require every kind and class of property to be taxed, but should leave to the discretion of the legislature the right to exempt property of churches, educational institutions, private charities, etc.

Second. The legislature should be prohibited from discriminating between persons or property similarly situated, so that the rule of valuation should act uniformly on any class of property which naturally comes in for classification; and should always be prohibited from imposing any tax whatsoever for the benefit of any private or corporate interest.

Third. All property of a strictly public nature supported by public taxes, such as instrumentalities of government, should be absolutely exempted from taxation.

Thus I am suggesting what might be worked out and accomplished by the accepted rules governing the best theories of revenue and taxation and forever excluding from consideration such a heresy as the single tax, or exclusive land tax.

It is out of the question to elaborately present to this Convention any code of rules or scheme of statutory law classifying property for taxation purposes, but permit me to add a few specific reasons to show why this should be made possible.

The money value of property is constantly shifting and is never a true index of ability to pay taxes. Actual money value of an equal amount of property in the hands of two different people can be and is taxed under our present law so that the net result is injustice and positive immorality. For instance, a widow has $10,000 and her income is $400, for she cannot hazard her money in business and must put it in a bank at four per cent interest. An active man has $10,000 and his income from handling and turning this in business is $1,000. Both pay one per cent tax on $10,000, but this exacts from the widow twenty-five per cent of her income and from the able-bodied man but ten per cent of his. If this is justice then crime can be committed in the name of justice, for ability to pay is ability to bear the burdens of taxation. If not hampered by restrictions such as exist in Ohio, the merest tyro in legislation can classify property on the basis of its earning power so that it might be taxed by a differential instead of a uniform rule and thus establish justice between the taxpayers. A state should enact just laws and not charge its citizens with dishonesty because they are driven to evade the operation of unjust and inequitable laws. Inheritance taxes, graduated income taxes, mortgage recording taxes, fixed flat-rate taxes that may be moved up and down until the point of greatest productivity is determined, can all be made effective under a scheme of classification, and Ohio can progress as other states have progressed by wise tax laws.

In New York the revenue from the recording tax is nearly three hundred per cent greater than when taxed annually on full value at a uniform rate of one per cent, and this same state now derives over $5,000,000 annually from an inheritance tax. Within ten years, under the fixed flat rate, the city of Baltimore, Md., increased its revenue from $120,000 to $500,000 solely from intangible personal property.

Ohio can accomplish all that has been done elsewhere if the existing obstacle to progress is removed from our fundamental law.

Now, gentlemen of the Convention, in conformity with the views I have expressed up to this point, I desire to offer what I have prepared as a substitute for Proposal No. 170, and the amendments thereto, as it now appears before the Convention, for consideration.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 170, and all amendments thereto, by striking out all after the word "Proposal" and substituting therefor the following:

To submit an amendment to sections 1, 2 and 6 of article XII of the constitution relative to taxation.

SECTION 1. The general assembly shall levy and collect taxes in such manner as it may deem proper; but all taxes shall be just and uniform upon the same class of subjects; and the power of taxation shall never be surrendered or suspended by any contract or grant to which the state shall be a party.

SECTION 2. All property and instrumentalities of government, created or supported by public funds, including the bonds and obligations of the United States, the state or any political subdivision or district thereof, shall not be taxed. The general assembly may exempt from taxation, churches, universities, colleges, seminaries, schools all institutions of public charity and their endowments, and such property of individuals not exceeding one thousand dollars in value, as shall be deemed best for the public good; but all such exemption laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted by general laws, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published, as may be directed by law.

SECTION 3. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution, the state shall never contract any debt for the purposes of internal improvement.

Mr. HALFHILL: This substitute proposal, which has been read for your consideration, sets forth what I believe to be a just and proper grant of power authorizing the classification of property for the purposes of taxation. Permit me to call attention to the fact that with all the great increase that has been made in the property of Ohio, so far as the grand tax duplicate is concerned, with all the great advancement that has been made in the changed social conditions, you observe in the present proposal as you have it now before you for consideration practically the same lines of thought that were crystallized into the constitution by the convention of 1851. In such places as you have departed from the express provisions of section 2, article XII, as they now obtain, you have departed with the endeavor to do something which to a certain extent would unshackle the uniform rule, while in fact preserving it as a basis; and it might as well be known and considered that in Ohio in times past the exigencies of the situation have required the legislature and the supreme court to depart in logical effect from the operation of the uniform rule, because excise taxes and franchise taxes, which did not come into existence in Ohio until within a score of years last past, are not taxes at all in the sense in which taxes are levied under the rule of uniform taxation. But the constituted authorities were driven by virtue of the condition of practical bankruptcy that confronted the people of Ohio to start off on a line of franchise, excise and license taxes, all of which properly belong under any scheme of classification that may be devised.

There was introduced here for consideration of the Convention a proposal to grant to a home-owner the right to own $1,000 in real estate that should not be taxed. That met with no consideration or approval at the hands of the Convention. You have stayed by the same hard-and-fast line of $200 exemption, just as though there was not a tremendous amount of property which could be brought upon the tax duplicate, and a great revenue that could be derived whereby it would be entirely possible that you might raise abundant revenue and yet relieve those who could least afford to pay taxes. To encourage the small home-owner and aid those who are poor in purse and property I have put into this substitute an authorized exemption of $1,000. Not that the legislature shall do it, but the power is given to the legislature to do that thing, if in the interest of justice and equality it seems right and advisable that it should be done; and I have kept in this substitute the exemption of municipal bonds from taxation, because it has seemed to me that by every consideration of good business and correct finance there is no sense whatever in departing from a policy that had met with the approval of the people of Ohio to the extent that they have already modified and changed their constitution on that point.

Taxation.

Mr. ANDERSON: A question please?

Mr. HALFHILL: Wait until I get through with my statement, and I will answer all questions that I can.

It seems to me it would be a parallel point to show you the condition that the Emerald Isle was in when it was owned exclusively by foreign landlords. At that time all the rent and income went away from home and that was a condition that was not good for the people of Ireland. You have here a great state in which the instruments of government, to wit, the bonds of municipalities, etc., are part and parcel of the things in which you are all interested, and in which your and your neighbors' excess capital can be invested and kept at home; and when interest day comes the money circulates in your communities instead of going outside of the state.

Gentlemen of the Convention, you must meet conditions, and you must not combat conditions with theories. This whole situation so far as the uniform rule is concerned is in the form of an ellipse with two foci; at one of the foci you find your theories, but at the other all the time exist the facts, and the facts are against your theories, because human nature permits a man, as an American citizen, to live outside of the boundaries of his native state if the tax rate is more favorable to him elsewhere, and it is senseless and useless to say that he is not patriotic and that he has not state pride because he lives in another state where the tax rate is better. That condition exists and you have to meet it, and that is exactly what we have failed to do in Ohio.

Mr. WOODS: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: When I get through with my statement I will give you all an opportunity.

That is the situation that exists in Ohio, and has existed for a number of years past. Now, so far as municipal bonds are concerned, just a word. I want to call your attention to the fact that when you study all of the theorists on taxation, and all of the text-writers on taxation, you will never find one who has departed from the axioms that are laid down by Adam Smith in his "Wealth of Nations." You cannot find one authority or one writer or one political economist that has ever written a chapter that would successfully combat, or even attempt to combat, the axioms of taxation laid down by Adam Smith. I desire to read a few of them to you, and I refer to chapter 2 of book 5:

Before I enter upon the examination of particular taxes, it is necessary to premise the four following maxims with regard to taxes in general:

I. The subjects of every state ought to contribute toward the support of the government, as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state. The expense of government to the individuals of a great nation is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their respective interests in the estate. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation. Every tax, it must be observed, once for all, which falls finally upon one only of the three sorts of revenue above mentioned (rent, profit, wages), is necessarily unequal, in so far as it does not affect the other two. In the following examination of different taxes I shall seldom take much further notice of this sort of inequality, but shall, in most cases, confine my observations to that inequality which is occasioned by a particular tax falling unequally even upon that particular sort of private revenue which is affected by it.

II. The tax which each individual is bound to pay, ought to be certain, and not arbitrary. The time of payment, the manner of payment, the quantity to be paid, ought all to be clear and plain to the contributor and to every other person. Where it is otherwise, every person subject to the tax is put more or less in the power of the tax gatherer, who can either aggravate the tax upon any obnoxious contributor, or extort, by the terror of such aggravation, some present or perquisite to himself. The uncertainty of taxation encourages the insolence and favors the corruption of an order of men who are naturally unpopular, even where they are neither insolent nor corrupt. The certainty of what each individual ought to pay is, in taxation, a matter of so great importance, that a very considerable degree of inequality, it appears, I believe, from the experience of all nations, is not near so great an evil as a very small degree of uncertainty.

III. Every tax ought to be levied at the time, or in the manner, in which it is most likely to be convenient for the contributor to pay it. A tax upon the rent of land or of houses, payable at the same time at which such rents are usually paid, is levied at the time when it is most likely to be convenient for the contributor to pay; or, when he is most likely to have wherewithal to pay. Taxes upon such consumable goods as are articles of luxury, are all finally paid by the consumer, and generally in a manner that is very convenient for him. He pays them little by little, as he has occasion to buy the goods. As he is at liberty, either to buy or not to buy, as he pleases, it must be his own fault if he ever suffers any considerable inconvenience of such taxes.

IV. Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the state. A tax may either take out or keep out of the pockets of the people a great deal more than it brings into the public treasury, in the four following ways. First, the levying of it may require a great number of officers, whose salaries may eat up the greater part of the produce of the tax, and whose perquisites may impose another additional tax upon the people. Secondly, it may obstruct the industry of the people, and discourage them from applying to certain branches of business which might give maintenance and employment to great multitudes. While it obliges the people to pay it may thus diminish, or perhaps destroy, some of the funds which might enable them more easily to do so. Thirdly, by the forfeitures and other penalties which those unfortunate individuals incur who attempt unsuccessfully to evade the tax, it may frequently ruin them, and thereby put an end to the benefit which the community might have received from the employment of their capitals. An injudicious tax offers a great temptation to smuggling. But the penalties of smuggling must rise in proportion to the temptation. The law, contrary to all the principles of justice, first creates the temptation, and then punishes those who yield to it; and it enhances the punishment too in proportion to the very circumstance which ought certainly to alleviate it, the temptation to commit the crime. Fourthly, by subjecting the people to the frequent visits and the odious examination of the taxgatherers, it may expose them to such unnecessary trouble, vexation and oppression; and though vexation is not, strictly speaking, expense, it is certainly equivalent to the expense at which every man would be willing to redeem himself from it. It is in some one or other of these four different ways that taxes are frequently so much more burdensome to the people than they are beneficial to the sovereign.

The evident justice and utility of the foregoing maxims have recommended them more or less to the attention of all nations. All nations have endeavored, to the best of their judgment, to render their taxes as equal as they could contrive; as certain, as convenient to the contributor, both in the time and in the mode of payment, and in proportion to the revenue which they brought to the prince, as little burdensome to the people.

Now, if you will consider that Adam Smith was dealing with a government that had plenary powers, and will exclude from his maxims the language which shows that he was dealing with a government that had plenary powers, then you have the maxims that apply unquestionably to the conditions that exist right here in Ohio, and have existed for sixty-one years under the uniform rule.

The conditions which he set forth in these maxims would apply directly to the federal government which exercised all of the greater powers of sovereignty so far as its intercourse with other nations is concerned. But you will remember that in our own state we have reserved much the greater portion of all governmental powers. It is only the few powers that are granted to the federal government, and therefore these maxims of Adam Smith are applicable to the conditions and the situation that confronts us here today. I stated to you in the beginning a proposition that in ten years the population in the state of Ohio had increased 14.5 per cent. The tax duplicate has only increased 35 per cent, and the amount raised by taxation has increased 68 per cent, and you will find right in one of these maxims of Adam Smith that I have read to you a solution and an absolute demonstration of why that condition exists in Ohio today, wherein he says the levying of taxes may require a great number of officers whose salaries may eat up the greater part of the products of the tax, and whose perquisites may impose another additional tax upon the people. That is the situation that exists in Ohio today, and each legislature undertaking to garner or gather in greater sums for taxation proceeds to enlarge the tax machinery, creates the tax commission and new swarms of tax deputies, and bills are introduced and laws passed in order to get property out of hiding by getting additional officers to pursue it. The complex machinery of taxation is of itself expensive and greatly adds to the burdens and problems of taxation in Ohio. Under the idea of classification it is perfectly possible to pass a general law which will allow property to be taxed practically by the operation of the law in each subdivision so that the auditor, or some similar officer, with a small corps of deputies can collect all of the taxes right in the treasury of each county, and save all of the commissions and exercise the authority that now is instituted and in operation for the purpose of gathering all the taxes, including the regular property tax and the franchise, license and excise taxes. Furthermore, right in the first maxim is something that applies to inequalities and injustice under our present system:

The subjects of every state ought to contribute toward the support of the government, as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state.

Now, gentlemen of the Convention, if anybody can demonstrate to me where there is justice and equity and equality under the operation of the uniform rule in Ohio, I have failed to hear the man or read the writer. If you abandon the idea that property is the basis and measure of taxation and adopt the accepted principle that ability to pay ought to be the measure and basis of taxation, then you have approached near to the place where you can pass laws that will deal justly with the citizens of the state, for upon the shoulders of the strong should rest the greater burdens of the government, and under the uniform rule that is impossible. I submit that when you take from a revenue of four per cent interest twenty-five per cent of it in taxes, you have discriminated in a way that it is impossible to remedy under the uniform rule.

Mr. WATSON: Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes, I will now.

Mr. WATSON: You said a moment ago you would put the burden of taxation upon the rich. Is it not the poor men who have money to lend and to draw interest?

Mr. HALFHILL: You do not quote me correctly. I said I would put the burden of taxation on those who had the ability to bear the burden.

Mr. WATSON: Then a moment ago you said something about a man lending money at four per cent, and that if you took one-fourth of it, etc. Now, is it the poor men who have that money to lend or is it the rich men?

Mr. HALFHILL: You cannot in framing a law frame one for the rich and one for the poor people, but the same rule applies to all the people, and if a man has $100,000,000, and his income is only four per cent, and a widow has $1,000, and her income is one per cent, the same justice ought to apply to both alike, and they ought to have the same rule, and if by the uniform rule you take one-fourth of the income, you are not doing justice.

Mr. WATSON: Well, how can you classify property and remedy that?

Mr. HALFHILL: I would classify property by putting an increased burden on income, and as the income was greater put on a larger requirement for the government. An income tax is far away and apart from the general property tax, and when you attempt to levy an income tax you depart from the rule of the general uniform property tax.

Mr. WATSON: Does not the majority report impose an income tax?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes, and the minority report proposes an income tax, and wherein they do it they depart from the uniform rule, and when you depart on that point in order to do partial justice, why not abandon it and go to the classification of property where you can do entire and exact justice? That was the reason why I thought it was a very wise provision that was suggested by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DORV], that when these two reports came in here we would consider and discuss them the same as if they were engrossed and had been read a second time, because under that arrangement it might be entirely possible for us to canvass both reports. As I recollect, you are the gentleman who immediately, on the following morning, attempted to move the previous question and prevent the consideration of both of those reports and to get the Convention to decide upon a certain line, to wit, to exclude the idea of classification and incorporate the idea of the general property tax which is set forth in the minority report, and it was to that effort I objected.

Mr. WATSON: That was in conformity to the agreement.

Mr. HALFHILL: It must have been a private agreement. It was not in conformity to anything stated in the Convention.

Mr. WATSON: What do you say in regard to the doctrine enunciated by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] Thursday, when he stated that he would classify according to the ability of the taxpayer to collect the taxes?

Mr. HALFHILL: The gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] is quite able to take care of his own ideas and theories.

Mr. WATSON: Do you subscribe to that doctrine or not?

Mr. HALFHILL: The doctrine you have stated?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not know whether you have stated it correctly or not.

Mr. WATSON: I have correctly stated it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The political economist from Guernsey county has very much overstated it. You can read the report of the official stenographer and see what I said.

Mr. WATSON: I took a note of it, but I will call on the official stenographer and see what the statement was.

Mr. HALFHILL: I would suggest that the gentleman from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] is far afield from anything I heard the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] state.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] yield for a statement from me on the remarks of the modern Adam Smith from Guernsey county?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As a matter of theory, and having a practical operation also, is it not absolutely the fact that the theory of the graduated income tax advocated by the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] in his minority report absolutely opposes the uniform rule of taxation?

Mr. HALFHILL: That is unquestionably the fact. That is better than I stated it a moment ago. The minority report is full of that sort of idiosyncrasies.

Mr. LAMPSON: How do you justify a situation like this: Suppose the general property tax is one per cent, and A owns $20,000 worth of real estate and is assessed at $20,000 and would pay $200 tax. B in the same taxing district has $20,000 in cash, and under your proposition of classification of property for taxation, and limiting the tax upon money on deposit to one-quarter of one per cent, B would pay $50. Why should there be that discrimination?

Mr. HALFHILL: Because the property is not the measure of value, and you are on a wrong basis. There is no rule for fixing the value of property; $10,000 here may be earning more than another $10,000 some place else.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose A and B are neighbors and each has the same number of children, and the children attend the same school. Why should A pay his share of that $200 to attend that school, while B would only pay a proportionate share of $50, both having the same amount of assessed property?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not know that I fully comprehend your question, but if your question embodies the idea of valuation of property, it is upon a wrong basis, because the ability of the citizen to pay, together with the earning power of the property, is the basis that I contend for.

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes, but under ordinary circumstances is not the earning power of $20,000 in cash equal to the earning power of $20,000 in land?

Mr. HALFHILL: I would be wholly unable to answer that, but I do know that, with the products of the farm selling as they do now, a man with good business ability owning $20,000 worth of land will far exceed in income a man who lends out $20,000 at interest rates.

Mr. RILEY: Do you not know that that is a tax on the industry of a man rather than on property? You say a man of fair ability can do that?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have no objection to taxing industry. I am not a singletaxer.

Mr. RILEY: What would you do with vacant land that does not produce anything whatever?

Mr. HALFHILL: I would do justice in that instance, and that is what I have been contending for.

Mr. RILEY: What is justice?

Mr. HALFHILL: Her seat is in the bosom of God, and her voice is the harmony of the world.

Mr. LAMPSON: Does not the gentleman know that her seat is on the "pee-des-tal"?

Taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] yield to me to answer the question of the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON]?

Mr. HALFHILL: I shall be delighted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Answering the question of the member from Ashtabula, the next governor, the question was, why should the owner of $20,000 in real estate pay $200 in taxes as against the owner of $20,000 of cash in bank paying $50? That was the question?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Would not the proper answer be that the state officials and all taxing machinery are not interested in the morality of the question because the morality will not pay public or private debts, but it is a practical question? The $20,000 in real estate cannot be moved the day preceding the second Monday in April. If it could be moved the owner of it would move it. The $20,000 in cash in bank can easily be moved in the twinkling of an eye, so that the sole reason in putting money in a lower class in classification is to appeal to human nature by saying that the rate will be so low that we will induce you to list it, and the penalty for failure to list it will be so high that it will be profitable for you to list it. It is a question of practical things in taxation, and that is the sole reason on which it is justified.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you not think if the rate were limited to one per cent that the man with the cash would pay on his cash just as quickly as if limited to one-half or one-quarter of one per cent?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not, on account of the ease and facility with which he can move it from his bank in Ashtabula to Pittsburgh. There will be no trace of it in any banking jurisdiction in the state of Ohio.

Mr. LAMPSON: He still has the money?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Unless you are a poor banker.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you not think after all that that gentleman would move his money for thirty cents?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As against that theory of yours we have the concrete example of Baltimore and everywhere else where it has been tried, where the reduction of the rate of taxation on personal property has brought out an immense amount of personal property, and yielded the state three or four times the revenue, and that is what the state is interested in. We need not consider morality. Morality doesn't count in an auditor's office. It is what is brought out. I have read from a report of the tax commission in Kentucky begging the legislature for classification instead of the uniform rule, and there is no better rule in taxation matters than experience.

Mr. Hoskins here assumed the chair as president pro tem.

Mr. HALFHILL: I would say to the gentlemen from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] and from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] that they respectively represent facts and theories. The gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] has the facts with him, and the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] is wedded to his theories, and being wedded to his idols, I do not suppose we can convince him.

Mr. WATSON: Will you yield to a question from me?

Mr. HALFHILL: Not now; another has arisen for questions.

Mr. DOTY: I want to ask a question about this $20,000 that the gentleman from Ashtabula referred to. Assuming it is in the state, where did that value originate—where did it come from? You need not answer if you don't want to.

Mr. HALFHILL: I fear you are endeavoring to lead me into a discussion of the single-tax theory.

Mr. DOTY: All I want to say is that I think you are a singletaxer and have not yet found it out.

Mr. HALFHILL: That may be so, and that is where ignorance is bliss.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: In view of what has been said about morality, would not it be a good idea to repeal all of the criminal laws of the state so that we shall have no more criminals?

Mr. HALFHILL: I shall have to rule that question out of order. That will come on the next proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understand you to say that one of the reasons you do not want to put the bonds back on the tax duplicate is because in 1905 they were voted upon and the people of Ohio showed that they were very much in favor of changing their constitution in this regard. Do you not know that that was under the Longworth act, and there was not one person in twenty of the people who voted for it who voted intelligently, so far as the bonds were concerned?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have a pretty good idea of the intelligence of the people of Ohio and a good deal of respect for it, and I think they understood it.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you mean to say—I am not asking it at an index to your intelligence—but do you mean to tell these delegates that when the people voted in 1905 to take the bonds from the tax duplicate, that twenty per cent of the people understood what they were doing?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes; I think ninety-nine per cent did, and those who voted in favor of it voted intelligently.

Mr. ANDERSON: Are you just as sincere in all the other part of your argument as you are in that statement?

Mr. HALFHILL: I am entirely sincere in the belief that they voted intelligently because they reached an intelligent conclusion. That is reasoning from effect back to cause.

Mr. STOKES: Because it happens that they turned down every constitutional amendment except those submitted and ratified by the party vote, is that the reason you say they are intelligent?

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you mean to say they turned down everything?

Mr. STOKES: Except where one party or the other, or both parties, ratified one of the amendments, and they voted for it on the party ticket. They turned down all except those, and is that the reason you say they are intelligent?

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; the amendments that were of enough importance to be taken notice of by the political parties were of enough importance to be taken notice of by the people.

Mr. ANTRIM: Referring to municipal bonds, if we were to restore municipal bonds to taxation is it not true that about one-half would go to the banks, and the other half would go out of the state, and we would not get any taxes on them?

Mr. HALFHILL: I certainly believe that is so, and that is what I have attempted to state.

Mr. ANTRIM: Would not the rate be higher and would not the whole people, therefore, suffer as a result of their not being exempt, in that they would pay a higher rate of interest and would get no return in taxes?

Mr. HALFHILL: And that is why I believe it would be unwise not to specifically exempt the municipal bonds, because, as has been argued here by some of our very progressive brethren, it is a good thing to have the shotgun above the door. Now, when it comes to the question of capital, there is not anything that is more timid than capital, and if the legislature has the power to levy a tax and it is not expressly excluded by the constitution, then and in that event the bond bids will be framed so as to provide against the possible execution of that power, and you will immediately fail to get either the low rate of interest or the high amount of premium that you would ordinarily get upon bids for bonds offered under the existing exemption of the constitution.

Mr. STOKES: I have not fully made up my mind about how I am going to vote on this proposition, and I want all the information I can get. There is a little bit of discredit so far as putting the proposition entirely up to the legislature. Would you not think it wise for the Convention to classify, if they are going to classify, as much as they can in the constitution?

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; I do not, because I am opposed on principle to legislating in the constitution, and some of the good work we have done here, if it meets with defeat, will meet defeat on the ground that it is statutory legislation and has no place in the constitution.

Mr. STOKES: Do you not think it would be wise for us to "safeguard" that?

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you use that word with quotation marks?

Mr. STOKES: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: If so, I shall have to refer you to the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY], because he understands these ideas of safeguards and has so many in the initiative and referendum that his constituents are finding fault with it.

Mr. STOKES: I thought that was "de novo" with you.

Mr. HALFHILL: Absolutely not. I can prove an alibi on that.

Mr. COLTON: How do you avoid double taxation under the classification of property?

Mr. HALFHILL: I certainly think it would be a very easy proposition to provide that there shall be no double taxation, and it would be a very easy proposition to tax a man on the equity of what he has. As I said in my remarks here, it is impossible in an address to even outline a scheme of classification. I can only suggest what I believe would be proper.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you mean by that that we should allow a deduction of debts from credits?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do. I do not think a man should be taxed on what he has not.

Mr. LAMPSON: If a man has one hundred acres of ground and has debts to the full amount of what the one hundred acres of ground are worth, do you mean that that land should not pay any taxes?

Mr. HALFHILL: I mean that the man should not pay on that which he does not own. It is easy to frame a statute that will meet that situation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I was suggesting an answer to Mr. Lampson, the next governor of Ohio, if he gets enough votes—is the ownership of the land a credit? Does he own anything?

Mr. EBY: I have been out part of the time and I may not have understood. Were you advocating the exemption of mortgage or the substitution of a mortgage tax?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not understand your question.

Mr. EBY: I understood that you were talking about exempting mortgage liens and substituting mortgage taxes?

Mr. HALFHILL: I said that was beneficial in the state of Ohio to the borrower.

Mr. EBY: Upon what do you base your assumption?

Mr. HALFHILL: On the fact that it would reduce the rate of interest.

Mr. EBY: Do you believe that it will get a low rate to the borrower, or that the borrower will get the benefit of it?

Mr. HALFHILL: Your question is a good deal like the one I have heard. Is it right for a man under certain conditions to lick his mother-in-law?

Mr. EBY: No, sir; you are advocating something that is quite a change in Ohio, but has been tried in New York and Maryland. There must be one of three reasons, that we have felt that this is the right amount to tax, but we cannot get it, or that it is not right and is not sound, and we should not try to get it, or we may conclude that the public in general should get the benefit from lower interest rates than we do on bonds.

Mr. HALFHILL: Let me ask you a question: Why is it not right, under certain circumstances, to take all of these things into account and classify them?

Mr. EBY: I am not trying to trip you. A farmer never tries to trip a lawyer. I just asked for information.

Mr. HALFHILL: I submit it is impossible to define how much is ethics, or how much is finance, or how much is expediency, or how much is political government that is included in what you state, but I do say on this simple proposition that under the uniform rule of taxation in Ohio real estate pays too much taxes and personal property escapes taxation. One of the reasons why it escapes is that under certain circumstances it should escape, because the uniform rule works an injustice. In other instances it may be unjust that it escapes. Wherein it is unjust I want to make it pay, and where it is just that it should pay a lesser amount it should pay the lesser amount. All of which can be brought about by abandoning the uniform rule and adopting classification.

Taxation.

Mr. EBY: How do you explain that the real estate owners are not asking for classification and that the other people are?

Mr. HALFHILL: That is something I did not want to touch on, because it is absolutely inexplicable to me. I came to the conclusion that I have reached because I was a friend of the landowner and the farmer; I have more real estate than anything else, and I think I am paying too much taxes on it, and as a result of my investigation of this subject, I believe that by getting upon the duplicate the property that ought to be taxed we can relieve real estate from some of the burdens it now unjustly bears.

Mr. EBY: Taxing real estate only and exempting mortgages, do you not know that that would take one-third or even one-half from the poor districts?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not believe that I fully comprehend that question.

Mr. HOLTZ: Do I understand you to say that under classification a law might be enacted that would bring out hidden wealth or intangible property?

Mr. HALFHILL: I think so.

Mr. HOLTZ: What is to prevent laws being enacted under the uniform system to bring out this property?

Mr. HALFHILL: If you adopt property or any other thing of value except money as the basis, it works an injustice so frequently that it won't come out, as I have tried to show.

Mr. HOLTZ: I cannot understand or see the justice of one man with $10,000 paying $100 and another man with $10,000 paying $25, and I cannot see why laws that can be enacted to bring out under the one rule certain property, cannot be enacted under the other rule to bring out that same property?

Mr. HALFHILL: It is utterly impossible under the uniform rule to enact laws that will bring upon the duplicate the amount of property that ought to be there and ought to be paying taxes, and one reason for that is because it is unjust.

Mr. HOLTZ: If a person makes a false statement to save one per cent, what will prevent him from making a false statement to save one-quarter of one per cent?

Mr. HALFHILL: It is a question of risk and of perjury. It is the old idea, where a man who is making a tax statement feels in the bottom of his heart that the law is unjust to him and that he is justified in escaping an unjust burden that the law places upon him, he will endeavor to escape this injustice even at a hazard.

Mr. DWYER: Speaking from the farmers' standpoint, suppose the school board of a township desires to build a school house, and they issue nontaxable bonds to build the school house, will not they get more money if the bonds are not taxed?

Mr. HALFHILL: Certainly.

Mr. DWYER: Then if that be the case it is to the interest of the township to have nontaxable bonds?

Mr. HALFHILL: I cannot see it any other way than that.

Mr. DWYER: If those bonds are taxed and the people have to pay higher by reason of that and there is no return from the bonds in the way of taxation afterwards, are not the townships and the farmers the sufferers?

Mr. HALFHILL: That is an economic proposition that does not require demonstration. It is a matter of common knowledge. A bond will sell higher where it is never to be taxed.

Mr. FLUKE: Every individual receives some of the benefit of government?

Mr. HALFHILL: Undoubtedly so.

Mr. FLUKE: And in return for that, undoubtedly something must be given on his part?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. FLUKE: In the scheme of exempting all bonds, if I take all my property and invest it in bonds in the state of Ohio, how would you assess me for the benefits I get?

Mr. HALFHILL: I would go after you on the income tax, the bigger the income the more I would make the man pay.

Mr. FLUKE: How do you arrive at that?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have just stated that I could not right here frame a full system, but it can be arrived at. England is under that system. Gentlemen of the Convention seem to forget that Ohio and a few other states are the last refuges of the general property tax, and that in other civilized countries of the world, notably in Great Britain, France and Prussia, the income tax and the other methods of classification are the ones they have been living under, and they have operated their government successfully.

Mr. FLUKE: "It all resolves itself in the ability to locate the property in the hands of the individual?"

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; it resolves itself into our inability to frame a just system of taxation under the uniform rule.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Under the other one, too.

Mr. HALFHILL: Which other one?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Under classification, it is equally impossible to frame a just tax law. There never was one framed, and never will be one framed.

Mr. HALFHILL: You are speaking of universal justice. Universal justice does not exist under any law.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Why not reach incomes under one system as well as the other? That is the only way you can make it equal where one man has a larger income than the other, and you can have it just as well under the uniform rule as under classification, and it is right in this proposal now. What is the use of talking about that particular thing, when you can do it better, or at least as well, under the uniform system as you can under the classification system?

Mr. HALFHILL: You do not mean to say that under the minority report and the proposal before the Convention you can reach as many classes of property as could be reached under a scheme of classification?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Yes, sir; you can reach every kind of property under that proposition that is reached by classification.

Mr. HALFHILL: That is where we disagree. You gentlemen, in my judgment, have reached out in the direction of classification in order to bolster up a condition in Ohio which ought not to exist.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: There never was anything to prevent an income tax in Ohio.

Mr. HALFHILL: There never was anything to prevent a franchise tax.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: No.

Taxation.

Mr. HALFHILL: Nor an excise tax, nor a license tax; and yet I do not think any gentleman who knows anything about the theories of taxation will claim that that is levied under the uniform rule, or that it is a uniform rule of taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Mr. President:

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes; if there is anybody who has any question to ask.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As a matter of fact, have not the greatest constitutional lawyers —

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The gentleman has yielded for a question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I am going to ask a question. Have not the greatest lawyers expressed doubt as to whether any income tax can be levied? Yet they said that inheritance taxes could be, but not income taxes.

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not think all of those causes have been before the supreme court. Everybody knows that the legislature and the then auditor of state, Mr. Guilbert, who was a very capable man from Noble county, got the corporations of Ohio to accede to that law and pay their excise taxes without bringing it before the supreme court. The supreme court of Ohio has never passed on it to this day and the question can still be raised.

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: Do I understand you to say that you are in favor of classification because you hope that we shall receive more taxes under that system?

Mr. HALFHILL: No; I didn't say that. I said — and you probably misunderstood me — that I had reached my conclusion that there ought to be classification of property, starting from the basis of a landowner, and believing that the land paid too much taxes, and that, by a just system of classification, we could enlarge the duplicate and relieve the taxes now paid by the land. Two-thirds of the grand duplicate is land and one-third personality.

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: Is or is not the Ohio Bankers' Association advocating classification?

Mr. HALFHILL: The Ohio Bankers' Association or any other association, the State Board of Commerce or any other board of commerce that deals with taxes, have their own views as to that which will be best, and very likely in those instances they are trying or advocating that which will help throw some of the burden from some place to somewhere else. Is not that all human experience?

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: Onto whose shoulders?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not know. Do you mean to imply by your question that it is not the duty of every member of this Convention honestly to advocate what he believes to be best for all the people of Ohio, or do you expect to confuse me by that question? Very well, then, I say that every one of us here advocates that which he believes best as to the particular system of taxation.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I would like to know if one class is to take up the whole of the discussion in the Convention? They have been doing it so far, and I want to have a vote on this thing before it is talked to death.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is that a question.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you ask me?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Yes, and I want further to ask, was it not the arrangement that the vice president, who is supposed to be honest, was to be kept out of the chair until this matter was to be finally determined?

Mr. HALFHILL: I will answer your question. I know of no such arrangement as suggested, and I will say further that I waited patiently three or four days to make an address giving my theories on the subject of classification. Now I ask you, have I taken more than a fair share of the time?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I don't think you ever waited any three or four days to get a chance to talk in this Convention.

Mr. HALFHILL: I have had no opportunity before, and, furthermore, I have contended against the calling of the previous question always, and you gentlemen who are in favor of the general property tax have always been very ready to move that question, and have moved the question, and you have taken your share of the time.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: No; we haven't. Mr. Doty took two hours and a half.

Mr. HALFHILL: Suppose he did. Is he not chairman of the committee?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Yes, but he is not entitled to talk a week and tire everybody out.

Mr. HALFHILL: I will listen to you as long as you or anybody on the other side wants to talk, but I am within my rights, and I do not propose to be criticised by any member of the Convention as long as I am within my parliamentary rights.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I am not making any reflection on you; I am just simply asking for information.

Mr. HALFHILL: I will say to the honorable gentleman from Harrison county, whom I have always respected, that I think it comes with poor grace for him to charge me as a member of the Convention on this floor with being a party to anything unparliamentary. I have my rights here, and I expect to assert them. If anybody thinks I have exhausted my time under the rules, I beg to notify him that I have all the time there is, and as I am pretty able-bodied, I will stay just as long as I want to.

Mr. WINN: You know that before the recess was taken and while this matter was under discussion last week there was a list made up by the president of those who desired to talk and that your name was on the list?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. WINN: You spoke in your order?

Mr. HALFHILL: Where?

Mr. WINN: When your name was reached.

Mr. HALFHILL: Today?

Mr. WINN: Whenever you obtained recognition.

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not know where my name appears on the list. I know I put my name on the list three days ago.

Mr. WINN: Do you know that the president of the Convention destroyed that list today and made out another new list?

Mr. HALFHILL: The gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] certainly does not intend me to answer that question. If he intends to cast any reflection on the president of the Convention I would counsel him to cast that reflection when the president is present. Wait until that time to make the charges. While I have not always agreed with the president of the Convention, yet I have never gone behind his back to tell him about it.

Taxation.

Mr. WINN: Did you have any great trouble in getting recognition today?

Mr. HALFHILL: It has taken me three days to get recognized.

Mr. NYE: I want to ask a question about double taxation. I ask this for information. Suppose you have $1,000 and you want to buy a farm worth $2,000, and I have $1,000 and I want to get a livery stable or any other business worth $2,000. If you exempt the $1,000 that is owed on the farm, ought you not only to exempt the $1,000 that I owe on the livery stable or the business I bought? I ask that for information.

Mr. HALFHILL: As I stated in my remarks, it would be impossible here to outline a statutory scheme on this point. I say that double taxation exists today and you agree with me.

Mr. NYE: Yes, and I want to avoid it.

Mr. HALFHILL: My belief is it is possible to avoid it, but into what difficulties we will get in avoiding it I am unable to say, but I do believe it can be avoided. That is as far as I can answer the question. I entirely agree with you on the question of wanting to avoid double taxation.

Mr. ANDERSON: Would you have any objection to letting the friends of classification frame a proposal and those for uniform rule get up a proposal, and submit them to the voters?

Mr. HALFHILL: I would be delighted to do that. If I thought there was that much justice and good common sense in the Convention I would be delighted.

Mr. ELSON: You said that we have double taxation in Ohio and that we ought to get rid of it?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSON: Is it possible to do so?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. ELSON: A tax on an income is a double tax?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. ELSON: Money.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. ELSON: Mortgages?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. ELSON: Can you get rid of all that?

Mr. HALFHILL: It might be right and just in one instance to tax an income, or tax a property from which the income is derived, and it might be wrong and unjust in another instance, and under these differing circumstances justice and equity would say where an exemption should be made.

Mr. ELSON: You would leave all such discriminations to the legislature?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes; I would leave it to the legislature to frame just and equitable rules of taxation.

Mr. EVANS: What inherent justice is there or can there be in favor of this so-called uniform rule?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have endeavored to denounce the uniform rule as generally bad. If I have not made my position plain to the Convention on that point I believe I shall be unable to do so.

Mr. HOLTZ: The inequality in the valuation of property is one of your arguments for classification?

Mr. HALFHILL: That is an illustration and not an argument, a pointing out of a single thing that is wrong.

Mr. HOLTZ: Suppose at the beginning of the last decennial appraisement one man had $10,000 in money and another man had $10,000 that he put in real estate at that time. At this present appraisement the $10,000 in money is still $10,000 in money, but the real estate will probably represent $15,000 or $18,000. Which is the standard of value, is it the land or the money?

Mr. HALFHILL: There is no standard of value.

Mr. HOLTZ: It looks to me that money is the standard of value.

Mr. HALFHILL: There never was any standard of value and never can be under the uniform rule. It is a fraud and never was capable of demonstration, as I think was clearly stated in the argument of Mr. Doty, the chairman of the committee. I fully agree with that part of his argument.

Mr. WATSON: Not impugning your motives, do you know who is to follow you with an amendment, whether it is the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] or the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY]?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have no idea who is going to offer amendments or substitutes other than the one I have presented, and which I labored at earnestly when I was away from the Convention during the recess over Sabbath.

Mr. WATSON: Aren't you aware of any plan to carry on this discussion for the purpose of wearing us out by adjournment or any other way?

Mr. DOTY: No, and you don't either.

Mr. HALFHILL: I did not know it was possible to wear out the gentleman from Guernsey.

Mr. WATSON: Another question: Are you sure that the list upon which our names were recorded last week to talk upon this question has been destroyed? Don't you know many of our names were eliminated?

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you?

Mr. WATSON: Are you aware of that?

Mr. HALFHILL: You have impugned some gentleman's motives.

Mr. WATSON: I have done it openly.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then state your man openly.

Mr. WATSON: It has been destroyed by the chair. The list now up there is not the list on which I recorded my name last week.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you mean to say that the chair has surreptitiously and wrongfully destroyed the list your name was on?

Mr. WATSON: I mean to say that the list on which my name was recorded is not in existence, and that a new list without my name on it is on the desk now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HALFHILL: I rise to a point of order.

The president here resumed the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: What has this to do with the subject under discussion. I have been wanting to get recognition to move the previous question. These gentlemen are out of order, and discussing things not at all before the Convention, and as a member of this Convention I am disgusted with it.

Mr. HALFHILL: So am I.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: The insinuation that a list has been destroyed is out of order.

Mr. HALFHILL: I agree with you.

Taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I don't care whether the gentleman agrees with me or not. I have some rights here as well as anybody else.

Mr. HALFHILL: Nobody that I know of has been trying to deprive anybody of any rights.

Mr. LAMPSON: Don't you think this whole situation is as bad as the "Crime of seventy-three"?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes, and is a crime of nearly the same nature. I would like to know if the gentleman from Guernsey imputes to me any knowledge of those things he has suggested?

Mr. WATSON: I simply asked if you were aware of those things.

Mr. HALFHILL: I have said I have no such knowledge.

Mr. WATSON: Do you know that Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, is to introduce the next amendment, and that Mr. Doty is to introduce the next one?

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a question of personal privilege. This is the second time that the gentleman from Guernsey has said that I am going to introduce an amendment after the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] and I don't know anything about it.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not so recorded?

Mr. DOTY: I don't know anything about it.

Mr. WATSON: The gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] said so.

Mr. DOTY: I don't know anything about it, and I don't want any manipulation charged to me. I suggest that you exercise more judgment in choosing your words.

Mr. HALFHILL: I regret that the gentleman from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] in his zeal desires to charge somebody with unparliamentary conduct. I pointed out something that was unparliamentary in the gentleman from Guernsey when he rose last Friday and moved the previous question before we had had any consideration of these two reports, and the Convention agreed with me at that time, and later in the evening session the Convention further agreed and at that time the chairman of the minority of the committee [Mr. COLTON] making this report said that we should have a full right to discussion. Now I would like the gentleman from Guernsey to listen to my answer.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Guernsey will please maintain order as far as it is possible for him so to do.

Mr. HALFHILL: I was just remarking that Professor Colton agreed when he addressed us that it was not the purpose to shut off any debate, and this is the first opportunity I have had to present my views on classification of property for the purposes of taxation. I think it would be wise if there were a number of amendments offered and if the debates were thorough upon each and every one of the amendments, and by what authority or right or rule of decency even, any member can arise in the aisles, be he from Guernsey or any other place, and object to anybody offering an amendment, or the amendments receiving full discussion, I do not know. I thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I offer an amendment. The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 170 as follows: Strike out the words "at present outstanding" in line 10,

Strike out the words "so at present outstanding" in line 13.

Mr. LAMPSON: This is to the original bill and not to Mr. Halfhill's amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is right. I want to say if the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] who has just surrendered the floor, had any guilty knowledge of my amendment, as was intimated by the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON], then he acted uncavalierly toward me, but I absolve him, for my amendment treats of the question of making the bonds of the state and of all political subdivisions thereof free from taxation; and you will recall that the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] discussed that to some extent on the floor. The matters involved in this amendment are so profound that I feel I would not be doing my duty to the state if I failed to try to impress them upon you.

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order. The member has spoken more than twice on this question of taxation of bonds. He spoke at the opening, then made another extensive speech and now is making another one.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I addressed the Convention once on this subject, but not on this amendment at all.

Mr. WINN: The rule is that no member shall speak more than twice on the same subject.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I have spoken only once on this subject.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Hamilton is in order and will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I want to impress it upon you that those who advocate the exemption of the bonds of the state and all political subdivisions thereof from taxation are not interested in the least in the holders of those bonds. We are not here to speak for the holders of those bonds. We are here to speak for the state and the political subdivisions thereof. If it were merely in the interest of the holder of the bonds I would not have said a word in his defense, because he does not interest me in the least.

Now I am going to give you a few concrete illustrations and show how this proposition will work out. I shall start with the proposed issue of $50,000,000 of bonds for good roads. I state that in my judgment there is no shadow of doubt that if these bonds are exempted from taxation as they would be under the present constitution, there will be no difficulty at all in floating them at three and a half per cent, on which basis all our calculations were made in the discussion of the good roads proposition. To that I add that if the bonds are not exempt from taxation it will be impossible to float them under four per cent, and further, in that flotation the difference to the state of Ohio, which is ourselves, which difference we must pay in taxes, will be in round numbers the difference of one-half of one per cent, or about $17,000,000 in the additional charge of interest which must be paid in the form of taxes by the people of the state of Ohio. Now I further venture the statement that if by constitutional enactment you make them subject to taxation, not only will you be not able to float them at less than four per cent, thereby increasing your burden $17,000,000, but the state will get no revenue from them. They will not be listed for taxation if owned in the state, and certainly not listed for taxation if owned outside of the state. A few days ago this Convention passed the home rule proposal for cities, and you all know the great sentiment underlying the home rule was the public ownership of public utilities.

Taxation.

Mr. ANDERSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Pardon me, I have neither a prepared speech nor notes, and you are likely to drive me off at a tangent from what I want to say.

Every city and village, and especially the small ones, expect within a few years to own their own public utilities. They expect, and we have given them the power to acquire the present utilities that may be existing and now owned by private corporations—we have given them the power to acquire them by condemnation, so that if they have the money there is no utility which they can not acquire through legal proceedings, and they will have a jury of twelve men selected from their own neighborhood to determine the value of those privately owned utilities. If you stop and consider a moment that the purchase of those privately owned utilities means a vast outlay of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars throughout the state, and that the purchases will be made by the proceeds of bonds issued by the village and cities, you will understand what the increase of interest may mean to the cities and villages of this state.

Then, too, when you make those bonds subject to taxation, you immediately deprive the bonds of the magnificent market which they have today in the state of Ohio, and you further penalize yourselves by forcing the interest rate up one-half to one per cent. So you are lopping off, or at least making it exceedingly difficult for you to accomplish, public ownership of private utilities by such action as is proposed in the minority report. You see how easily these innocent provisions creep into these reports. You saw section 7 inserted in the best of good faith and yet it would absolutely have nullified one of the vital principles of the home rule proposal.

Now let me point out what is likely to happen in any one of your cities, and I shall not take Cincinnati or Cleveland. There was recently offered to me by brokers in Cincinnati some bonds issued by the city of Youngstown for the purpose of providing funds for the waterworks, and I will therefore refer to the city of Youngstown. These bonds were offered to me last week on a 3.95 basis, showing not only magnificent credit on the part of Youngstown, but facilities for disposing of the bonds. Assume that the city of Youngstown wishes to acquire by condemnation proceedings, the lighting plant, if there is one privately owned in the city of Youngstown. It will require say $2,000,000 to acquire that lighting plant. It can be done through condemnation proceedings if this home rule proposal becomes part of our fundamental law. At present the city of Youngstown can issue securities at four per cent and sell them readily at better than par. My judgment is that the city of Youngstown and all other similar municipalities will be required to pay four and one-half to five per cent when bonds are not specifically exempted from taxation. The difference in the interest between four and five per cent on this one issue is $20,000 per annum. We will assume that the bonds run for forty years, so that in forty years there is forty times twenty thousand or $800,000 excess in interest paid out. In the meantime, of course, the city has been securing in some way the money to pay the interest on those bonds, and as the bonds run forty years the average time of payment would be twenty years. Say that there is interest to be calculated on the $800,000, for twenty years at five per cent. Money doubles at compound interest at five per cent in about thirteen and one-half years. So the city of Youngstown would be penalized the small sum of $2,000,000, an amount equal to the principal of the debt in the one issue of bonds running forty years, if they had to be sold on a five per cent instead of a four per cent basis.

Now you can take that example and apply it all over the state, in every small political subdivision as well as in the larger ones. If this proposal to make the bonds of our municipalities subject to taxation had been cunningly devised by those opposed to home rule they could not have done it better, because, while I do not say it will prevent the consummation of one of the vital principles of home rule, the public ownership of privately owned facilities, it will increase the burden millions and millions of dollars upon the people of the state of Ohio without any direct or immediate benefit to them.

You can readily see from the illustration given of the city of Youngstown that in order for the city to save or secure through taxation the one per cent difference in the rate of interest on the supposed issue of $2,000,000 of bonds at 5 per cent, two things would have to happen; first, all the $2,000,000 bonds would have to be owned by the people of Youngstown; and secondly, all of them would have to be reported for taxation. Now you know that these two conditions are of themselves absolutely impossible. If $50,000 or $100,000 of those bonds were bought and owned by the people of Youngstown and all so owned actually reported by them for taxation, then the city of Youngstown would get back in taxes one-twentieth of the amount which it had paid out in the penalty of that one additional per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Please let me finish. I shall be through in a minute and then will answer any question that is asked me.

Now as to the question of sound policy in this Convention: There are two great schools of taxationists. There is the school of classificationists and the school of uniform rule. There is a difference and a very great difference of opinion, but the uniform-rulers seem to have a majority of this Convention, and yet they are about to defeat their very purpose because they seem to have forgotten or never to have learned, which latter is much more probable, that the wise principle of statesmanship is concession. I am addressing you on the practical side of politics. It may be very foolish so to do, and not up to that high ideal that some of us talk about frequently but forget to practice. Now let us see the position you are in before the people in the state of Ohio. Do not forget that in 1908 there were something like three hundred and forty thousand people in the state of Ohio who voted for classification, not under any Longworth act, but after serious consideration and because it was an issue, and they voted on it accordingly. Three hundred and forty thousand voted for classification. At present the constitution provides for the exemption of bonds issued by the state and all of the political subdivisions thereof. Now you have gained much in many sections of your proposal. In the Lampson amendment and the Anderson amendment you have gained much, those of you who advocate home rule. You have the limitation on taxation, and that is proper and of great importance. I think it is wise, but if that which I advocate to the people of Ohio, and not for any bondholder, whose interest to me is not more than one of those stone pillars—but if you fail to do this patriotic thing by exempting the bonds of the state and all political subdivisions you force us, who might otherwise take our medicine on the other propositions and work with you, to do everything we can to defeat this proposal. We have everything to gain and nothing to lose. Is it not the part of statesmanship and wise public policy not to divide the people of the state of Ohio at the start and offer temptations to oppose your measure? I submit this for your earnest and practical consideration.

Taxation.

Mr. DWYER: I wish you would look at lines 11 and 12 and see whether your amendment covers future issues of school bonds and that they will be exempt from taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I thought it covered everything. That escaped me, but we will put it in. That will be covered.

Mr. JONES: I understood you to say the bonds of Youngstown now could be sold on a four per cent basis, but if this exemption is removed they would have to be sold on a five per cent basis. I want to ask you, as a man having some knowledge, whether you know of any large cities in the United States, whose bonds can not be sold anywhere, whether taxable or nontaxable, on the four per cent basis?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You can answer that question as well as I can. I can say to you that there are any number of towns and villages—

Mr. JONES: I am talking about large cities. I ask you if you can tell this Convention of any large cities in the United States whose bonds will not sell anywhere, taxable or nontaxable, on a four per cent basis?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I will say to you there are very few large cities west of Cincinnati that are able to sell bonds at that rate. Memphis is on a higher basis. Portland, Oregon, is on a higher basis. Vincennes offered me last Saturday public utility bonds on a basis of 5.95. I have read printed circulars about Portland, Oregon, offering public utility bonds—

Mr. JONES: I am not talking about public utility bonds or towns like Vincennes, but I am talking about large cities in this country. Do you not know that the bonds of all large cities will sell on a four per cent basis anywhere, taxable or nontaxable?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I state as a fact, without fear of successful contradiction, that that is not so. I ask you as a banker to tell us what are the city of New York bonds selling for now?

Mr. JONES: Do not New York and Philadelphia and Boston bonds sell on a four per cent basis?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The city of New York bonds are selling at a fraction over four per cent. They have advertised $65,000,000 to be sold on May 19, within two weeks, bearing four and a quarter per cent, because they could not be sold at four per cent.

Mr. JONES: Are they nontaxable?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Nontaxable in the state of New York.

Mr. JONES: How does it come, if there is anything in your argument, that in a city that has four-fifths of the liquid assets of the country, New York, they have to pay four and a half per cent when the bonds are nontaxable in New York?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: First, I do not say they would sell on a four and a half per cent basis. They are selling now on a 4.02 per cent basis. I simply answered your question and said they are offering bonds at four and a half per cent expecting to sell them on a 4.02 to 4.10 basis. And I say, as a complete refutation of your statement, that if the bonds of the city of New York were taxable they would not sell on a better basis than five per cent.

Mr. JONES: Do you not know that if the bonds of the larger cities of this country were offered to any large bank in Ohio that it would be glad to take any amount of them on a four or four and a half per cent basis?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I say they will not do it if they are subject to taxation, because you know and I know that the only reason the banks buy them is to sell them at a profit.

Mr. JONES: You mentioned the other day an instance of where one bank had a million and a quarter of Cincinnati bonds that had been in their hands for forty years, and another place where a bank bought one million and held them during the entire term of the issue. Are not all issues of bonds of large cities bought by the banks that want to hold them as an asset easily convertible and practically as a reserve?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You are familiar with the old axiom that "nothing lies like figures" when not properly presented?

Mr. JONES: I do not know that they are not properly presented.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: What I said was that one bank in the city of New York held a million and a quarter of bonds of the city of Cincinnati and had held them from the time of issue, and that another bank held about a million, and, what you are ignorant of, or you would not make the statement as a banker, is that under the laws of New York those particular bonds are exempt from taxation in the state of New York.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You have given us some information as an expert.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not qualify as an expert.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Well, we are willing to accept it. I want to ask you what I think is a practical question. You have stated that these municipal, township or other public bonds would not be returned for taxation, or that taxes could not be obtained upon them?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do you mean to state that it is not within the range of possibility for the general assembly to devise means whereby intangible property can be put on the duplicate?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not believe it is possible for a general assembly to do that. The general assembly of which you were a member for two or more sessions, and all of those that preceded and followed you, have put upon the statute books what tax experts claim to be the most drastic system of statutes for the bringing out of personal property for taxation that any state in the Union has. You will find that many of the political economists have referred to the drastic laws of the state of Ohio on this subject.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It is true that the constitutionality of certain suggested laws has been in question, and it is said they are a violation of the section of the constitution relative to impairment of contracts. That we could remedy by a constitutional provision.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Let me answer that. I know you are conservative and would not make a misstatement. The constitution of California had in it a provision somewhat similar to that to which you refer, making mortgages in the hands of the mortgagee subject to taxation. There was a right for the mortgagor to deduct the amount of the tax. There was a limitation as to the rate of interest. It seemed to be ironclad. You can refer to Thorpe's Digest for this section. That was a constitutional provision and if there was one section that seemed impossible to get around, that was it. It provided that taxes must be paid on those mortgages and after two or three years' trial—do you recollect the time, Professor Knight?

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not remember.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: After two or three years' trial they changed it by constitutional amendment because experience proved that the mortgagor bore the burden. He had to come to the man lending the money for his terms, and there was always added to the rate of interest an additional half or one per cent on account of the fear or risk that the mortgage could not escape taxation. After the fullest discussion and investigation, that provision was repealed because it was found that the poor man bore the burden, as usual.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I want you to state to the Convention if it is impossible to get those bonds and mortgages on the duplicate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There is one way of getting a small tax on mortgages or on notes and personal property in the form of bonds, and that is by placing them in a separate class bearing a very low rate of taxation; supplement the low special rate by a high penalty for failure to return for taxation and the problem will be solved.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: How will you enforce the penalty if you do not find the bond?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You can not, if you are unable to locate the personal property.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Why mention the penalty then?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It simply appeals to human nature, it is the sword of Damocles. The same element which makes the man refuse to report intangible personal property in Cincinnati, where the rate is fifteen mills, and the bonds bring an income of three eighty-fives, because it is almost forty per cent of the income. Now the same element of human nature that will not pay forty per cent on the income derived from bonds, etc., if the rate were low enough—say one-quarter of one per cent, which would be equal to only ten per cent of the income (and the penalty being high)—would induce the holder to report them. It is essentially a practical question and not one of theoretic morality.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Haven't you omitted the idea that if the men who hold intangible personal property of all sorts would list it the tax rate would be very much lower than it is now and their burden would be lower?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I will acknowledge that without any form of qualification.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It is pretty strange that we must encourage men to do what they ought to do by granting them exemptions in the twentieth century in the state of Ohio.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: But that is the history of the world. In your legislative career have you not often looked at the practical side of the question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Once or twice.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you not look at the practical side in dealing with your fellow men?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Yes. Now a last question: You have cited the case of the city of Youngstown, the credit of which is good, and which is able to offer bonds under the present exemption at an exceedingly low rate of interest. Suppose in benighted Ashtabula there is a man who has $50,000 or $60,000 worth of bonds and he is living there enjoying the police protection and fire protection and every protection the city affords—not many of course, but what we have—

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Judging from their representatives, they are up to date.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Is not he a valuable citizen, and ought they not to desire to have a lot more like him?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You fall into the fallacy of many members of this Convention—the same as the member from Fayette [Mr. JONES] does, so you are in good company.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: And the fallacy is worthy only of the only modern Adam Smith in this Convention. Do you not know that when you lend money at the established rate of six per cent interest, when you are paying one per cent in taxes you are getting a net income of five per cent on your money, and the man who buys a bond that is exempt from taxes takes four per cent, and the taxes are paid in the form of lessened rate of interest, so the bondholder's income is twenty-five per cent less than that of the banker?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Well, get down to Youngstown now.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It is running in a circle. That is where the great fallacy of this whole proposition comes in. I say to you that the man who is buying municipal bonds in your neighborhood is paying a greater proportion of taxes than any single person in Youngstown, not excepting the man who owns real estate, because the rate of lessened interest on bonds is on one hundred per cent of value, while the real estate is very often assessed on seventy-five to eighty per cent of its real value.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am afraid not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You are too fair-minded not to accept the correctness of this principle.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am afraid not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Now there is one more proposition to which I want to call the attention of the Taxation.

Convention which is remarkable if you think over it for a minute. A person today who is taking (as we in Cincinnati are doing,) 3.85 per cent income on our city bonds, is getting one-third less income than he received ten years ago. It is a startling proposition and shows how wonderfully this exemption of municipal bonds from taxation has worked out to the credit of the different cities in the state and on what a relatively low basis our bonds are selling in the state.

According to the United States statistics the cost of living in the past ten years is about fifty-five per cent greater than ten years ago.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The same kind of living?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: So far as statisticians can arrive at it, but we won't quibble on that. Those are the statistics of the United States department. Therefore bonds selling on a 3.85 basis now, are selling on the equivalent of 2.50 as of ten years ago, bearing always in mind the lessened purchasing power of the dollar today.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Now one more question. You stated the other day that the man who had his property or wealth in four per cent bonds at the rate limited to fifteen mills would pay about forty per cent of his income?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: And a man with $10,000 in merchandise probably would make more out of that, but it would be subject to the same rate of taxation. Now if the man in business handling merchandise pays rent and interest and taxes and guarantees his help and puts his whole life in the business, is it not pure assumption on your part that he is getting any more net out of his $10,000 than the other man, who does not have to lay awake at night and can spend his time in South Africa or Egypt, or anywhere else, knowing that what is left after he has defrauded the public out of taxes would enable him to continue during the period of his life free of care?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: He is not defrauding the public out of anything.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: He would be if the municipal bonds were taxed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It is not a question of morality at all. It is a question of self preservation. I made that point as clear as the English language could make it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I do not question the morals, but it is clear that you are assuming that merchandising is unvaryingly successful.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Not at all—I made no such statement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You are assuming that manufacturing is unvaryingly successful, and that the net income is higher than the income on bonds.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: No, sir; I did not assume anything of the kind. All bonds are not good either. Some railroads have been known to default. Every successful business pays a great deal more than four per cent on the capital invested.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That would not affect the principle we are considering; we are assuming they are all good.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I think both sorts of people are needed—the one with idle capital who, because he hasn't the desire, ability or courage, does not engage in business, and he who is willing to take the risks of a mercantile career. The first named furnishes part of the capital to the municipality by buying its bonds so that it can carry on public work.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Should he be exempt from all taxes to live in luxury?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: If you had the proper conception of taxes, you would not ask that question. The exemption of municipal bonds from taxation is not for the benefit of the buyer of the bonds, but for the credit of the city, so that the city can sell its securities at a very low rate of interest.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If he has enough invested in nontaxable bonds he can.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The gentleman from Ashtabula, like a great many others, fails to take into account that great element of human nature against which all statutes are powerless.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I have never wholly believed it was not within the range of possibility to bring intangible property on the duplicate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I have not said it was impossible. I say it is improbable—intangible property is very elusive.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I mean at the same rate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The city of Baltimore has brought out of hiding hundreds of millions in a short period by exercising common sense. Personal property has there been put in a separate class with a rate high enough to bring in a fine revenue, and just low enough, with heavy penalties for non-listing, to tempt and encourage the owners to return same for taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I do not see how you can find it better under the one system than the other.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You do not have to find it. If you make the rate low enough, then capital in the form of this intangible property that now is not listed by the owners, because the uniform rate is confiscatory, will exclaim as did the inhabitants of the West Indies when Christopher Columbus came over in 1492, "We are discovered."

Mr. FLUKE: What is the rate on bonds in Baltimore?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I think it is about four-tenths of one per cent.

Mr. FLUKE: Would not there be more property given in at two-tenths than four-tenths?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Probably—but perhaps not twice as much.

Mr. FLUKE: Four-tenths is an arbitrary rate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Any rate is necessarily an arbitrary one. It is the part of statesmanship to fix on a rate that will produce the largest revenue, with the least friction in its collection. I believe that one question that has bothered the farmers is the question of mortgages, where the farmer does not distinguish between the mortgage note and the land. The sole reason he must always pay taxes on the land is because the land cannot be moved from place to place, nor concealed in a safe deposit vault, as can intangible personal property. If it could be readily moved or easily concealed, the "honest farmer" would be placed in the same class as the "bloated bondholder" who fails to list his property for taxation. If mortgages were put in a separate class bearing not over one-half of one per cent, the state would get a great deal of revenue and the farmer would get a low rate of interest.

Taxation.

Mr. PIERCE: I move to lay the Halfhill amendment and the Harris amendment on the table.

Mr. DOTY: On that I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I demand a division.

Mr. DOTY: I demand the yeas and nays on either division.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: My amendment is not to the Halfhill amendment.

Mr. PIERCE: That being true, I withdraw from my motion the Harris amendment, and I move to lay the Halfhill substitute on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON: I believe, in the first place, the Harris amendment was out of order, because the business before the Convention was the Halfhill substitute, and I can not imagine how we can table something that is not before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is to lay the amendment of Mr. Halfhill on the table.

Mr. WINN: A point of order. The motion of the member from Butler was to lay both the substitute of the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL], and the amendment of the delegate from Hamilton on the table. The gentleman from Butler [Mr. PIERCE] is willing to withdraw part of his motion, but I seconded it and I do not consent to the withdrawal.

Mr. DOTY: Upon that I demand a division of the question.

Mr. ANDERSON: A point of order. We have first the original proposition, then the Anderson substitute was adopted for the report of the committee, then we added to that amendment the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Allen, and the substitute amendment was the only thing at that time before the Convention. Then we have an amendment offered by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] to the Anderson substitute. Now I insist that under the rule the Harris amendment was and is out of order.

Mr. LAMPSON: The gentleman is too late to make the point of order. If he desired to make that point of order it should have been made at the time the Harris amendment was offered.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is not well taken. The question is, Shall the amendment of the delegate from Allen be tabled?

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded, taken, and resulted—yeas 63, nays 37, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Dwyer,	Johnson, Madison,

So the motion to table the Harris amendment prevailed.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to get straightened out a little. We ordered the Anderson substitute printed?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: Whose amendment was it in line 10 that struck out after "bond" the words "at present outstanding"?

Taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That was just what I tried to put in.

The president here recognized the gentleman from Warren.

Mr. EARNHART: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: In the matter of taxation, or rather the methods employed to create a system for levying of taxes, we are all vitally interested. It is the patriotic duty of every man to pay his just share without partiality or equivocation. The uniform rule is the only fair method for the distribution of the burdens imposed. Classification opens the door for favoritism and evasion. Its tendency is to protect the idle rich at the expense of the toiling masses. The Smith one per cent law is made the butt of ridicule by classificationists, who are in the boat of singletaxers and are trying to propel their unseaworthy craft against the current of popular sentiment. They seek to shield those best able to pay under the pretense that by giving them a lower rate they may be induced to list their property for taxation, and thereby derive some benefit which is now withheld. This would be a cowardly compromise with predatory criminals. What a spectacle! Must we treat with conspirators to induce them to partially obey the law, or shall we try some other means to regulate them? It would be more creditable and vastly more profitable to invoke and exercise the Jacksonian spirit and tell them to "come in or by the Eternal we will whip you in."

The Ohio tax commission has been doing a splendid work in increasing the aggregate of the grand tax duplicate despite the efforts of privileged classes and singletaxers to obstruct their efforts and revile their purpose. They deserve the hearty co-operation of every man who wants to be found upon the side of "equal and exact justice" in the matter of raising revenue for public expenses. It must be borne in mind that the legislature to be elected next fall should be men of intelligence and courage, whose sympathy will be in the interest of the masses and who will stand firm against the intrigue of the designing classes. It will be within their power and their imperative duty to provide means whereby each interest shall be subject to a uniform rate of taxation. And any violation of this principle should be subject to a prison sentence. All notes, mortgages, bonds and other papers of money value should bear the stamp of the assessor on tax day, each year, and be non-collectable without it. This could be easily provided for by the legislators if they were not susceptible to bribery.

There is no justification in any kind of state, county, township or municipality bonds being exempt from taxation. Their greater security will always be a potent factor in their being sold at a lower rate of interest than can be obtained by the private borrower, even though they were taxed the same as other property. Their identity can be maintained the same as notes and mortgages and this plunderbund oligarchy can be brought within the pale of common decency. The old familiar cry of special privilege that "this would drive capital out of the state" would be set up, but would soon be disproved despite the efforts of bondbrokers and corporation lawyers to fatten by plying their vocation. Now that real property is appraised at its full value, and with the one per cent law in force, there is no longer any form of excuse for concealment.

The argument that it is human nature to evade the law is a sad commentary upon the dignity of the present-day civilization. I cannot conceive how any member can stand upon this floor and subordinate what his conscience must tell him is simple justice to a desultory scheme of unprincipled expediency. Such dogmas ought to bring the blush of shame upon the countenance of every sane person. Highly favorable conditions to the borrowing of money, whether it be by the individual or corporation, generally leads to extravagance and want. The present practice of saddling a debt upon posterity greatly exceeds the limit of propriety. Instead of transmitting to them a valuable heritage, we encumber them with an unjust liability. Present needs do not warrant such a procedure. We need not take a backward step or even slacken our pace in the march of progress, but should economize, and avoid riotous living.

Tax bonds rob the small counties and center the money in the large cities. It is said assessors are incompetent. If so, we should elect better men and not change the principle. The chairman of the Taxation committee declared in his speech that classification would benefit farmers. Does he have a special commission to speak for them, or is he simply acting in the role of the Good Samaritan?

The people unconsciously exempted bonds from taxation by voting a straight ticket under which an affirmative vote on the amendment was ingeniously placed. They are now anxious to correct their mistake if given an opportunity to do so. It is the duty of this Convention to give them such opportunity. If cities need more revenue, let them see to it that a larger duplicate is obtained and all will be well. The country districts have some rights that should be respected.

The Convention here recessed until this evening at seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess and was called to order by the president.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I purpose to use but a few minutes in the discussion of the tax proposition now before us.

I think if there is one thing in which our constitution should be explicit and provide for some degree of permanence it is the matter of taxation. The uncertainty as to the rates in the past has afforded the excuse for hiding property, a practice that has been approved, though it has struck at our integrity and patriotism.

I am earnestly in favor of the limitation of rates, and that limit should be one per cent, but I realize that some of the cities claim that it will be impossible to carry on their local government under that rule, and as we do not wish to impose any hardship on any district, I voted for the increase as provided for in the Lampson amendment, although I think that if the same efforts were to be made to find the hidden property as are made to increase the rate, there would be no necessity even for asking an increase.

I am pleased that the amendment to continue bonds on the nontaxable list was defeated, and now, in connection with that, we should adopt the suggestion of the member from Meigs [Mr. STEWART], and write a mandate into the constitution compelling the bond-issuing authorities to provide for the retiring each year of a certain per cent, and not allow the practice to continue that has been accountable for the conditions that now exist in some places, where bonds and obligations are maturing and no provision is made for their payment, except the refunding process.

We would certainly think that any business enterprise, corporate or private, that failed to provide for the meeting of at least a portion of its debts each year was not a very carefully managed concern, and it would take only a few years to prove the unsoundness of that kind of financiering.

The whole discussion upon this subject of taxation seems to be based on how to secure more money, greater revenues, and scarcely a word or suggestion as to how the expenditures could be reduced. How would it be if some real efforts were to be made in establishing some intelligent, effective budget system for each division of the local government, with a view of introducing sound business economy in the management of the business affairs of our state and local governments?

When we once come to consider that a dollar wasted in public expenditures is a dollar just the same, and cease to treat it as a joke, but demand that public business be just as carefully transacted as a well-managed private business, we will have made some progress.

I should like to see written into the constitution the elimination of the direct state tax. This provision was made in both the majority and the minority reports, and should be retained in the substitute.

The mixing of state and local levies and the taxation of the same property for both state and local purposes affords the opportunity and inducement to conceal from the taxpayers the real cost of local government, and it would remove the generous rivalry which now exists in every county to keep down the appraisements in order to avoid paying more than the proper part of the state taxes.

Eliminate this state levy and then direct our efforts to relieving, in a measure at least, the general taxpayer whose property is subject to the intolerable burdens for the support of county and municipality.

I quote from Charles J. Bullock, professor of economics, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.:

Intangibles escape pretty largely, of course, but tangibles are undervalued. That is particularly true in the country when they value cattle. It is also true with assessors in industrial districts when they value machinery and stock in trade. Tangibles are undervalued and intangibles escape or are undervalued, but doubtless the evasion is greater in the case of intangibles than tangibles.

The small home-owners and the farmers have been the taxpayers that have been imposed upon under the old regime. With the new they are satisfied. But now comes the clamor for the classification of property, and every petition and every request have come from other than the home-owners, because they feel that if the present law is strictly enforced and there is some real effort made looking to economy in the administering of our public affairs, there will be some relief afforded to those who are entitled to it. Two farmers have said their taxes are lower under the present Smith law to one that has said the taxes were higher, notwithstanding the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] characterized this statement as buncombe. He supposed that the secretary of agriculture had asked for answers to this one question alone. He did not know that thirty other apt and pertinent questions were included on the same sheet, and interesting answers given to all.

Mr. DOTY: You do not contend that the Smith Law lowers taxes?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I contend that we have gotten away from the system of appraising, that we are appraising up to one hundred per cent, and under that arrangement, with a one per cent limit, there is no doubt that taxes have been lower than they were.

Mr. DOTY: You recognize that the one per cent law is not an assessment law?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: It is the means of securing the amount of money necessary to be raised by taxation.

Mr. DOTY: Is not the assessment taken care of by another statute?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: I do not think I used the word buncombe, but that is neither here nor there. Do you not recognize that the Smith tax law had nothing to do at all with the raising or lowering of anybody's taxes?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: No, sir.

Mr. DOTY: Do you contend that the Smith tax law increased or lowered taxes?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: That, in connection with the requirement that property should be valued at one hundred per cent.

Mr. DOTY: Why should it raise some and lower others?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I cannot answer that.

Mr. DOTY: Is it not because of the assessment?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: No, sir; it is more likely that the people whose taxes were increased had improvements.

Mr. DOTY: That is entirely a matter of appraisement then?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: It is a matter of appraisement, but if that property were not there to appraise their rate would not be lower under that one per cent.

Mr. DOTY: Has the one per cent anything to do with it? Is it not the assessment entirely?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I cannot concede that. The whole contention seems to be that intangible property escapes taxation, and yet the advocates of classification do not seem to be able to suggest how this kind of property is to be reached even under the classification scheme, except that because of the low rate they propose to place upon this intangible property it will induce the holders of this property to list the same for taxation. Then they proceed to show how the one per cent limit, a reduction of over one-half of the former rate, has been an entire failure; in other words, they might as well acknowledge that if a property holder is willing to perjure himself for a one per cent tax, he will do it for one-half per cent. I contend that what we need is to give our moral and hearty support to our tax commission in their earnest efforts to find this hidden property. If they are hampered by the lack of laws to enforce the listing of this property, then I believe the legislature will grant some additional power, since now there can be no reason for any loyal citizen to seek to evade his taxes. In this connection I wish to read from a clear and fair statement in an editorial of the Ohio State Journal of April 24, 1912, and a comment thereon by another paper:

It is said the assessors will add materially to the personal property list for taxation. Most of them are pushing their work with vigor, and are adding vast sums that have not heretofore appeared on the tax duplicate. It has not appeared heretofore because of the high rate. A property holder considered it oppression to pay three per cent on his possessions. It was, but he should have returned his property notwithstanding.

Now the incentive to perjury and dishonesty has been withdrawn. Public authority no longer encourages the property owner to tell a lie. The one per cent rate promotes integrity, which is a greater thing than plenty of revenue. The lowest public policy imaginable is fixing a rate that men will lie out of. We can better do without schools, fire protection, parks, or anything else, than honest and faithful citizens.

We are making more today in the honest returns of property than the revenue will amount to, for a true life is measured not by money, but by virtue and integrity.—Ohio State Journal.

The Journal advances moral ideas which are ideal, but in some respects its reasoning appears lame. As a matter of fact, the reform so far applies only to chattels, and today chattels pay less than ever before, and real property more.

It may well be doubted how sincere is the virtue which needs a bonus for its integrity. It may well be doubted what incentive to honesty appears in increased valuations and lowering rates. It may well be doubted how long such honesty would endure, if it exists at all, when the bonus is no longer in sight.

The incentive to perjury is not withdrawn. Its ground is shifted. The man who will lie for $100 will lie for $50. What is needed is a system which will compel the listing of all property, chattel as well as real, and enforce it. It is poor business to give Paul a part of Peter's property, to induce Paul to put on the front of an honest man.

When the papers of this state, such as the Ohio State Journal, join with us and advocate the listing of property, both from a sense of duty and integrity, and forget to intimate that the whole scheme is political buncombe, and cease to excuse the unfair listing of property, then we will begin to make some noticeable strides in the correction of unequal burdens in taxation.

To show that classification of property does not produce the results that are claimed for it, in reference to intangible property, let me state that section 13 of the constitution of Virginia permits the classification of property.

At the Fourth International Tax Conference, held in Milwaukee in 1910, Mr. T. C. Townsend, state tax commissioner of West Virginia, was discussing taxation work in West Virginia, and Mr. Byrd, of Virginia, asked Mr. Townsend the following questions:

Mr. Byrd: How do you equalize your assessments of personal property? How do you bring out the intangible property? What is your method? Is that under central control or under local control?

Mr. Townsend: That is under central and local control combined. We are like a great many other states, we do not bring it out. We can't get at all of it.

Mr. Byrd: I am interested in the question of how to get that personal property out, particularly intangible property. I was in hopes you had some method by the exercise of some central authority by which you could bring that out. We are laboring with that question now in Virginia.

Mr. Townsend: We have labored in West Virginia for a low tax rate. We cannot classify property for taxation. I would recommend we pursue the policy adopted by the states of Pennsylvania and Maryland; that is, a specific rate on intangible property. But inasmuch as we cannot do that under the restrictive provisions of our constitution, we are in favor of a low rate, and we have reduced the rate to such an extent that we have brought out a great deal more intangible property than we had on the books under the high rate.

This is certainly a frank admission that the hidden property is the source of as much annoyance in Virginia, with its classification, as it is in West Virginia or any other state where the uniform rule prevails. A challenge as to rates was issued by Mr. Townsend to the states of the American Union, and who accepted the challenge? Was it a state with classification? No, but one with the uniform rule—Kansas. Ohio has taken her lesson from West Virginia, and if we only sustain and uphold our tax commission by a clear and expressed public opinion, we will soon have removed the odium from our method of taxation.

Let us for once try the expediency of upholding the law and the constitution; having resorted to everything else, we might try the experiment of obeying them.

I maintain that the good citizens of Cleveland have a duty to perform in the investigating of the returns of some of their corporations, and if the reduction of from ten to sixty per cent from last year's personal returns is not justifiable, then the assessing officers and the corporations should be punished. The citizenship of Cleveland and of every other taxing district should stand as a unit for full and honest returns from every owner of property, be the owner a corporation or an individual.

Provide for the elimination of the direct tax by the state, and nothing remains but for each taxing district to secure the just portion from each property owner within its limits.

I am pleased that the substitute of the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] was offered first, because it would have left the whole matter to the legislature. This would open up the fight every session of the general assembly, and results would be very unsatisfactory, as shown by an address of Clement F. Robinson, of Portland, Me.:

Taxation.

After examining the mass of legislation which was put forth by the comparatively few legislatures which met this year, and after noting how few of the acts on the subject of taxation show any real attempt to grapple with the difficult problems of the method of obtaining revenue, one is more than ever convinced of a lack of well-educated public opinion, and of the need of conferences such as this to formulate and direct the needed reforms.

Mr. Halfhill said that with classification would come the shifting of the burden of taxation from real estate to personal property. Listen to what Professor Charles J. Bullock, of Harvard, said under the caption of classification—that classification of property must be based upon facts, and the first fact it must recognize is that the heavy taxes needed at the present time to defray the increased cost of local government must fall, chiefly, upon real estate:

Intangible property is easiest of all to conceal or remove from one jurisdiction to another. It can be taxed successfully only by making the rate moderate and uniform throughout the widest possible area. For this reason it is desirable not only that the rate should be the same through an entire state, but that the various commonwealths should, so far as practicable, bring their rates to a common standard. In the next place, intangible property consists of investments from which the owners on an average derive but simple interest; perhaps five per cent is a fair average in most parts of the United States. In a reasonable system of classification, then, it would seem that the rate for intangibles should not exceed such a figure as a government can collect with reasonable certainty from property that is easily concealed and yields only an income of five per cent. Experience shows that from five to six per cent of the income is a reasonable figure for any tax upon intangible wealth; and that taxes exceeding this rate, by causing evasion, are less productive than those which do not exceed it. Pennsylvania and Maryland have learned this lesson and have demonstrated that a tax of 30 or 40 cents per $100 is the safe limit in the taxation of intangibles.

Much has been said in reference to the inconsistency of the uniform advocates, because they allow some classification; they are no more inconsistent than those favoring classification. For proof listen to the same authority quoted above. Professor Charles J. Bullock says:

I take it that we are all agreed that our committee on uniform classification of real estate have performed a very important task, and that this report is a very substantial record of progress. It is not to be expected, however, that any such first report could cover all the ground; and the report is such as to give me at least a desire for more of the same sort of thing. I am going to move, Mr. Chairman, that the report be accepted, and then serve notice at this time that I am going to submit to the committee on resolutions a resolution asking for the continuation of this committee, with a view of further investigation. I believe, for instance, that if this committee should send this report to every state and local official to whom they applied for information, they would receive a volume and a kind of information about local conditions that would enable them to bring out a report next year that would be of great value.

The resolution referred to by Professor Bullock is as follows:

WHEREAS, This conference is of the opinion that the adoption by the several states of the Union of an inheritance tax law, framed along the lines of that submitted by the special committee of the association, would provide a fair return to the state treasuries, avoid double taxation, and promote interstate comity;

Resolved, That the secretary of the International Tax Association be requested to forward to the proper officials of the several states of the Union a copy of the proposed law, together with the text of this resolution, with a request to submit the same to the proper committee of the legislature at its next session.

What is the idea of modern taxation tendencies? I quote from page 304, Third International Conference, 1909:

In the taxation efforts of the nation there are three distinct tendencies:

First. The exemption of credits and the gradual shifting of the burden of taxation from personal property to land holdings.

Second. The employment of taxation as an introductory and partial agency in the regulation of mercantile and manufacturing corporations.

Third. A recognition of the principle which fixes taxation upon the earning power of man and property.

What report was made to the conference in reference to Ohio's recent laws and the creating of a tax commission? On page 269, Fourth International Conference, 1910, is the following:

By creating a permanent tax commission Ohio has this year joined in a movement, inaugurated a few years ago by some of its neighboring states, which seems to have won the general support both of practical administrators and of theorists. Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan and West Virginia, by centralizing their tax systems, have increased their revenues and equalized the burdens of taxation, and Ohio seems inclined to attempt the same result. The Ohio law is the most elaborate of any I have seen, and embodies the most effective terms of the acts in those states which have been taken as models.

And I only cite this because it has been charged that all the argument produced by the uniform advocates is unsupported by any worthy or learned authority.

Taxation.

Mr. HALFHILL: The maximum rate of one cent under the present valuation is about equal to the rate of three cents under the valuation of 1910?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I think so.

Mr. HALFHILL: So that when this amendment proposed by Mr. Lampson of twelve mills goes into the constitution it will equal thirty-six mills under the old valuation?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes, sir.

Mr. HALFHILL: And this proposal then does raise the tax limit as fixed by the legislature to the extent of six mills?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes; I think I stated in the beginning that I was very favorable to the one per cent limit, but if there is any truth in the statement that they can not possibly get along with that one per cent limit, I would vote for the Lampson amendment on that account. In our town and county we can get along on the one per cent.

Mr. HALFHILL: This twelve mills in the Lampson amendment applies to property outside of a municipality?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I am very sorry it does. I would like to see the amendment general.

Mr. HALFHILL: And the limit in this—the extreme limit—is fifteen mills?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes, but it is not mandatory. It is permissive.

Mr. HALFHILL: Suppose in raising levies in the city they find it necessary to raise in the country also?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I don't think it will be necessary.

Mr. HALFHILL: Are you in favor of putting a tax limit into the constitution?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then by putting this limit in here have you not voluntarily voted to raise the tax limit to the extent of six mills on property outside of the municipality?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: As I stated, out of consideration to the municipalities I am willing to have that done.

Mr. HALFHILL: You could raise it in the municipalities and not outside?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes; we could have done that, and I shall not be surprised if it is yet done.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not suppose that the legislature will be prevailed upon immediately to repeal the existing one per cent law, and then the only limit will be in the constitution?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: They might be prevailed on if there is no limit in the constitution. They could not go above twelve mills.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not suppose that the legislature will justify itself by saying that this Convention raised the tax limit?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: It is possible.

Mr. HALFHILL: And, therefore, they will repeal the other law?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I do not know what they will do. I do not know but what, if the opportunity is presented, I will vote to retain the one per cent.

Mr. LAMPSON: Does not the gentleman know that we do not limit at all, but just put a maximum above which the legislature cannot go, and if we do not put any maximum—

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: The legislature can go as high as it pleases.

Mr. NORRIS: I understand that this proposal now under consideration is the amendment introduced by Mr. Lampson. Is that it?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: That is part of it.

Mr. NORRIS: Does that limit taxes at all?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes.

Mr. NORRIS: How?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: It provides for a limitation of twelve mills.

Mr. NORRIS: It provides for a limitation of twelve mills?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes; twelve mills for the country districts and fifteen mills in the municipalities.

Mr. NORRIS: Excluding interest and sinking fund?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes.

Mr. NORRIS: Can the legislature not assess fifty mills for sinking fund purposes, and is there in fact any limit as to the sinking fund and the issuing of bonds?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Under the present law?

Mr. NORRIS: Under this proposal.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: No.

Mr. NORRIS: I suspect not, too. So, is there any limit at all?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I do not know. The words, "exclusive of sinking fund", of course, do not apply to the country.

Mr. NORRIS: They do not?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS: I advise the gentlemen in charge of the matter to look to the wording of their proposal.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: The proposal, as far as the country is concerned, gives an extreme limit of twelve mills.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Mr. President: The question of taxation is an important one, not only in this country but in every country in the world. The first duty of the government is to protect its citizens so that they may enjoy their life, their liberty and their property. A government that does that well has furnished sufficient reason for its existence. A government can not be maintained without money. Its very existence depends upon its authority to compel its citizens to contribute to its support. A government to be successful must have the confidence and support of its citizens and this is especially true in a republic. A hated government can not last. I presume that the one thing that has caused more discontent in this country than all the other questions combined is the question of taxation. I do not know that I can furnish the Convention with an information that will help solve that question. After this question had been discussed and thoroughly considered by the committee on Taxation, and no agreement reached, I agreed to sign the majority report so that it could be presented to the Convention for its consideration. I might further add that the report was signed with a positive understanding that I would be at liberty to speak and vote just as I thought best when the matter was considered by the Convention. I was somewhat amused when my friend, the member from Cuyahoga county [Mr.

Taxation.

DOTY], said that the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] and the member from Medina [Mr. WOODS] were paying the taxes of the city people and did not know it. The chairman of the committee on Taxation says property does not pay taxes. People pay taxes. I read something like that many years ago. There is much truth in it. Notwithstanding he asserted that property does not pay taxes and never did pay taxes, yet he claimed that every one who owns property desires to have his particular class of property exempted. I quite agree with him that people pay taxes. Yes, every one of them, men, women, children imbeciles and idiots, all are supposed to pay taxes if they own property, and I sometimes think that those who do not own property pay taxes also. Not only do they pay taxes, but they pay more than their just share of the taxes for the support of the government. It is claimed by many that the consumer pays all the taxes; perhaps it is true that the consumer in the end pays the taxes.

In the discussion in regard to classification of property for taxation much is said about the single tax. If classification is right, and if there is a demand for it, I think it is wrong at this time to oppose it because of the claim that it will lead to single tax. In my opinion classification will not lead to single tax; it has nothing whatever to do with that subject, and if it should prove a good thing it would have a tendency to prevent the adoption of single-tax measures.

I do not know whether I am a singletaxer or not, but I do know that if there ever is a landed aristocracy in this country, or if the land in this country is owned by persons who do not farm it, and if we become a nation of tenant farmers, then single tax will not hurt the land owner, for he will simply shift the taxes upon the consumer, who will be compelled to pay it. Nothing is more certain.

I repeat, I do not know whether I am in favor of the single tax or not, but I do know that all this cry about single tax does not frighten me in the least.

There is a great deal of discussion about the classification of property for taxation. I am inclined to think that a just classification might be a good thing but that it should not be made in the interest of any particular class.

It is sometimes supposed that all classes of intangible property should be taxed at its full value in money, and if it is not so taxed corporations will be relieved from contributing their just share of taxes for the support of the government. In my opinion that is a fallacious supposition. The taxation of all classes of intangible personal property has never been a success no matter what penalties were attached thereto.

In his discussion of this question I was surprised to hear the member from Fayette county say that no one in that county ever evaded or even attempted to evade paying his just share of the taxes, and in the next breath say that the people in the same county elected their assessors in the past with the understanding that the property of the county should be assessed at less than its true value in money.

In this discussion I wish to read a few paragraphs taken from a collection of essays by Bolton Hall in a book entitled "Who Pays Your Taxes?" These paragraphs will be found in chapter 7, entitled "Robbing One Another.' This chapter is Mr. T. G. Shearman's lecture delivered before the Ohio legislature about twenty-five years ago:

There is no more persistent notion than that the taxation of personal property will transfer the burdens of government to corporations and relieve various classes of the community, especially the farmer, from taxation that they are little able to bear.

In some states the business of perjury is mostly confined to the assessors who regularly make returns which they know to be false but cannot make true. In others, such as Ohio, Vermont and Connecticut, perjury is the business of the taxpayers.

Experienced Ohio assessors say that the most honest returns of property are always made by the poorer classes and the most inadequate returns by millionaires, while widows, who have no experience in business and trustees who represent widows and orphans, are taxed upon every dollar that they own.

In 1879 California adopted a new constitution. It was carried through by the votes of farmers. Merchants, bankers and capitalists generally voted against it. Under that law it was attempted to get most of the chattel property of the state listed at a fair value; with this result: In 1880 the personal property of San Francisco, not including money, amounted to $68,584,000, but in 1886, six years after the constitution was amended, personal property was returned to the amount of only $48,705,000. But in regard to money returned for taxation the discrepancy was even greater. In 1880 the money returned amounted to $19,747,000, but in 1886, six years later, it amounted to only $6,188,000.

I do not care to be responsible for the accuracy of the statements made in my quotation from Mr. Shearman's lecture, but assuming that these quotations are in the main correct, it is evident that the constitutional amendment in California has not resulted in bringing personal property out of its hiding place. Whether personal property can be placed on the tax duplicate for taxation in Ohio remains to be seen.

Now, in regard to my own views concerning taxation. I very much dislike to have the tax rate fixed in the constitution, but if the rate is placed in the constitution I am opposed to having it fixed at greater than ten mills, or one per cent, for the rural communities. I would like to have the constitution provide for the income tax as well as a tax on inheritances; and while I am personally in favor of a just and fair classification of property for taxation, and think that it would be an excellent thing for the people of the state, because I believe that it could be so arranged as not to discriminate against the farmer, yet, Mr. President and gentlemen, I shall not vote to put classification into the constitution of Ohio because nine-tenths of my constituents are opposed to it, and also because I think its submission might have a tendency to defeat the constitution as a whole.

I am opposed to submitting a proposition to tax the bonds of the state. Only a few years ago an amendment was adopted providing that state and municipal bonds should not be taxed. I voted against the amendment, but notwithstanding the opposition to it, it was carried by a large majority. I think it would be best to give that amendment a little further trial before it is repealed. I think it is very unwise to submit too many questions at this time upon which there is such intense feeling. I hope that this Convention may provide for some progressive measure in regard to taxation so that it may meet with the approval of the people. In my opinion, if such a course is not adopted we might better leave the constitution as it is in regard to that subject.

Mr. JONES, I want to inquire if the gentleman did not misunderstand my statement with reference to evasion of taxes in Fayette county? What I meant to say was that it had been almost universal heretofore to evade taxes as to intangible property, but to my great satisfaction we are greatly improving that situation since the passage of the one per cent law.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I misunderstood the gentleman then, and it does him no harm if he didn't say it. I understood him to say it.

Mr. FACKLER: I offer an amendment and will make a short explanation, not taking any other gentleman's time. This amendment is offered to reach a ground upon which—

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order. The amendment has been offered, but it has not been read.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 170 as follows: Strike out all after the resolving clause and substitute the following:

ARTICLE XII.

SECTION 1. The levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive; therefore no poll tax shall ever be levied in this state, nor service required therein, which may be commuted in money or other thing of value.

SECTION 2. Laws shall be passed, taxing by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, or otherwise; and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money excepting all bonds at present outstanding of the state of Ohio or of any city, village, hamlet, county, or township in this state or which have been issued in behalf of the public schools in Ohio and the means of instruction in connection therewith, which bonds so at present outstanding shall be exempt from taxation; but burying grounds, public school houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property, to an amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars for each individual, may by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published as may be directed by law.

SECTION 6. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution the state shall never contract any debt for purposes of internal improvement.

SECTION 7. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value.

Such tax may also be levied at a different or higher rate upon collateral inheritances than direct inheritances and a portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to such incomes as may be designated by law, but a part of each income not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 9. Laws may be passed providing for excise and franchise taxes and for the imposition of taxes upon the production of coal, oil, gas and minerals.

SECTION 10. No bonded indebtedness of the state or any political subdivisions thereof, shall be incurred or renewed, unless in the legislation, under which such indebtedness is incurred or renewed, provision is made for the payment of not less than two per centum of the principal together with the annual interest on the same, each year, until such indebtedness is paid.

Strike out the title and insert:

"To submit an amendment to article XII by amending sections 1, 2 and 6 and by adding new sections Nos. 7, 8, 9 and 10.—Relative to taxation."

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: In section 2, the first line, should not that read "a uniform rule"?

The SECRETARY: It reads "a uniform rule".

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You read it "the uniform rule".

Mr. EVANS: Would you have any objection to putting "uniform rules" instead of "a uniform rule"?

Mr. FACKLER: I think I would like to adhere to the language that I have. This is an effort made to arrive at a compromise. Sufficient votes have been taken in the Convention to clearly demonstrate that the sentiment of the Convention is against classification, and it seems is against leaving the matter open to the legislature. Frankly I would be in favor of leaving the whole taxation matter to the legislature, but the sentiment of the Convention is against that. On the other hand, an effort has been made to limit the tax rate in the constitution. I believe that such a limitation as a constitutional matter should not be enacted. There are so many good things in the proposal that for the purpose of getting some of the good features provided in it those in favor of limitation should waive that point, inasmuch as they now have the limitation by law more drastic than is proposed here, and it is extremely improbable that the legislature within anything like the near future, unless there should be some great public necessity, or some overwhelming public opinion in its favor, would vote for an increase in the tax rate to such a point as is provided in the amendment of the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON].

Taxation.

This amendment takes out all limitation from the proposal as it now stands. It adds to the inheritance tax provision a section whereby the legislature can tax collateral inheritances at a higher and a different rate than it taxes direct inheritances. Certainly upon collateral inheritances the weight of the taxes would rest most easily, and it would be perfectly natural to allow a larger portion of the estate that goes to collateral heirs to be taken for public use than where it goes to direct descendants.

The next point changed is section 9, which provides for excise and franchise taxes and taxes upon the production of coal, oil, gas and minerals. Now there is no means under the present existing law whereby society can avail itself of the vast resources which have been placed here by Providence, presumably for the benefit of all, but which have been appropriated for the benefit of a few. It cannot be told where oil is, it cannot be taxed until it comes from the ground, and there could not be any fairer method of taxing than to tax it when it comes from the ground.

Section 10 provides that in contracting indebtedness arrangements shall be made to pay it. It provides that at least two per cent of the debt must be paid each year, which would liquidate it in fifty years, a much longer period of time than most of the bonds issued in the state of Ohio run. Certainly neither the state nor any of its subdivisions desires to go into debt without providing for liquidating the debt. Such a course would lead to disaster, and I provide that the debt should be paid gradually. Of course, the debt can be paid more rapidly than here provided, but let this limit be placed so that this Constitutional Convention can say to the different subdivisions, "You must pay on your debts as you contract them, and you must not pass the burden on to succeeding generations."

The income tax is provided for here. There is no fairer way of levying taxes than upon incomes. The man drawing a large income is deriving greater benefits from society than any other man, and upon his shoulders should be placed a very large part of the burden of carrying on the government. Gentlemen, I believe there are so many things of merit in this proposition, and so many things that are progressive and really demanded by the spirit of the times, that it will pay us to lay aside our differences on uniform taxation and classification, and to lay aside our difference on the bond proposition, and to adopt this, and I believe that if we adopt this it will be overwhelmingly ratified by the people at the polls.

Mr. ELSON: You exempt $200 for each person. Does that mean there shall be $2,000 exempted in a family of ten?

Mr. FACKLER: That is the provision of the present constitution. Usually the head of the household owns the property, and it would only exempt $200 from the owner, and not for each person in his family.

Mr. ELSON: How would you in any possible way apply the uniform rule to taxing the products of the earth?

Mr. FACKLER: If the gentleman pleases, I am not making an argument in favor of or against the uniform rule or in favor of or against classification, but this Convention has voted in favor of the uniform rule on a number of roll calls, and it should be considered that that question is now a closed one, and the Convention should go ahead and make the most progressive taxation proposal possible, assuming that the uniform rule is an accomplished fact.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: I did intend to make a speech this afternoon, but I waive my privilege, because I am very thoroughly in favor of Mr. Fackler's proposal. I am so much impressed with this and the discussion we have had in this Convention, that I willingly waive my opportunity to speak. I am in favor of this sensible, practical compromise.

Mr. WATSON: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. Fackler as follows:

At the end of the amendment add the following:

"SEC. 11. Revenues for the payment of the expenses of the state may be provided by assessment upon the counties, but every such assessment shall be apportioned among all the counties ratably according to the aggregate amount expended during the preceding year in each county by the county and all political subdivisions thereof."

Mr. WATSON: Just a word. The committee as a whole agree to that proposal. It is in both reports, and I think it should go in.

Mr. DOTY: May I correct the member before he makes a speech? Substantially you are correct, but the two reports differ in the wording. The majority report and the minority report provide for the doing away of all state levies, but the minority report does it one way, and the majority report includes some other provision that Professor Knight asked to have incorporated. Do you not remember that?

Mr. WATSON: I thought the phraseology was the same.

Mr. WOODS: I am one of those in favor of the uniform rule, and also one of those who have been in favor of putting a debt limit and a maximum tax levy in the constitution. We have talked about this matter long enough, and I am satisfied that there are two sides to the maximum tax levy and debt-limit propositions. Our friends from the cities insist very strenuously against those limitations going into the constitution. Now I wish that those of us who are in favor of the uniform rule might have an opportunity to talk a little, and let me say right here, if this Fackler proposition is adopted we have gained a whole lot. I am one of those who has been raised to view the uniform rule as the only rule. It is right. It has been the law of this state for years, and the only trouble has been that our administrative part of the law has not been right. We have not had a tax system in Ohio until the last three years that was worth the paper it was written on. There was no head and no top and no bottom and no side. We passed a law providing for a tax commission about three years ago, and I helped draft that bill. I am proud of it to this day. That bill is based upon the fact that all taxes shall be levied under the uniform rule and all property shall be taxed at its true value in money. That is what the old constitution says, and I think the new constitution should say the same thing, because it is right.

Now if any of us expect to put a provision in here that will do exact justice in every case, we are expecting to do something that cannot be done. It is absolutely impossible, but here is the thing: After fighting for years and years we have a tax commission that is doing good work. Nobody can deny that. We provide in that tax commission law that they should commence with the big fellows, they should commence there first, and if they could not get the big fellows, we don't want the little ones. You all admit they got the big fellows—the railroads and the banks and the telephone companies—and all those public utilities are on the tax duplicate at near their true value in money. Before we had the law, railroads paid only about fifteen per cent of what they were worth, and other utilities were the same way. Banks were nearer their true value in money than any other business in the state of Ohio. I say to you that this tax commission has put the corporations of these big concerns on the tax duplicate at nearly their true worth. They have not got the intangible property yet. We gave them all they could be expected to accomplish in two years. I have talked with the tax commission and I know they want us to keep the uniform rule in the constitution. If it is not kept in the constitution, if you provide for classification or change this uniform rule, you will undermine the whole work of the tax commission. After the fight that has been made in this state for all these years, and after the recommendations that that commission has made, and after the good work that they have done, do we propose here, when most of us admit we do not know anything about taxes, do we propose to go under their work and tip the whole tax machinery over into the ditch? I do not think we should do it, and I do not think we can afford to do it. I am for the Fackler substitute and for stopping the talk about this matter. I say to you who are for the uniform rule that in the Fackler amendment you are getting it, and when you get it you are saving the tax commission law, and you are saving all the good work the tax commission has done.

Not only that, but you are putting bonds back on the duplicate, and they ought to be back on the duplicate. I was in the house when bonds were taken off the duplicate. My friend Doty and I remember the day, and I say to you, gentlemen, that one of the worst things that was ever done in the state of Ohio was the taking of those bonds off the tax duplicate. It was not a square deal with the people from start to finish. It was forced through this house—the roll call was held up in this house until they could send over to the Neil House to get members here to pass it. Am I right on that, Mr. Doty?

Mr. DOTY: Was the roll call ever held up so that the member from Medina [Mr. Woods] could vote?

Mr. WOODS: Yes, but not that day, and that proposition, after it got through the houses here, was submitted to the people through the action of a state convention, and people who were against it voted for it on election day without knowing they were doing it.

Mr. PECK: How did you find that out?

Mr. WOODS: The action of the people brought about in the legislature the repeal of the Longworth act, and it ought to have been repealed long before.

Mr. DOTY: Allowing that to be all so, and there is some modicum of truth in the statement, I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think it is about time to put this whole question of whether the people really want classification or the uniform rule up to the people on a fair, square basis, where there can be no hocus pocus about it—don't you think it is time to do that?

Mr. WOODS: No, sir.

Mr. DOTY: I thought you were in favor of the people ruling.

Mr. WOODS: I am in favor of the people ruling—

Mr. DOTY: Oh!

Mr. WOODS: —but I am not in favor of submitting forty propositions in the alternative.

Mr. DOTY: In other words, you are in favor of people ruling, but—?

Mr. WOODS: Yes; if you want to put it that way.

Mr. DOTY: Well, I want to say that you are not getting a limitation of the tax rate or the debt rate.

Mr. WOODS: Those propositions are the law of the state of Ohio, and if I could do it I would pick up that statute and put it in the constitution bodily, but I cannot do it, and if you stay here and argue this proposition much longer I am afraid you will lose all. We cannot afford to do it. The other side have come, and have offered to come, more than half way. Let us meet them. This is a debatable proposal. I don't think we are, but we may be, wrong, and we cannot expect to get all we want in this life. Now, let us end it. We are getting the uniform rule. We are getting the bonds back on the tax duplicate, and when we speak of that I want you to remember that the tax commission in their 1911 report, on pages 4 and 5, ask that this constitution be so amended that bonds might be placed back on the duplicate. Let us put them there. We cannot have the uniform rule and leave all the bonds off the duplicate. I think the uniform rule and putting these bonds back on the duplicate is a great victory for us, and let us end it now.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You advocates of uniform rule are urging the friends of uniform rule to wipe out all limitation on indebtedness. In other words, you are willing to let the legislature double or treble the present limitation, notwithstanding they think that farms are taxed up to one hundred per cent?

Mr. WOODS: I am not willing to do it—I do not want to do it—but I am willing to give up some things in the fight.

Mr. NORRIS: Are you willing to give up the things you are fighting for?

Mr. WOODS: Not all of them.

Mr. NORRIS: The things you are fighting for?

Mr. WOODS: No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS: Well, you are trading them off for a mess of pottage.

Mr. WOODS: I am not trading them off for anything.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you believe it is right to compromise on a principle that you are contesting for?

Mr. WOODS: Not always.

Mr. HALFHILL: Are you contesting for any principle on that side of the house?

Mr. WOODS: Yes, sir; the big principles that we are fighting for are the uniform rule and the taxation of bonds.

Mr. HALFHILL: That is in the constitution now.

Mr. WOODS: The taxation of bonds? No.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is the principle you are fighting for the uniform rule or the taxation of bonds?

Mr. WOODS: Those two.

Taxation.

Mr. HALFHILL: Both of them?

Mr. WOODS: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then why are you not willing to submit the two propositions in the alternative?

Mr. WOODS: I do not think we should do that any more than we should do it on two-thirds of all the other matters that have come before us. We are here to settle some things ourselves.

Mr. HALFHILL: You think it would be wrong, inasmuch as we are disputing and cannot agree upon the two principles—you think it would be wrong to submit them so that the issue could be fairly tested by a vote of the people?

Mr. WOODS: I do not know that I would put it that strong, but I am not in favor of submitting classification to the people. Furthermore, I do not think any two of you can agree on any classification scheme.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not think the great question of taxation now before us is of as much importance as the license question under the police power, and did you not vote to submit an alternative proposition there?

Mr. WOODS: If I remember right, I don't think there is an alternative proposition there.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is it not submitted in the alternative, and is the form not in the alternative?

Mr. WOODS: The proposal for liquor license?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes. Whether we shall proceed under certain police power.

Mr. WOODS: You vote for or against every proposal.

Mr. HALFHILL: Could not we now submit to the electors an alternative proposition providing for the uniform rule, and your theory of taxing bonds, and submitting also our view, which is the classification idea, and leave it to the legislature how property should be taxed provided our views are adopted and made part of the constitution?

Mr. WOODS: Do you mean, could it be done?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes?

Mr. WOODS: It could be, but I am not in favor of doing it.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then I will ask you if it is not as important to do that as it was to settle what theory of police power you would exercise in the control of the liquor traffic.

Mr. WOODS: No, sir; I have not gone into any argument on classification. I am against it. I could give you a lot of reasons, but I do not care to take up the time of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. DOTY: Will the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] yield?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, if I do not lose the floor.

Mr. DOTY: All right. There are two amendments pending, and I offer an amendment that does not take the place of any standing amendment—

Mr. WINN: I object, and I rise to a point of order. There are three amendments now pending.

Mr. DOTY: Will the secretary tell us how many there are?

The SECRETARY: Two.

Mr. WINN: Three.

Mr. DOTY: The secretary says two. The amendment I desire to offer does not affect any of the pending amendments. It proposes to add this amendment that I offer to whatever may be in the Fackler amendment or the Anderson proposal, or any amendment thereto, and therefore I offer it at this time, and after it is read I will explain what it is.

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order. I make the point that after the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] has been recognized he cannot yield the floor to somebody else to offer this amendment and then have the floor again.

The PRESIDENT: The point is not well taken.

Mr. WINN: The point certainly is well taken.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] was read as follows:

At the end of the proposal add:

That, at the same time and upon the same ballot, which ballot shall be separate from all other ballots upon which amendments may be submitted, the following alternative proposed amendment be submitted to the electors of the state:

ARTICLE XII.

- SECTION 1. The levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive; therefore no poll tax shall ever be levied in this state, nor service required therein, which may be commuted in money, or other thing of value.

SECTION 2. The general assembly shall have power to establish and maintain an equitable system for raising state and local revenue. It may classify the subjects of taxation so far as their differences justify the same in order to secure a just return from each. All taxes and other charges shall be imposed for public purposes only and shall be just to each subject. The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Bonds of the state of Ohio, bonds of any city, village, hamlet, county or township in this state and bonds issued in behalf of the public schools of Ohio and the means of instruction in connection therewith, burying grounds, public school houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions for purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property to an amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars, for each individual, may, by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published as may be directed by law.

SECTION 6. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution the state shall never contract any debt for purposes of internal improvement.

SECTION 7. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value. A portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars in value may be exempted from such tax.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to income derived from investments not directly taxed in this state, but a part of each income not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year may be exempted from such tax.

Taxation.

Resolved, further, When these competing amendments to the constitution are submitted to the electors, the ballot shall be printed as follows:

	For uniform rule in taxation.
	For classification in taxation.
	Against both amendments.

so that each elector may express separately by making one crossmark (X) his preference for either of the two amendments or against both amendments. If the majority of votes are cast "Against both amendments" as compared with the total of those cast for either amendment, there shall be no amendment to the constitution; if not, the amendment which has the larger number of votes shall be adopted as the amendment to article XII, sections 1, 2 and 6 of the constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON: First I want to ask the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] if this amendment is the same as the Fackler substitute, except that this provides for classification and the Fackler amendment provides for uniform rule?

Mr. DOTY: Not quite. It is only because I had not seen the Fackler amendment at the time, however. It was meant to be the same. I meant to have section 2 as you have it in the Fackler amendment, providing for the amendment voted upon by the people six years ago.

Mr. ANDERSON: In other words, you want to give the people an opportunity of voting for the uniform rule or for classification?

Mr. DOTY: Or against both.

Mr. ANDERSON: All the other things being the same?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: It seems to me that we should start to voting to determine what we want. We have only a few more hours left in which to consider the other proposals upon the calendar, and there is a quite a number that are of relatively great importance. I notice that when men are speaking very little attention is paid to them. In other words, we are ready to vote. I don't think we shall receive any more light on this subject. Now I want to say a word in reference to bonds and the limit.

We all seem to be claiming that the taxpaying public of Ohio is a taxpaying public of rogues and scoundrels who are trying to escape that which they should morally and legally do, and yet you want to provide through the medium and channel of non-taxpaying bonds an opportunity, to the extent of tens of millions, to further disregard their obligations. A gentleman told me at recess that a client of his had been notified by the bank that that bank could exchange $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 of bonds for money, and if he would put his money and securities in those they would be nontaxable, and after the assessor had gone around he could put the bonds back and take his money out. I would ask the men here, who would like to have a roll call, commencing with my name, because it comes first on the list, every man who has listed his watch for taxation to pull it out and hold it up. Then I would like to have an examination made at home to find out all about that.

MANY DELEGATES: Agreed.

Mr. ANDERSON: If this roll call could be had next week so that I could ride around to the different counties I would like the test to be made.

The subject before us is not a matter of constitutional enactment or organic law, unless we are satisfied that for years to come there will be no necessity for a change. In other words, we have no right to put a thing in the constitution which is definite and certain and will remain definite and certain as long as the constitution is in effect, where we know no more about it than we know about the tax rate and limit. Judge Winn put in one amendment, Mr. Lampson put in another, and then Mr. Winn another, and all were different in amount. That indicates that no one has any certainty as to what ought to be done. If that is evident it has no place in the constitution, because it is worthless and worse than worthless, because in what you do you offer a premium to the next legislature to repeal the one per cent Smith law. Put that limitation in the constitution, and you give the next legislature a good argument to do away with the present limitation and to say, "We will have the limitation that the Constitutional Convention fixed." You put it in bad shape. You really cannot calculate the harm you have done. Of course, if it is adjusted right, all right, but how can you determine that? What is the basis of figuring? I will guarantee if you take fifty men and let each one go at it separately, and figure the maximum amount that should be placed in the constitution, no two of them will agree exactly.

Mr. LAMPSON: Haven't we already limitations upon bonded indebtedness for municipalities in Ohio, and if the legislature does not proceed to go up to the full limit of bonded indebtedness, won't those limitations remain?

Mr. ANDERSON: That may be, but is that an argument against the legislature taking out the one per cent limit?

Mr. LAMPSON: I think the legislature knows that we are making a constitution for twenty or twenty-five years, and that the limitation in the constitution ought not to be held down to bare living necessities of the present time.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you want to put a maximum limit in the constitution when you nor any other living man has any basis upon which to figure in determining that amount?

Mr. LAMPSON: Personally I am not anxious about it, but I don't think the argument is good that the legislature will proceed to go up to the limit fixed.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then your question is merely academic on your part.

Mr. LAMPSON: We have a limit of the bonded indebtedness now.

Taxation.

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; in a statute.

Mr. LAMPSON: And the municipalities and the various taxing districts do not proceed to go up to those limitations because they can do it, and neither will the legislature.

Mr. ANDERSON: The legislature will be influenced greatly by this to do away with the present one per cent law.

Mr. LAMPSON: We have had a limitation in the constitution about state bonds since 1851.

Mr. ANDERSON: How do you arrive at the maximum amount your amendment provides?

Mr. LAMPSON: It has been said that we have triple assessment even in Ohio, and I put the limitation so that we would not get much if any in the amount of taxes that would be raised above the amount obtained under the old tax rate by the next assessment. What I apprehend is this, that if there is no limitation it will not be five years until the tax rate is right up to where it was before the increase was put on, and then we shall be paying double taxes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Unless we put something in the constitution with reference to maximum rates, the legislature has full power to act?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Should not anything that is to change in twenty years be a matter of legislative enactment and not be put in organic law?

Mr. LAMPSON: I think this whole question is a controversy between the taxpayers and the tax spenders, and unless we put some limitation in there the tax spenders are going up as high as they can.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you know that in the large cities the tax spenders are the ones who are doing more for progress than anybody else, and do you know that in Youngstown we haven't enough money to conduct our schools?

Mr. LAMPSON: That is why I raised the limit.

Mr. ANDERSON: How do you know that will be sufficient after while? It is absolutely arbitrary, and you drew up a matter in half an hour to fix up something that is to stand for years and years to come.

Mr. LAMPSON: I drew up the limit after the one per cent limit had been laid on the table by a bare majority.

Mr. ANDERSON: And the reason you drafted this the way you did was simply because you wanted to get votes. I thought that was the way you arrived at that amendment.

Mr. PETTIT: If you are so anxious to vote, I wish you would give us a chance to vote.

Mr. ANDERSON: I move the previous question on the whole matter.

Mr. WINN: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 39, nays 61, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the motion was not agreed to.

The president recognized the delegate from Defiance [Mr. WINN].

Mr. WINN: Gentlemen: I ask your attention as I have something to say respecting the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER].

On Thursday of last week we had two or three votes which reflected the sentiment of the Convention to some extent with respect to the clause limiting the rate of taxation. On that day the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] moved that the amendment offered by myself and the amendment offered by Mr. Fackler be laid on the table. The amendment offered by me, you will remember, was the one incorporating in the then pending amendment the one per cent limitation. That motion to table was defeated by a vote of 52 yeas to 57 nays. On the same day the amendment was offered by Mr. Lampson, the one now pending, to make the limitation twelve mills with some additional rate to be levied by a vote of the people. The question being, "Shall the amendment of Mr. Lampson be agreed to?" the yeas and nays were taken, and the result was yeas 48 and nays 36, so the amendment was agreed to. On that roll call the member from Medina [Mr. Woods] voted aye. He was in favor of the limitation. On the roll call to lay the amendment on the table the member from Medina [Mr. Woods] voted no. He was then in favor of the one per cent limitation.

Mr. WOODS: I am now.

Mr. WINN: He says he is still in favor of it, but now he has reached the conclusion that we have come to that point in our deliberations when it is necessary to compromise. He agrees with me that the limitation of one per cent is correct, but I do not agree with him that we have reached the time where it is not profitable to talk about it. I see no sense in yielding a principle that we have been contesting for, especially since a substantial majority of this Convention agree with me, and I am astonished that the member from Medina [Mr. Woods], if he has been contesting for this principle in good faith, is now ready to desert the one per cent ship when there is no possibility of its sinking. I can see very easily how the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] may be influenced to hold out this compromise. The fact of it is he offers us absolutely nothing except what is already incorporated in the minority report or in some of the amendments, except the elimination of the limitation; and that is a thing for which I think we should stand, and most firmly. I can understand how the members from Cuyahoga and the members from most of the big cities will be opposed to any limit in the constitution. They are opposed to it because they are in touch with the politicians of their respective municipalities much more than they are in touch with those who pay the taxes. They are in touch with the politicians, and they hear one song from the time they go home until they come back. Every administration has the same song. It is to obtain as much money for the administration to distribute among the different departments of the municipality as possible, and they are always opposed to any limitation.

Taxation.

Mr. ULMER: I simply want to say to you that I live in a city, and I am not in touch with any politicians.

Mr. WINN: Well, I have not heard the member from Lucas [Mr. ULMER] standing on the floor opposing a limitation. It may be that he is not opposed to it. I do not mean to say that all persons who reside in municipalities are opposed to it, but I think this editorial which I hold in my hand, published in the Ohio State Journal last Thursday morning, which probably most of you read, reflects the sentiment of the average taxpayer in this city and other municipalities of the state. I read it so that it may go into the record:

In the one per cent tax law we have turned our faces toward honesty, retrenchment, revenue and economy, all of which are elements of the public welfare. It is a start in the right direction. It may be inconvenient at first. It may obstruct the extravagance of administrations. It may disappoint the schemers after jobs. It may take some money out of the pockets of selfishness. But the one per cent law is right; the principle upon which it is based is right. It is the promoter of honor and fair dealing. Any legislative or constitutional body that turns against that law turns against the people.

Put us back to the three per cent law and John Smith, with $1000 worth of property, will pay $30 tax, and James Jones, with the same amount of taxable property, will pay $2.75. That is the way things have been going for years. Unfairness and dishonesty have run the machine. It has abused, oppressed and poisoned the citizenship. To go back to it is treason to justice and honor.

Now, gentlemen of the Convention, I repeat, I believe this editorial reflects the sentiment of the taxpayers who are not in touch with the politicians, and I can see how this editorial can come from a paper published in Franklin county, but it would not come from any published in Cleveland.

In discussing this great question I call attention to the very great amount of money income of the counties and the small amount returned for taxation. In Cuyahoga county, there is practically $165,000,000 of money on deposit in banks with a little more than a million and a half returned for taxation. But in Franklin county there is a much larger proportion. In Franklin county there is $32,250,000 in banks with more than a million and a half returned for taxation. With less than one-fifth of the amount in Franklin that there is in Cuyahoga on deposit, Franklin has nearly as much returned as Cuyahoga.

Mr. FACKLER: Would not that be largely accounted for by the fact that Cleveland is a reserve city, and that many banks of the state carry their reserves in Cleveland, very much more so than in Columbus?

Mr. WINN: I would not think so proportionately, but you may be right. This evening I have ascertained the money on deposit in four of the large counties, Cuyahoga, Hamilton, Franklin and Montgomery. It would have pleased me to have extended this, but I did not have the time.

The amount on deposit in those four counties does not include the amount in building and loan associations, which we know is a great amount. In those four counties the total amount in the banks is $323,500,000. The grand return for taxation is $6,000,000. Now if you will pause just a moment and think of the very great amount of taxes that the big cities are escaping, you can see their interest in this matter.

Mr. ANDERSON: The theory of the one per cent limitation is that before the limitation can be a success, that which we have failed to do for fifty years must be done. That is, all property must come out, and if you fail in that, if there is still human nature enough to keep money away from the tax duplicate, the one per cent is wrong, and the poor people shall suffer by reason of it, and not the wealthy.

Mr. WINN: I do not know which one of your questions you want answered, but I will answer the whole of them if I can. I do not expect to change human nature. I expect as long as time lasts there will be men avoiding or seeking to avoid taxation. I mean seeking to avoid the return of their property for taxation, just as there are men committing offenses against the criminal law, but I am not in favor of repealing a single criminal law because there are men who violate them, and I am not in favor of exempting any man from taxation because he violates the law.

Now I want to answer what was said about the schools. We have no trouble up where I live in getting money to carry on the schools. It is a small county and a small municipality in which I live, but we had no trouble in increasing the amount of personal property from $3,000,000 to $7,000,000, and we shall have no trouble in increasing it from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000, and when we have it at $10,000,000 the one per cent levy upon the property, real and personal, will make more money than we need or that can be legitimately expended.

The member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] says that they are not getting enough in Mahoning county to support their schools, but they are simply putting more in other funds, where there is more political profit than in the schools. If you will cut out the amount that is put in the other funds that is not needed for legitimate purposes, and put it in the school fund you will have all that is necessary. If that does not raise enough, come to the legislature with the same earnestness that you stand here today, and ask the legislature to strengthen the law and make it so powerful that it will be impossible for men to conceal their money, and you will have more money in Youngstown and everywhere else. That is all we need. Now shall we, the majority of the members of the Convention, who are in favor of this limitation compromise, as proposed by the Fackler amendment? My answer is No; I will not compromise when it is on principle, and I will only yield when I find it necessary to do so.

Taxation.

Mr. FACKLER: The adoption of the amendment I offer would still leave the law with reference to the tax limitation as it now is, and it would leave the legislature to do just as it can now. That law prevailed for sixty years and never until two years ago did we have a legislature that put a limit on the rate of taxation. Now we have set an example. We have the papers opposing it. They have been saying it is a crime, and they are all appealing to the next general assembly to repeal the Smith law and allow a greater rate of taxation.

Mr. PECK: Where did you see that?

Mr. FACKLER: I read it everywhere. There has been so much said of it in the Cincinnati papers that it could not have escaped your attention.

Mr. PECK: I don't know about it.

Mr. WINN: It is not wrong to write in the constitution a prohibition against anything. I submit that it is in keeping with the notion of things nowadays. While this debate was going on I took from my desk the constitution of Oklahoma, because that was one of the last ones that was adopted, to see what they were doing out there, and the first thing I turned to was the limitation in the rate of taxation. After providing for a state levy of not more than three and a half mills, it goes on:

County levy, not more than eight mills: Provided, That any county may levy not exceeding two mills additional for county high school and aid to the common schools of the county, not over one mill of which shall be for such high school, and the aid to said common schools shall be apportioned as provided by law; township levy, not more than five mills; city or town levy, not more than ten mills; school district levy, not more than five mills on the dollar for school district purposes, for support of common schools.

There is the provision in the constitution of a new state with comparatively a limited amount of property for taxation, and yet those men away out in Oklahoma, in writing the organic law for that state, reading in the history of the country the mistakes that have been made by the older states, wrote in their constitution a limitation on the amount of taxes that might be levied.

Mr. KNIGHT: Will the gentleman tell the aggregate limitation? As I figure it, it was two or three per cent.

Mr. WINN: I didn't figure it out. Let me see. I will read the provision:

SEC. 9. Except as herein otherwise provided, the total taxes, on an ad valorem basis, for all purposes, state, county, township, city, or town, and school district taxes, shall not exceed in any one year thirty-one and one-half mills on the dollar.

That is a little over three per cent. But think of that, away out in Oklahoma, with no such amount of property available for taxation as we have here, they saw fit to write in their constitution a limitation that all of their tax rates should never exceed thirty-one and one-half mills!

Mr. FACKLER: As preliminary to my question, you live in the town of Defiance?

Mr. WINN: Yes.

Mr. FACKLER: That town in 1890 had a population of 7,694, and in 1900, 7,579 and in 1910, 7,327, a decreasing population. Do you mean to say that the same conditions that prevail in that town can be applied to the city of Cleveland, which is growing every year three or four times as much as your whole population?

Mr. WINN: No, but what I am trying to say, and if I have not made it clear I will repeat it, is that if the taxpayers in Cuyahoga county will pay a rate of one per cent upon their taxable property, and if the taxing officers of Cuyahoga county will bring out and put upon the tax duplicate a reasonable portion of the money that was on deposit in 1911 in the banks of Cuyahoga county and in the building and loan associations of Cuyahoga county, they will have no trouble in raising the amount they want.

Mr. FACKLER: The gentleman will admit, will he not, that the amount of deposits in a reserve city like Cleveland is no criterion from which to judge a city like Defiance?

Mr. WINN: What about Hamilton county? Is that a reserve city?

Mr. FACKLER: It is.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Of course.

Mr. WINN: All of these funds are reserve funds?

Mr. FACKLER: I don't know, nor does the gentleman from Defiance.

Mr. WINN: Do you think they are all reserve funds except a million and a half?

Mr. FACKLER: No; I do not. But I do not think that the city of Cleveland, if it had all the bank deposits on the tax duplicate that are properly taxable, could possibly get along with a one per cent levy.

Mr. WINN: They are getting along now, and what are they levying?

Mr. FACKLER: A rate of 1.38.

Mr. WINN: To take care of the outstanding indebtedness and the sinking fund?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes.

Mr. WINN: And you are getting along?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes.

Mr. WINN: Well, the amendment restores the bonds to taxation and limits the rate of taxation to one per cent, exclusive of the amount necessary to be paid on outstanding bonded indebtedness, and provides a sinking fund for the redemption of such bonds.

Mr. DOTY: Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement about "getting along"?

Mr. WINN: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: The board of education last Saturday called the attention of the people of the city of Cleveland to the fact that under the first year's operation of the Smith law they had to borrow $65,000 just to pay the teachers' salaries. That is the way we are "getting along".

Mr. WINN: And that is the result of poor figuring. They knew how many teachers they had, and they knew the amount they had to have to pay them, and they should have cut off $65,000 from some other sources and put it in the school fund. They would have had enough to pay the teachers without borrowing.

Mr. FACKLER: If they knew how many children

Taxation.

they were going to have to educate they could have made the calculation.

Mr. WINN: They did know it approximately.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] wants to ask a question.

Mr. WINN: They are getting so numerous that it is difficult to answer them, but I will try.

Mr. ANDERSON: Say that the city administration or the politicians in the city are to blame, ought the children of the poor people suffer? Remember that the children of the wealthy do not suffer, and ought the children of the poor go uneducated to follow out this whim of yours?

Mr. WINN: Oh, no. The children of the poor should not go without education simply to provide means for the politicians to have something to expend. I am not contending for any such thing. But the city of Youngstown knew long before they began to expend any of the amount expended in this school year exactly the amount that would be necessary, and if they put enough in the school funds to take care of the schools they would be able to take the same amount out. Each department fixes the amount necessary for its use, and they have a board that comes together and apportions it among the different departments.

Mr. HOSKINS: You mentioned a moment ago something about the amount of bank deposits. You said that to that must be added deposits in building and loan associations?

Mr. WINN: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is it not a fact that the deposits of the building and loan associations in the state are part of the deposits in the banks?

Mr. WINN: No, sir.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you mean to say that the building and loan associations keep all their cash in their own vaults?

Mr. WINN: I am taking these amounts from a table that has been prepared —

Mr. HOSKINS: But do not the building and loan associations keep their deposits in banks?

Mr. WINN: It depends on the building and loan association. If it is carrying on a legitimate business it has very little money for deposit any place. As Mr. Stokes, of Montgomery, says, many times the building and loan associations are borrowers.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Now, to your surprise, this question is to help you out, not embarrass you.

Mr. WINN: I thank you.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I know you didn't expect it.

Mr. WINN: If you say so, I will thank you in advance.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Going on the idea that when economic thieves fall out honest men get their dues, I am willing to help you uniform taxers out. I call your attention to this, which is very important from your view: The higher the tax levy the more Mr. Lampson's theory is carried out. The more you increase the limitation above ten mills the greater will be the incentive for personal property to go into hiding, and the more you will keep the levy down to one per cent, the greater will be the incentive to come out of hiding.

Mr. WINN: Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I told you I would help you out.

Mr. WINN: Yes, and I thank you. The point I tried to make a while ago was that if the limitation of the so-called Smith law is correct, as it has been demonstrated by trial to be, for that reason I am opposed to leaving it out.

Mr. DWYER: I just want to say that in Montgomery county the common schools, as in Cleveland, are crowded, and yet if you will look into the matter you will find that Montgomery county has been contributing to the schools in Cleveland.

Mr. WINN: Montgomery county has been contributing to aid in support of the schools of Cuyahoga county! I am glad of it.

Mr. PECK: I want to make a statement to help you in this argument. Are you aware that under the one per cent tax law at the end of the fiscal year there will be for the first time in many years a large surplus in the treasury of Cincinnati, and do you know that there is not anybody there who is in favor of repealing the one per cent tax law?

Mr. WINN: I want to repeat that. Judge Peck says that at the close of this fiscal year, for the first time in many years, under the one per cent Smith law they will have an excess of money in the treasury of Cincinnati, and they will have money after having paid all necessary expenses, and he adds, and I will repeat it, because some of you probably could not hear the remark, that in Hamilton county there is no one in favor of repealing the Smith one per cent law. That is good news and I am glad to hear that. It may be when we get the latest from Cuyahoga county it will not be so bad as it seems now.

Mr. FACKLER: Has the city of Defiance any considerable number of residents whose children are underfed, and for whose proper feeding the municipality is making provision when they come to school in the morning?

Mr. WINN: No; I believe not.

Mr. FACKLER: Does Defiance make provision for the inspection and looking after the eyes and teeth of the children, to see that those who are unable to pay for those things are taken care of?

Mr. WINN: We are making considerable advancement along those lines.

Mr. FACKLER: Would you deny to the city of Cleveland the right to make that kind of advancement?

Mr. WINN: I think there are no children fed at public expense. We have free school books, and we provide clothing and shoes, and everything of that sort, and food at their homes during the severe winter days for a goodly number. We do whatever is necessary and we levy one per cent for general expenses, and four-tenths of one per cent to take care of outstanding indebtedness.

Mr. KILPATRICK: I understand you to say that you had a balance in the treasury under the one per cent tax law and you hadn't had it before for many years?

Mr. PECK: That was in Hamilton county.

Mr. KILPATRICK: Would it not be a good idea then to reduce the levy to one-half of one per cent and have twice as much then?

Mr. PECK: The reduction of the levy did not increase the amount of money paid into the treasury. That was increased because of increased valuation. The increased valuation more than offset the decrease in levy, and take it as a whole the amount of money raised by the one per cent is somewhat greater than the amount of money raised by the previous regular rate.

Mr. WINN: I think we all understand the situation. We understand what the member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] attempts to make plain, which is that reducing the rate of taxation in Cincinnati brought out some hidden property.

Mr. PECK: The principal increase was on the assessments levied on the great corporations. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Big Four were boosted considerably and that made a large part of the difference.

Mr. WINN: The proposition is this: Shall we go before the people—having written in our statutory law this limitation, and having tried it thus far—shall we go before the people with a constitution which says to future legislatures, "You shall not permit a levy beyond this rate," or shall we simply write the constitution without any limit in it, just as we have had since 1851, and then leave it to future general assemblies to levy one mill or two mills or three mills, according to the complexion of the general assembly?

Mr. OKEY: Do you not think that if the one per cent law as we have it now had not been left in the hands of the legislature that personal property would have come out more than it has? Do you not think that if we had the limitation in the constitution we would have that much more property brought out?

Mr. WINN: That is the way I view it.

Mr. OKEY: And if we make it a certainty we will have more?

Mr. WINN: When we have made it a certainty, so that it cannot be changed by the legislature, the hidden property will come out.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not think as a matter of good policy, if there is to be any limit in the constitution, it should not exceed the present one per cent?

Mr. WINN: I have said already that at the first opportunity afforded I shall offer an amendment to the proposal as printed last Thursday making the limitation of one per cent, with only enough additional to take care of the outstanding indebtedness now existing, and interest upon the same, which the supreme court says is part of the Smith law.

Mr. HALFHILL: Your idea is that to write beyond a one per cent limit into the constitution is an invitation to the legislature to repeal the Smith law?

Mr. WINN: I say a limitation of twelve mills is an invitation to the general assembly to raise it to twelve mills, and a passage of a proposal without any limitation at all is an equally strong invitation to the general assembly to raise it to any amount they see fit. Now we have reached the point where, in justice to the people of the state, we should put this in our constitution that there may be no juggling with it hereafter. Some member will say, "Why not leave it to the general assembly?" I will tell you why not? Because there are too many members of the general assembly who are ready to compromise for the same reason the member from Medina [Mr. Woods] is willing to compromise here. Standing for principle as he has stood for three or four days, after voting every opportunity he had for a limitation, and voting with a substantial majority on this floor, he now stands here and says he is ready to compromise that principle and vote for the amendment offered by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] which has no limitation at all in it. There may be men like him in the next general assembly, and if we have men in the general assembly who give up the battle so quickly, how easy it will be to pass a bill through both branches of the legislature wiping the Smith law from the statute book. I am in favor of writing this into the constitution that it may become a fixity.

Mr. KRAMER: I think we are about through discussing this question, just as we were through discussing the initiative and referendum long before we quit. I do not think we are getting a great deal of good, but I want to know, since I have the floor, just two things concerning this proposition for limitation. One is with reference to placing the limitation in the constitution. I am not a member from a city, or rather from any large city. I am from Mansfield, a city of about 25,000 population, but whether I am from the city of Mansfield or from the oldest township in the state of Ohio, I would be against placing any limitation in the constitution. It is not reasonable and it is not sensible.

Now another question. Let me ask you this: Suppose the democrats within the next generation will be successful in national politics as they were in 1892. We democrats will elect a president and bring upon our republic what our republican friends said we brought upon the country in 1892. Where would we be with a limitation in the constitution?

Mr. FACKLER: In the soup house.

Mr. KRAMER: You know in 1892 every last vestige of property was worth not one-third of what it is worth today. I remember taking butter to town when I got only six cents a pound for it, and had to take sugar in exchange. Now we get twenty-five cents a pound. I remember of taking eggs to market, and I was mighty glad to get six cents a dozen for them and now I find that we get twenty cents a dozen.

Mr. NORRIS: You are arguing against yourself on that.

Mr. KRAMER: Suppose we place the limitation at ten mills in our constitution at the valuation that our property has today, and suppose that ten mills limitation remains in the constitution for twenty years, and then suppose our real estate falls in value until it is not worth one-third of what it is now, and our personal property falls in value until it is not worth one-third of what it is now, what will the limitation of ten mills mean? It would be three mills on the valuation of property that we now have.

Mr. ELSON: Are you not aware that if property falls in value money always falls with it so that the proportion is the same?

Mr. KRAMER: Salaries of school teachers and officers in cities, counties and states and expenses don't fall in proportion. It takes just as much to run a government in hard times as it does in good times, and I hope we will not place that limitation in our constitution binding us for the next twenty years when we do not know what the conditions will be in twenty years. I do not like to have Mr. Doty putting up that alternative proposition to the people. If I had as much confidence in the people as some of you in this Convention I do not know that I would not be ready to put it up to the people, but just as I said when we were discussing the initiative and referendum, I have confidence in the people of the state of Ohio only to the extent of their ability, and I stand here to say if we, after discussing this proposition for three or four days, are not better able to place the stamp of approval on some proposition than the people of Ohio, who will not be able to gather together for one minute and discuss this great proposition, we ought to quit. We ought to select one proposition and put it up to the people, and ask whether they want to leave the old constitution as it is or put in this proposition, and we ought not bother with alternative propositions.

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: If you believed in the ultimate wisdom of the people as thoroughly as the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON], for instance, do you not think you would be willing to vote for an alternative proposition to go before the people to allow them to decide it?

Mr. KRAMER: I rather think I would, but I do not think I have the confidence in the people that the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] seems to have.

Mr. CORDES: According to the argument of the gentleman, I want to ask him what he expects in 1913 when the democrats go in?

Mr. KRAMER: I have not been considering that at all.

Mr. CORDES: Is it your idea to keep the road clear for a democratic administration?

Mr. KRAMER: I am a democrat or I wouldn't have given you that illustration. Now these are the reasons that influence me to oppose putting an alternative proposition. I am against the classification of property, and I am willing to put my stamp of approval on the uniform rule of taxing property and submit it to the people. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the uniform rule, and I am willing to go before the people and say I am in sympathy with the uniform rule, and not do as we did on the initiative and referendum, burden the thing with some things that the people are not willing to assume. I am willing to assume it. Now in the liquor question, that is a proposition of whether the people desire license or not. If they don't want license they will just vote it down.

Mr. DOTY: But that is in the alternative?

Mr. KRAMER: This will be alternative to that extent, if we submit to the people the proposition we have here, and if the people want to choose that they can choose it, and if they don't want to choose it they can leave the constitution just as it now is. That is all that the people of Ohio can intelligently decide.

Mr. DOTY: Do you think the people of Ohio really have wisdom enough to decide whether they are in favor of the uniform rule?

Mr. KRAMER: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Then if they have wisdom enough to do that, having that wisdom, I want to submit to them a chance to vote for classification for fear they will make a mistake and vote for classification.

Mr. KRAMER: Two propositions put up in the alternative are always confusing.

Mr. DOTY: Would it confuse their wisdom?

Mr. KRAMER: I am not talking about confusing their wisdom. Remember this: When I talk about the wisdom of the people I am willing to admit that every man in the state of Ohio has the same intelligence that I have, but I have talked to the people of Richland county about this proposition, and today nine-tenths of the people of Richland county know nothing about nine-tenths of the propositions we have already adopted. And I talked with the most sensible people we have, too.

Mr. DOTY: Then you are not afraid they have not intelligence and that they may adopt the uniform rule?

Mr. KRAMER: I am willing to leave it as it is.

Mr. DOTY: Do you not think in justice to them we should give them a shot at the two things?

Mr. KRAMER: If we cannot do any better.

Mr. DOTY: You have confidence in the people?

Mr. KRAMER: Don't go away and say I have no confidence in the people. I have always confidence in the people in proportion to their ability to understand.

Mr. DOTY: Then you have confidence, "but"—?

Mr. KRAMER: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Did I understand you to say that the most sensible people we have were in Richland county?

Mr. KRAMER: I didn't, but I will agree to that. As a matter of fact, I said we had just as sensible.

Mr. DOTY: I could not harmonize the things, your saying that and then criticising.

Mr. KRAMER: I have talked to some of the strong advocates of the initiative and referendum. They were wonderfully strong for it, but now it is the question as to whether the people can handle the propositions that are put up to them. There is such a thing as buncombe, talking for effect, and all that sort of thing, political effect and a great many effects, when we talk about these propositions.

Mr. DOTY: Would you not call it the meanest kind of buncombe for a man to be tremendously in favor of the initiative and referendum because of his confidence in the people, and then be afraid to allow the people to decide the most important thing that we have, taxation?

Mr. KRAMER: The members see the point. I don't have to answer.

Mr. WATSON: Do you not also think it is buncombe for a man who has fought against the question of single tax now to unite with singletaxers on this question?

Mr. KRAMER: I don't know what you are talking about. Now I want to notice one or two of the main arguments. One was as to mortgages. The argument is that a man who buys property and owes a certain amount of money on the property ought to be exempt to the amount of the mortgage. That appeals to me. It is a hard proposition to get away from, but let me say this, that there is not so much to this argument after all. We have heard the members in favor of classification time after time talk about incidence of taxation. That theory works out excellently with mortgages. Let me give you an illustration. If I were to buy property in the city of Mansfield for $2,500, and having $1,000 to pay on it and giving a mortgage for $1,500 on the property, do you know how I would figure that? I would sit down and figure out what the taxes are upon that property every year and how much interest I had to pay every year on the $1,500, and after I had done some figuring I would go to the man who owned the property and say, "Mr. Jones, I can afford to give you just so much for this property because I will have to pay so much interest on the money I have to borrow and so much taxes every year on the property." So, after all, take the strongest argument they have to advance, and there is not so much in it, because it would work out with the incidence that go along with taxation. Every man who buys property makes his calculation with reference to the amount of interest he has to pay on the money he borrows, upon the income he may get from the property, and upon the taxes he has to pay out on that property, so that I simply offer that as a reason why I am in favor of stamping my approval, at least as one member of this Convention, upon the uniform taxation rule, and put that up to the people against what they now have with the amendment allowing them to choose between that and what we already have.

Taxation.

Mr. FLUKE: This taxation question reminds me very much of the woman who started to make the pair of breeches for her boy, and she took so long about it that he had outgrown them. I have had this speech of mine written for two or three days, and I find that the tax question has outgrown my speech, so that my remarks will not be exactly apropos on this particular amendment.

I think we will all agree that civilization brings certain advantages to the human race, and, generally speaking, the higher the degree of civilization the greater are the advantages. Protection of life and security of property are two of the things that result from civilization and they are secured through government. These advantages are worth something and it very naturally follows that we must pay for them. There can be no controversy over the facts enumerated so far, but when we attempt to apportion the cost of government among those governed our opinions begin to diverge. It may be true that all individuals are not benefited, and it certainly is true that all are not equally able to pay, and it naturally follows that in our effort to equitably apportion the cost of government we encounter some difficulties. These difficulties are increased by the fact that some individuals have a disposition and are in a position to evade a portion or all of their obligations to the government. The greater the number of such ingrates, the greater is the injustice to those who make a full return of their property, who, for this reason, are compelled to pay taxes out of proportion to the benefits they enjoy.

It is well to remember that the tax proposition we have under discussion applies to the state and its subdivisions, and whatever form we adopt, the revenue derived therefrom is to be expended for the benefit of the people of the state of Ohio. While we are remembering this we must not forget that the people of Ohio are paying taxes for the support of the general government, because this fact must be taken into consideration if we expect to arrive at any equitable solution of the local tax problem. There are inequalities and injustices in the taxes raised by the general government, and the plan we adopt locally should take these inequalities into account in order that justice may be done to all. The expenses of the general government are raised by an indirect tax that takes but little account of the wealth of the individual. It is a system that gets you on what you must have instead of what you have; a tax on the necessity of the individual rather than on his ability to pay. Under this system the poor man and his family pay as much to the support of the general government as does the millionaire and his family, and neither can dodge this form of taxes. No one will have the hardihood to say that this is just. True, both are under obligations to government for protection of life and for liberty, and if that were all there was to it, it would not be so unjust, for both ought to pay for whatever measure of protection government affords. But the millionaire owes something to government because of the security it affords him for his wealth, for which he pays nothing to the general government.

To attempt to correct this injustice is probably the reason for the several states levying a tax on wealth to produce revenue for local needs.

This Convention owes it to the people of the state to determine what is, in its judgment, the best system of taxation for the state of Ohio as a whole. It doesn't matter what the name of the system is, just so it works right. If the single tax is a good thing for Cuyahoga county we want it in Ashland county. If classification is an equitable and just way of raising revenues for state and local purposes, every county in the state ought to have classification. If a rate of one per cent on my real estate and a rate of one-half of one per cent on my neighbor's notes and mortgages is just and equitable, then the same thing is true in every other county in the state. If classification is right, it follows that the single tax and the uniform rule are wrong, and if they are wrong and unjust, this Convention deserves the contempt of those who sent us here if we recommend their adoption.

I contend that classification in itself is unfair, unjust and unbusinesslike. A number of able gentlemen came before the committee on Taxation and argued in favor of classification of property for taxation purposes. It is a significant fact that none of them claimed that this method was morally right or just, and the best they could do was to justify it on the score of expediency. I submit to you, gentlemen, that this argument of expediency is not on a very high plane. If the state of Ohio is to go into the business of compromising with the men who perjure themselves when the assessor calls on them, it ought to give me the right to settle with the chicken thief I catch in my hen house. The state proposes to justify and dignify the taxdodger for a small consideration. If he owes the state $10 let him off with $2, and mark him up A1 for honesty. On the other hand if I catch some ambitious financier with ten of my plymouth rocks in his possession I don't compromise with him on the basis of a couple of hens returned. No; not on your life! I don't propose to let the state get me for compounding a felony.

We hear the contention frequently that the tax rate is confiscatory on notes, mortgages and other interest-bearing obligations, in that it consumes such a large portion of the income from those obligations. There was a time when this contention had some foundation in fact, but it is no longer the case. When real estate and tangible personal property were on the duplicate at about fifty per cent of their value and notes at their full value, a grave injustice was done this form of property. With real estate on the tax list at its full value and the rate more than cut in two, this form of property has no cause for complaint. A one per cent rate on a note bearing five per cent interest is no more burdensome than the same rate on the property of the average farmer as such property is now valued. The net income of the farmer is much less than the average city man imagines it is, and my observation leads me to the conclusion that the great majority of farmers are realizing less than five per cent on the capital invested. I want to remark in passing that if the farms of the state of Ohio were financed and managed as some railroads and other corporations are, ninety-five per cent of them would be in the hands of a receiver inside of a year. Water the farmer's capital stock from one to three hundred per cent; let him vote himself a salary of $1,500 as president and general manager; his wife $500 as secretary and treasurer—and please don't forget that the average farmer's wife earns that much—make two or three of the boys division superintendents at about $500 apiece; allow for interest on capitalization, depreciation and necessary running expenses, and if you can find a farmer who is making five per cent net, I wish you would let me know. I want to get acquainted with the fellow who is doing that well, and when I find him I will stay with him long enough to learn some of his methods. No, the one per cent rate is not confiscatory and the adoption of the minority report insures you against a confiscatory rate because it compels economy of administration.

We have heard a great deal this winter about double taxation. Everybody is agreed that double taxation is a bad thing and that it ought to be remedied. When we come to consider the remedy we find a wide diversity of opinion as to what the remedy should be. Pardon me for repeating that familiar illustration of the $10,000 farm. A man buys it, paying $5,000 down and giving a mortgage for $5,000. Under present laws the man who has the deed pays tax on the $10,000, on $5,000 more than he is worth. The man who holds the mortgage pays taxes on $5,000, so that taxes are being paid on $15,000 where only $10,000 worth of property exists. Who is it in this instance that pays taxes unjustly? Truth and candor compel all of us to say that it is the man who purchases the farm and who holds the deed. Now listen to the remedy most frequently mentioned in the committee room, and which the majority report (you see this is outgrown) makes possible—let the man who holds the mortgage go tax free, except for a small filing fee! The man who lifted himself over the stile by his own boot straps was a chucklehead compared to the genius who evolved this idea. If you follow the same line of reasoning you will have to give Jake the castor oil when Joe gets sick, and then give Joe a lozenge to get the taste out of Jake's mouth.

Gentlemen, the man who invests his money in a mortgage does so because he prefers that form of investment. His money is working for him there, and if the returns were not satisfactory he would have invested in something else. A first mortgage on real estate is gilt-edged security and the laws make special provisions for the protection of this kind of property. The man who holds that mortgage owes something to the state for the security and protection afforded him, and he ought to pay what he owes. But there are some who object to this and who claim that if the man who holds the mortgage is taxed that this tax will be paid by the man who gave the mortgage in the shape of additional interest. To this I reply that there is no fixed relation between tax rates and interest rates. Tax rates may go up or down and interest rates may go up or down, but the fluctuation of either has no effect on the other. Interest rates vary in different localities, depending on the law of supply and demand. There are places in the state where you can borrow on first mortgage security at five per cent; other places where the minimum rate is seven per cent, notwithstanding the fact that the tax rate is approximately one per cent over the entire state.

If there were anything in the argument that lower tax rates mean lower interest rates now is a splendid time to demonstrate it. Within a year the tax rate has been cut in two—a shrinkage in the rate on the average for the state of more than one per cent. If the argument of the gentlemen on the other side is sound, interest rates should be less by one per cent than they were one year ago. As a matter of fact there has been no shrinking in interest rates, but on the contrary there has been a slight advance in some localities.

I am in favor of the Fackler amendment because it makes provision for stopping the present reckless and profligate program of issuing nontaxable bonds. Every time a community sells a tax-free security it adds something to the power of special privilege and places an additional burden on the taxable property of the state.

In conclusion I move to lay the Doty amendment on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 60, nays 43, as follows:

Halenkamp,

So the motion was carried.

Mr. KNIGHT: I had not intended to speak at all on this subject. I shall speak only briefly to one point. So far all that I have contributed to this discussion is to ask one or two questions and introduce an amendment which was promptly tabled. I intend to speak four or five minutes on one point simply, and that is the matter of the limitation in the constitution of the tax rate. I want to call attention to the fact that as yet in the state of Ohio it is purely an experiment, this one per cent tax rate. We haven't yet paid the second half-year taxes on the first levy under the one per cent law, and if any thing could be more of an experiment than that I would like to know what it is. There is absolutely no evidence that is conclusive that that rate will bring out what it is expected to bring out, although I hope it may. To put into the organic law a provision for a maximum levy when we know that the whole thing is experimental, seems to me the height of folly. The effect it will have upon the city in which we are gathered and which is part of Franklin county, which I have the honor in part to represent, may be illustrated by a statement made public since last Thursday and which I have verified by personal inquiry at the city hall today and may I say at this point that I am a republican, of what sort it does not make any difference, because we are all going to be together very shortly, and that the administration of the city of Columbus at the present time is not republican, and so far as I am informed it is a hearty supporter of the present state administration. Therefore the facts I shall state are not warped by any political consideration. The statement is published in last Friday's paper that, effective Saturday night—

Taxation.

Enough city employes will be laid off in the various public service departments to make a saving of $25,000 in the next two months. This was the statement of Service Director Kinnear Saturday:

"We are short of $25,000 of enough funds to carry the service departments through the first six months of the year on the present basis, and this amount has to be made up in some way.

"All street work except North High street, which is under contract and actually in process, will be stopped. In the engineers' department, all work on plans for future construction or street work, and the men on this work, will be dropped.

"The work of the refuse collection will be confined to the wagons actually owned by the city and the drivers of all hired wagons will be let go. There will also be a cut in the waterworks department, where considerable work will be stopped. In fact, we will just exist until July 1, doing only what is imperative to be done."

To accomplish this saving, it is estimated that it will be necessary to lay off not less than two hundred employes.

This curtailment is in fact more far-reaching than two hundred directly affected. These men have been employed in preparing and designing public work that would require the employment of more than one thousand laborers and others to carry out. It is therefore estimated that from twelve hundred to fifteen hundred men are affected by the retrenchment policy.

Now, I submit that upon this basis of a law the first year of which puts the third city in the state in that situation, where we are short in the aggregate approximately $300,000 of what is necessary to defray the city's expenses, it is not a wise proposition nor the kind of proposition to be put in the new constitution that there shall be a limit fixed, as at present, when the experiment shows it does not enable us to meet the expenses of the city government. It seems to me that to tie up in our constitution the tax levy upon the basis of six months' experiment is unwise. Had it been in existence for five or ten years, and if we knew that it had worked and would work well, the proposition would be different, but I can not think at present that it commends itself to us as a wise proposition to be placed in the constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON: What is your tax rate?

Mr. KNIGHT: Varying from two ninety to three twenty-two.

Mr. ANDERSON: And your population?

Mr. KNIGHT: One hundred eighty-one thousand in 1910, one hundred twenty-five thousand in 1900. There was an increase of fifty-six thousand.

Mr. ANDERSON: Now in Youngstown, although we have only eighty thousand now, our increase was forty-five thousand and our tax rate was 4.10 before the Smith law; Youngstown had more than doubled in population, so Youngstown would be in worse shape than Columbus. And is not this true, that in case there is not enough to properly provide it is the poorer people who suffer first under those conditions?

Mr. KNIGHT: It seems so to me.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I move to recess until 9:30 in the morning.

Mr. FESS: I move that further consideration of the pending matter be deferred until tomorrow and that it be placed at the head of the calendar.

The motion was carried.

Mr. FESS: Now I ask unanimous consent to have the report of a committee come in.

Consent was given and Mr. Stewart submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Education, to which was referred Proposal No. 96—Mr. Fess, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out everything after the word "Proposal" and insert the following:

To submit an amendment by adding section 4 to article VI, of the constitution.—Relative to the office of superintendent of public instruction.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE VI.

SEC. 4. A superintendent of public instruction shall be included as one of the officers of the executive departments to be appointed by the governor, for the term of four years, with such powers as may be prescribed by law.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Fess the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Smith, of Hamilton.

On motion of Mr. Harris, of Ashtabula, the Convention adjourned until 9:30 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

SEVENTIETH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

TUESDAY, May 7, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Dunn, delegate from Clermont county.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Consideration of Proposal No. 170—Mr. Worthington, was resumed.

Mr. ANDERSON: I offer the following amendment. The amendment was read as follows:

In line 10 insert the word "outstanding" between the words "all" and "bonds" and strike out the words "at present outstanding."

In line 13, strike out the words "at present" and after the word "outstanding" insert the words "at the time when this section takes effect."

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President and Gentlemen: The amendment corrects a mistake in the original draft. You will notice the words "at present." That means the bonds outstanding at the present shall not be taxable. "At present" has been interpreted by the supreme court to mean at the time we adopt the constitution, whereas what was meant by Mr. Cassidy and myself in the original draft was at the time of the ratification or enactment. This simply corrects that mistake.

Mr. LAMPSON: Does your amendment make it clear that all municipal bonds outstanding at the time of the adoption at the election shall be exempt?

Mr. ANDERSON: At the time of the ratification. That is the purpose of it. I want to call your attention just to the fact in reference to placing the rate limit in the constitution, that constitutions are not made for majorities. A constitution is made for the protection of the minority. A majority never needs a constitution because it never needs protection. If that is correct, and I believe it is, no proposal ought to be adopted that will bring hardship to any city in Ohio. Therefore, in considering whether a limitation should be placed in the constitution, if I can demonstrate that a great hardship will come to any one in Ohio, that limitation ought not to be placed in the constitution.

Youngstown in 1890 had 33,000 people, in 1900, 44,000 and in 1910, 79,000, an increase of 35,000 in ten years. We have a large foreign population, consisting of numerous children who are attending our schools. Before the Smith one per cent law went into effect the tax rate in Youngstown was four and one-tenth per cent. That rate of four and one-tenth per cent meant that sufficient money could not be raised for school purposes to properly take care of the children, for it only permitted one-half day of school for all of our pupils, and some of them, for the lack of proper buildings, were made to receive their education in cellars and basements.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: Just wait until I finish. I very seldom refuse to answer a question, but I want to get through with this thought. When the Smith one per cent law went into effect, in order to get the same amount of money—same conditions prevailing that prevailed under the four and one-tenth per cent rate—the taxable property had to be put on the tax duplicate at more than four times its previously estimated value. Of course, that meant an extremely high valuation. The little property I own in the city will not sell for more than its appraised value on the tax duplicate. Not only do we have to put our property on at four times what it was before, but conditions have become more aggravated, for the population has doubled. From an economic standpoint the foreign families that come to Youngstown are a loss. They own no property, and pay a rent of only a few dollars a month. We have to provide places where their children can be educated. We have to provide buildings, teachers, and books, because we have free school books in Youngstown. Therefore, from the standpoint of the city itself we have a loss on each family, and you must remember that since 1900 the population has been doubled, for it was 79,000 in 1910 as against 44,000 in 1900. These are conditions that confront us in Youngstown. It may be different in other places, but in Youngstown our schools are not in control of politicians. The politicians are made to keep their hands off and therefore, replying to the argument of the gentleman from Defiance, since our schools are not in the hands of politicians, and politicians being interested only in those things where they or their representatives handle the money, the schools are the last thing for which provision is made. Therefore, if the constitution is made for the minority, and if no proposal ought to be passed that would bring great hardship to any city, this limitation should not be placed in the organic law of Ohio.

The gentleman from Defiance can not properly understand conditions in Youngstown, as he is speaking of a place where the population is decreasing. I do not understand why it should decrease, for I noticed when I was over there that he lives in a beautiful little village.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not care to be interrupted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I have not been in the habit of asking questions for buncombe and I have a fine question I would like to ask.

Mr. ANDERSON: Go ahead.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: The gentleman says constitutions are made for minorities. I agree with him. Here is a proposition to limit the taxes. Before this constitutional amendment passes, will this proposal, if it passes, place on the tax duplicate the bonds issued before they were released from taxation?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; the amendment that would do that was voted down.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Do you put any bonds back?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; it was decided a moment ago that they would not be put back.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Do you believe that any of the bonds ought to be placed back that were issued either before or after the passage of the amendment exempting bonds?

Taxation.

Mr. ANDERSON: It is my individual opinion that the bonds that were made nontaxable by the constitutional amendment of 1904, that are now in existence, should be placed upon the tax duplicate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I can demonstrate that that is absolutely wrong. If bonds that were issued fifteen years ago have been released, this Constitutional Convention has no right to put those bonds back on the tax duplicate that were bought by an innocent purchaser.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am just giving my individual opinion. The Convention decided you were right and I was wrong. That is a closed incident. This Convention has decided that only bonds issued after this constitution is ratified shall be taxpaying and all of the bonds issued before that shall not be.

Mr. WINN: It will be necessary to preface this with some figures —

Mr. ANDERSON: I would like to go into another matter before I quit.

Mr. WINN: I want to ask a question. I have some official records before me. I see that the banks of Mahoning county had on deposit last year $18,771,191 and that there was returned for taxation money on deposit subject to check $839,000, a little more than four per cent. Now you say the real estate in Youngstown is assessed for more than one hundred per cent?

Mr. ANDERSON: It will average one hundred per cent.

Mr. WINN: These figures show that the money is assessed at about four per cent of its value. Do you not believe it would be better to make such personal property pay more nearly a just rate of taxation and relieve the real estate than to allow things to go as they are?

Mr. ANDERSON: Certainly, but if we fail, as we have failed, who will suffer? Will it be the rich man? No. Will it be the man of ordinary means? No. The man who will commence to suffer first and will suffer the longest will be the poor man.

In view of the conditions causing the suffering existing in the city, the poor man feels it first and his family suffers longest. I agree with what you say, but I do not want the poor man's children or the poor man's family to suffer until you can change human nature so that you can obtain a proper return for personal property. Thank you for asking that question. I am in favor of helping all we can to the end that the tax rate be kept down by taxing other things that have not been taxed in the past, so that the Smith one per cent provision, as a statutory law may remain; and having that end in view, I am in favor of taxing incomes and inheritances. I am in favor of the production tax and in favor of the franchise tax and in favor of taxing all bonds that may be issued in the future. There are five different things we can tax in the future by constitutional enactment and one of them is franchises. Take, for instance, the city of Youngstown; We gave a street railway franchise a number of years ago. That franchise is now worth millions and millions of dollars, and while our children were being educated in the basements that company was growing immensely rich and not a cent was it paying for that franchise toward helping Youngstown take care of these children.

Mr. EBY: I notice in the last census that you have five times as many people in your county as we have in Preble county; I notice you have a city of eighty thousand inhabitants while we have none over three thousand, and I notice the merchants in your town are paying taxes on but a few dollars worth of stock more than the merchants of our county. The same thing is true of the bank deposits. I find we are paying on more watches than you are. Is it not a fact that rather than fight taxes you should be in favor of bringing out the hidden property? Would not that make up the deficiency that you need to educate your children?

Mr. ANDERSON: How do you know? It is a guess on your part and you want to put your guess in the constitution. Will you come to Youngstown and undertake the task? Are you possessed of such superior knowledge, acquired while living in your little county, that you can know and appreciate the conditions in our county, without being there and seeing the conditions?

Mr. EBY: No, sir; I am reading from a statement here. It appears to me you have an organized system of taxdodging.

Mr. ANDERSON: Well, there is some taxdodging, because we have so much property that cannot be found; it is easily hidden. If we lived in your little county, where everything that everyone has is entirely evident to everybody else, there could be no dodging and the only reason your people do not dodge is because it is a physical impossibility, not because they are any more honest or better than anybody else.

Mr. HARBARGER: Will not the tendency be toward evasion?

Mr. ANDERSON: "Tendency" is a good word. All you know about it is "tendency." Do you want to put the "tendency" in the constitution where it must remain a fixture for years to come? Do you think the "tendency" will change human nature? If we can change human nature by this provision so that we could make all people list all of their property enabling the children of Youngstown to be educated, I would say, "Amen". Ought a guess, a theory or a "tendency" to be put in the constitution? If you want to put any figures in the constitution, they should be first capable of mathematical demonstration. The very fact that different rates have been suggested demonstrates that this is a guess, but we will not put a guess in the constitution.

Mr. EBY: Did we not jump all around on the liquor clause?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; we did the best we could to get it through and that is what you are trying to do here. In the liquor proposal I wanted to limit the saloons to one to a thousand, and I would prefer that greatly to one to five hundred. Then we attempted to get one to seven hundred and fifty. At last we got one to five hundred, and you are proceeding along the same lines in reference to the taxation that we did on the saloon question. You are trying to get enough votes to pass something. No limitation can be mathematically determined; you are trying to determine it by a majority vote.

Take Youngstown, and the bar bill is $4,000,000 a year. Will the one per cent limitation change the drink habit in Youngstown? Those are conditions we have there. The only people I am trying to protect are the children and the poor people in Youngstown, who will be denied education and will have to suffer. I am not attempting to represent anybody else, and I am not making an apology for the taxdodger, but I am trying to keep the delegates from the smaller places from making a mistake, because they are not qualified to speak as to the conditions in Cleveland, Youngstown and Cincinnati, where we are trying to do our duty in educating and taking care of the poor.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: If it is true that we have taxdodgers, and it is recognized on the floor, and if we refuse to limit the tax levy, is not it conniving at the fact that taxes are dodged?

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't know exactly what is the meaning of the word "conniving" as you use it. Do you mean because we refuse to put this absurd limitation in the constitution—not absurd as to a large majority of places, but absurd as far as Cleveland and Youngstown are concerned—that we are conniving because we will not protect the people who are otherwise protected? Is that the way you use the word "conniving"?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: How does it come that in West Virginia they only pay seven mills?

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't know anything about West Virginia, but I do know something about Youngstown. I suppose you are speaking of the backwoods, where they only grow razor-back hogs.

Mr. ELSON: I want to say a few words on this subject. Our debate seems to have resolved itself into a contest between the rural counties and the cities. Now I come from a rural county. The largest town in our county scarcely exceeds ten thousand people. It is the most natural thing in the world that I would line up in favor of the rural county, but it seems to me if the cities in the state feel that they need more than the one per cent tax limit in order to carry on their business that the rural counties have no right to put a veto on it. I do not see how they can consistently do it. It was only a few days ago that we voted to give the cities practical home rule. We agreed that was the best possible thing that could be done for the cities. Let them have self-government in all matters that do not pertain to the state as a whole. Now shall the rural counties come in and say that the cities must confine themselves to the one per cent maximum tax limit? If Cleveland or Youngstown can not take care of their children, or if Columbus can not take care of their streets, without larger taxation than the Smith law will permit, what right have we to say you can not tax yourself more than one per cent? I do not believe we have the right to do anything of that sort. As far as politics are concerned, the cities will have to manage their own affairs in that respect too. If we intend to give them home rule, let them take care of their own affairs. If they overtax themselves in order to have a larger political fund, it does not hurt us.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: In connection with the statement that we have no right to control or limit taxation in the cities, I ask if we are not all exercising that right under the Rose law when we compel cities and towns to regulate their saloons in accordance with the dictates of the surrounding country?

Mr. ELSON: The taxation feature in the Rose law is incidental and not the main thing at all. This is a pure matter of taxation. If the cities want to tax more than one per cent why should we of Brown or Adams county come in and say to the people of Cleveland, "You can not do it."

I believe the Smith one per cent tax law should be tried thoroughly and well for several years, and I believe it will work. Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and other large cities may not come to it in the first two years, but I believe they will be able to get to it. I do not believe we should put it into the organic law, and I do not think we should fix it so there will not be any possibility of change. If we do that it will be changed within a few years through the initiative and referendum.

Now a word on classification, although it seems we have practically settled that in our preceding debate. From a scientific standpoint I can not help favoring the classification of property, but from various evidences we have had in this Convention I am led to believe—indeed, I am convinced—that it will be impossible to get classification through this Convention, so that Ohio will have to remain one of the very few states of the civilized world where classification is forbidden in the organic law. In almost all countries and political divisions having the power of taxation, the uniform system has been abandoned long ago. We are one of the very few states in this Union that still clings to uniform taxation. It is the rural vote, and the farmers are perfectly sincere, but I believe they are in error in their judgment. I believe the farmers have paid more taxes in the past sixty years because of the fact that classification was not permitted than they would have had to pay otherwise. I believe the same thing will be true in the future and I do not believe it will be many years before we have classification by means of the initiative and referendum. I am reminded that classification is forbidden in the initiative and referendum proposal. I was thinking of the single tax only. That will make it more difficult to bring about.

Mr. KELLER: I believe you said this is one of the few states that has uniform rule?

Mr. ELSON: There are not many.

Mr. KELLER: According to the digest of the constitutions I can give you the number of states that that digest claims have the uniform rule: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Mr. WINN: Thirty-two.

Mr. ELSON: The great states of New York, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts have abandoned that old-time method and I had hoped that Ohio would. If we go into Canada we find they are miles in advance of us in the matter of taxation. They have not got the uniform system anywhere. Go to Europe and you will not find any uniform system. It is all classification. I believe that classification is the best possible thing and that our eyes will sooner or later open to it. I have nothing further to say except that I think it would be absolutely wrong for the rural counties of the state to force upon the cities a tax limit when the cities tell us in plain language that they can not get along with it. I believe we could give the cities home rule in that respect and I hope the counties will all stand for it.

Mr. LAMPSON: I demand the previous question on the pending amendment, simply that one amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The question will be on the amendment offered by the delegate from Mahoning.

The amendment was agreed to.

Taxation.

Mr. WINN: I offer an amendment.
The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of the amendment of Mr. Fackler add the following: Sec. 2.—“The maximum rate of taxes that may be levied for all purposes, exclusive of such rate as may be necessary to pay any bonds now outstanding and the interest on such bonds, shall not in any year exceed ten mills on each dollar of the total value of all property, as listed and assessed for taxation, in any township, city, village, school district, or other taxing district. Additional levies, not exceeding in any year a maximum of five mills, for all such purposes, on each dollar of the total value of all the property therein, listed and assessed for taxation, in any taxing district, may be levied when such additional levies are authorized by a majority vote of the electors voting thereon at an election held for such purpose; but in no case shall the combined maximum rate of taxes for all purposes, levied in any year in any township, city, village, school district, or other taxing district, exclusive of the rate necessary to pay said existing bonded indebtedness and the interest thereon, exceed fifteen mills on each dollar of the total value of all the property, as listed and assessed for taxation, in such district.”

Mr. WINN: I apprehend we have reached the point where we are ready to determine whether or not we will vote into this proposed amendment the limitations. I just want to explain this; I am not going to make a speech about it. I think I have said as much as I care to. This is the original amendment which I offered a few days ago, excepting that it provides that the maximum rate of ten mills shall be exclusive of the amount necessary to provide a sinking fund for the redemption of the bonds now outstanding and to pay the interest on such bonded indebtedness. In other words, this amendment is the Smith law with the decision of the supreme court written into it, allowing the further increase of five mills by referendum to the electors of a taxing district. I offer this as an amendment to the Fackler amendment and I do that for this reason: The Fackler amendment is better than the original Anderson amendment as it has been modified by the present amendment. It is better because it contains all that the Anderson amendment contains and in addition to that it contains a provision respecting the tax on coal and other mineral land. It contains the inheritance tax and the provision that the inheritance tax may be graduated. It contains the income provision and perhaps one or two other measures upon which we all agree. My notion is if we can have this limitation in the Fackler amendment and then adopt the Fackler amendment we have an ideal taxing proposition.

I do not care to speak on its merits at all. I can scarcely avoid the temptation, however, to reply to some of the things that have been said this morning by the member from Mahoning. When I examine the records I find that a few little banks down in the county of Preble, one of the smallest counties in the state, one of the poorest counties because it is small, poor only because it is small in population, but rich in everything else—when I see that in the little county of Preble there is more money returned for taxation by one hundred thousand dollars than is returned in the great county of Mahoning and when I find that the merchants of the little county of Preble returned more goods for taxation than were returned by all those mammoth stores in Youngstown and all of Mahoning county, then I feel like saying something about it, but I have taken too long and I will desist.

Mr. FACKLER: I move that the amendment of the delegate from Defiance be laid on the table.

Mr. EBY: I wish to say that in twenty years, from 1890 to 1910, Preble county had a larger duplicate per capita than any county in the state except one and that was Lake.

Mr. DOTY: Where is Preble?

Mr. EBY: Nobody but a gentleman from Cuyahoga would ask that. I want to say further that Preble county produced more agricultural products per capita than any county in the state of Ohio.

Mr. WINN: I demand the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Cleveland [Mr. FACKLER].

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 40, nays 67, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Hahn,	Malin,
Bowdle,	Harris, Ashtabula	Matthews,

So the motion to table was lost.

Mr. COLTON: I now move the previous question on the Winn amendment.

Mr. DOTY: I second it. Before that is taken I demand the yeas and nays.

The main question was ordered.

The delegate from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] here assumed the chair as president pro tem.

Taxation.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Defiance.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded, taken, and resulted—yeas 66, nays 41, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Halfhill,	Okey,

Harris, Ashtabula,	Mauck,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALFHILL: I desire to explain my vote. I voted in the affirmative upon this question because I believe we have no right to interfere with the experiment of the Smith one per cent law, which is an experiment. This Convention ought to have been big enough to leave experiments out of the constitution and I believe we shall regret the day that it is there. We have no means of knowing what the future has in store for us, and within ten years the purchasing power of a dollar has decreased by one-half. I want to explain my vote.

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to explain my vote. I am firmly of the belief and have been for some time that there are a number of delegates, and their names will come to mind of other delegates, that are opposed to the income tax and inheritance tax, the production tax, the franchise tax, and the taxing of bonds, and that they are trying to do that which was stated by some delegate on the other side of the house yesterday—prolong the debate and mix it up for the purpose, and the sole purpose—not because they are in favor of the one per cent tax law, because they would be voting the other way if that were so—but for the sole purpose of dividing the Convention upon the question of those taxes. Therefore, I voted against the Winn amendment, and I firmly believe if all the delegates had voted their true sentiments on this amendment it would have failed of adoption.

Mr. DOTY: I offered an amendment and I haven't had a chance to explain it or talk about it at all. Through a misunderstanding or inadvertence a motion was made to lay this amendment on the table and the amendment was not discussed. It had not at that time been printed. I have changed it somewhat and I state frankly that the amendment I offer is the same in principle but different in form and I offer it so we can have a discussion of it.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of the proposal add:

That, at the same time and upon the same ballot, which ballot shall be separate from all other ballots upon which amendments may be submitted, the following alternative proposed amendment be submitted to the electors of the state:

ARTICLE XII.

SECTION 1. The levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive; therefore no poll tax shall ever be levied in this state, nor service required therein, which may be commuted in money, or other thing of value.

SECTION 2. The general assembly shall have power to establish and maintain an equitable system for raising state and local revenue. It may classify the subjects of taxation so far as their differences justify the same in order to secure a just return from each. All taxes and other charges shall be imposed for public purposes only and shall be just to each subject. The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Bonds of the state of Ohio, bonds of any city, village, hamlet, county or township in this state, and bonds issued in behalf of the public schools of Ohio and the means of instruction in connection therewith, burying grounds, public school houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions for purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property to an amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars, for each individual, may, by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published as may be directed by law.

SECTION 6. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution the state shall never contract any debt for purposes of internal improvement.

SECTION 7. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value.

Such tax may also be levied at a different or higher rate upon collateral inheritances than direct inheritances and a portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to such incomes as may be designated by law, but a part of each income, not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year, may be exempt from such tax.

Taxation.

SECTION 9. Laws may be passed providing for excise and franchise taxes and for the imposition of taxes upon the production of coal, oil, gas and minerals.

SECTION 10. No bonded indebtedness of the state or any political subdivisions thereof, shall be incurred or renewed, unless in the legislation, under which such indebtedness is incurred or renewed, provision is made for the payment of not less than two per centum of the principal together with the annual interest on the same, each year, until such indebtedness is paid.

Resolved further, When these competing amendments to the constitution are submitted to the electors, the ballot shall be printed as follows:

	For uniform rule in taxation.
	For classification in taxation.
	Against both amendments.

so that each elector may express separately by making one cross-mark (X) his preference for either of the two amendments or against both amendments. If the majority of votes are cast "Against both amendments" as compared with the total of those cast for either amendment, there shall be no amendment to the constitution; if not, the amendment which has the larger number of votes shall be adopted as the amendment to article XII, sections 1, 2 and 6 of the constitution.

Mr. DOTY: In 1891 three hundred and three thousand people in the state of Ohio, over forty per cent of the electors that year, voted to insert in the constitution section 2 of this amendment. At that time there was no Longworth act, so it was voted on under the adverse conditions of the ballot with which you are all familiar. It was not adopted because all of those who did not vote were counted as being in the negative.

Three years later three hundred and twenty-two thousand voted for the same amendment. In 1903 three hundred and twenty-six thousand voted for the same amendment. In 1908 three hundred and thirty-nine thousand—nearly three hundred and forty thousand—of the electors voted for this identical amendment, and at none of those elections was the Longworth act responsible for the vote. They were voted on under the adverse conditions of submitting an amendment under the old constitution. Now, from three hundred and three thousand to three hundred and forty thousand having voted for this particular amendment, that makes a very respectable number of the people of the state of Ohio who have already indicated their wish to change the constitution in this particular.

There may not be a majority of all the people in the state of Ohio in favor of it, but there is certainly a very much larger percentage of the total number of voters in the state than we have called for in the highest percentage of the initiative and referendum, which was twelve per cent.

Mr. DWYER: Does your proposition provide for a limitation of the tax rates?

Mr. DOTY: That has been voted in and my proposition does not disturb it.

Mr. DWYER: The Winn proposal goes in.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, and mine does not affect that. Mine is an alternative proposition to be voted for, so that if you are for the Winn proposal you would be for both of these and if you were against it you would be against both.

Mr. DWYER: If yours is out and the Winn amendment is in, it would be in good shape.

Mr. DOTY: All this amendment seeks to do is to do what evidently it is impossible for this Convention to do with any certainty. I do not care what the member from Defiance says, none of us feels sure the thing we are ready to vote for is really the solution of this tax question. Why should not the people of Ohio have a chance to vote for, or against one of these options, and why should we select only these options? I think the reason why we should select only these options at this time is because for sixty years we have had one in effect and four times in the last twenty years over three hundred thousand people have voted for the other. Since 1851 the uniform rule, as so called, has never been submitted to a vote of the people of the state of Ohio. You gentlemen who are in favor of the uniform rule, as you have a perfect right to be, may be representing the opinion of your constituents and you may not; you do not know and I do not know. The nearest I know about my own county is that the last time this amendment was submitted it received thirty-seven thousand votes to sixty-seven thousand votes against it; but when you count the voters who did not vote the majority against it vanished. Cuyahoga county nor any other county has never had a chance to express itself on the uniform rule. Are you gentlemen so sure that you are absolutely capable of diagnosing the people of your county on this subject, and yet are afraid or unwilling to submit the question to the people of your county? Why do you set yourselves up as being the only ones capable to say?

Mr. WATSON: In regard to my county I can say this is one of the planks on which I ran, and it was discussed all over the county.

Mr. DOTY: You didn't ask a question, but made a statement. I suppose that is all right. You also ran on the initiative and referendum?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Did not the principle of the initiative and referendum provide that we should leave these questions to the people?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Why are we afraid to leave the question of uniform taxation to the people?

Mr. WATSON: I discussed the taxation question with these people and they seem to be in accord with it.

Mr. DOTY: How many votes did you receive?

Mr. WATSON: Sixteen hundred and twenty.

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: What was the combined vote of all the other candidates?

Mr. WATSON: About four times that.

Mr. DOTY: So we find in Guernsey county the vote taken upon the taxation question specifically on a campaign for uniform taxation was four to one against the uniform rule.

Mr. WATSON: That was also the plank of the other candidates.

Mr. DOTY: Were they defeated on the initiative and referendum?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: You were elected on the initiative and referendum?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Do you suppose that if you had told your people that you were for the initiative and referendum on everything except the most important question that you would have gotten sixteen hundred votes?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Then it must be your personal popularity.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You have quoted some figures at the outset of your remarks in which you undertook to argue that there is increased interest in the classification of property?

Mr. DOTY: I didn't say anything about that. I do not think there has been any increased interest so far as the vote goes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It has been submitted three times since 1891?

Mr. DOTY: Four times, I think.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You have quoted those figures?

Mr. DOTY: Not for you; not for the benefit of the member from Ashtabula. The member from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] is perfectly consistent in being afraid of the people. I do not care anything about trying to convert him. He is unconvertible, but I hate to see a gentleman wrong who started out right.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: May I read a few figures now?

Mr. DOTY: I do not care, only it is pretty difficult to carry in your mind figures read from a sheet.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The sheet I have before me contains in several columns the vote on constitutional amendments, under the headings "for the amendment," "against the amendment," "failed by," "carried by," and finally, the percentage of all those who voted on the amendment at all.

Mr. DOTY: The main thing with everybody trying to do anything is the percentage.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You have used some figures yourself, and whether they are correct or not I do not know. But it appears that 303,000 and 340,000 voted for classification.

Mr. DOTY: That would make a pretty enormous petition for a change in our tax system from the uniform rule to the so-called classification rule.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The classification is the question under consideration. May I make another suggestion?

Mr. DOTY: You can make a suggestion. I did not know that you had made any yet.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is a matter of opinion. You and the member from Allen [Mr. HALF-HILL] seem to indicate this is not an alternative. Suppose we do not adopt the constitutional provision that we are framing; we retain the old constitutional provision. Now what you want is two alternatives—the main question and two alternatives.

Mr. DOTY: I had my mind all made up for a suggestion, and you have run it into a question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I cannot take note of the limitations of your mind.

Mr. DOTY: I have this consoling fact, there are others. I have not got the question or suggestion yet, but be that as it may, as they say in the story books, all I am trying to show is that here in fairness is the method of putting up to the people the uniform rule that we have been talking so much about as against the classification rule. I am opposed to the uniform rule, but I am not afraid to put it up to the people, and if they are for it, that is an end of the matter—at least for another generation—but for sixty-one years the people of Ohio have never voted directly upon the uniform rule, and the member from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] knows it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: We have it now.

Mr. DOTY: But you are afraid to put the uniform rule on a ballot and let the people vote on it.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: In case we can agree on some form of provision along the line of the subjects now discussed and debated—the uniform rule and the classification proposal—would you be willing to make a reasonable restriction upon the levy upon real estate?

Mr. DOTY: Of-course not; you know I would not, and you would not do it unless you were interested in some things down in the sixth district. What you ask is perfectly unscientific and unfair, and the gentleman knows it.

Now I have taken up more time than I intended. This is a simple plan to put up for the first time in words the uniform rule against the so-called classification plan, which has been voted for and, in fact, petitioned for by a larger number of the people of the state of Ohio than has ever petitioned any legislature of any constitutional convention for any one thing—two and half to three times as large as the percentage we have provided for in the highest percentage in our initiative and referendum proposal. It is presented in the alternative plan, and I call attention to the fact that the voter under this provision need only make one mark to indicate his choice. In other words, if he is in favor of the uniform rule, one mark will indicate that, and adopt the Anderson-Winn proposal if that is adopted. If he is in favor of classification of property he would vote for the amendment I am proposing, and if he is against both of them and wants the constitution to remain exactly as it has been for sixty-one years, he can vote against both of them with one mark. It is a simple proposition for the voters. It is a fair proposition for the voters and unless you are afraid to allow them to tell you whether they are for the uniform rule or not it ought to be adopted.

Mr. EBY: You told us about 303,000 and 340,000 that voted, but you forgot to say how many voted against it.

Mr. DOTY: Actually voted against it? When it got 303,000 there were 65,000 actually voted against it, and at the last election, when it got 340,000 about 96,000 voted against it. In other words, at any one of those elections, with the provision that this Convention has voted for submission of amendments, classification would have been adopted. We do not ask you to put up classification by itself. We asked it, but the Convention said no. Now all we ask is that you put up what you are in favor of in these words, and put up classification in these words, and let the people take their choice. Who is there in this Convention who says he is larger and greater than the people?

Mr. ANTRIM: Is not your amendment a little different from what you intend? You provide for classification and the Fackler amendment provides for the uniform rule.

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ANTRIM: You omit the Winn amendment and the Fackler amendment contains the Winn amendment.

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. ANTRIM: All the other features are the same?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; perhaps there has been an amendment or two put in that I may not have gotten in mine, but the plan was to have the amendment I offer exactly like the other one, except that theirs provides the uniform rule and mine classification.

Mr. ANTRIM: Do you want the Winn amendment in?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; the Winn or the Antrim, or whatever the members in favor of uniform rule desire to write into that amendment. I want to submit everything in my amendment except what is in section 2, and then I want to submit it in the alternative, the alternative being the two propositions, bringing a direct issue between uniform rule and classification. Section 2, as I have submitted it, is exactly, word for word, without the change of a comma or a letter, like the amendment submitted to the people of Ohio in 1908, which amendment received 340,000 votes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The gentlemen of the Convention ought to have arrived at the conclusion that the time is ripe for statesmanship and not for peanut politics. This Convention on the taxation question has fluctuated, swinging from side to side, dictated by personal prejudices. The extremists were in evidence on both sides, and now no matter who is successful, it will illustrate that well-known saying, "Another such victory and we are lost." What boots it what temporary victory you gain in this Convention? Do you not know that this Convention, split as we are on taxation, when we leave here and go to our counties to take an active part, as most of us will do, in explaining the constitution, will find that we are facing certain defeat? Those things which we prize most will go down in defeat with those things we abhor most. So I say to you, the time is ripe for broadness of view, to take the place of narrowness, bigotry and the partisanship which have developed in the discussion of this tax problem. In my judgment an opportunity is now offered by this alternative proposition submitted by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty], a proposition which the general assembly three times submitted to the people of Ohio, the last time in 1908. The general assembly, owing to the demand from the people of Ohio, offered them the privilege to determine whether they would accept classification or reject it. And will this Convention refuse to do once that which the representatives of the people have seen fit to do three times?

How can you defend your position if you are both inconsistent and arbitrary?

When was a fairer proposition offered than this alternative proposition, bearing in mind, as the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] stated, that it is identically the same proposition submitted in 1908, when something like 340,000 people in the state voted in favor of it, and only 80,000 or 90,000 voted against it? What does that mean to any person familiar with figures? It means that there were only 80,000 or 90,000 in the state of Ohio who felt it such a serious encroachment on their economical liberties as to cause them to go up to the polls and register their protest against it. It means that of the remaining eleven hundred thousand people in the state of Ohio three hundred and forty thousand were so enthusiastic over it that they registered their votes in favor of it, while the remaining 780,000 said, "We are perfectly willing to try the experiment; we will not vote against it." The time for statesmanship has now arrived. Let us not jeopardize those things so dear to our hearts, the question of home rule, the initiative and referendum, the liquor license and those other big problems, by permitting this Convention to be split in two on this proposition, with the feeling on the part of the people of the state that if the Convention itself was unable to reach a conclusion or arrive at common ground of agreement on the most vital question before it, then it was safe to assume that all the other work before it was also unworthy of being considered. The wise thing to do, therefore, is to submit to the people of the state the alternative propositions. If those who advocate the uniform rule believe that certain things in the present uniform rule proposal as now before us ought to have been left out, or that certain things that have been left out ought to have been put in, let them make the strongest case possible from their point of view on the uniform rule, and we shall, if they will adopt the alternative proposition, vote with them to incorporate anything they desire in their uniform rule, or to strike out anything that is offensive to them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: More in the nature of a suggestion than a question: I think the figures of Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, are a little misleading. This proposition has been submitted to the people three times, in 1891, 1903 and 1908. The gentleman just had the sheet, and I thought he had refreshed his memory. In 1891, forty-six per cent of all who voted voted one way or the other on the proposition, and the other fifty-four per cent did not vote on it at all.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I said 760,000 were so well satisfied with what the rest of the state did that they were willing not to vote. Had they been opposed to it they would have registered a protest against it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: In 1908 only thirty-eight per cent of 1,136,000 of the people who voted at the election voted either way.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Then there were sixty-two per cent of the people who were so well satisfied that the proposition should go through that they did not register a protest against it. There are those who have eyes that cannot see, ears that cannot hear and brains that will not brain.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Don't you think this constitution will need a little interpreting if such interpretations as you give here are put on it?

Taxation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: If it does, you are the last man in the Convention I shall call upon to interpret it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is a matter of opinion, like all the rest you say.

Mr. ANDERSON: Are you in favor of an income tax?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Very much in favor of it.

Mr. ANDERSON: Inheritance tax?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Very much so.

Mr. ANDERSON: Production tax?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON: Tax on franchise?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON: Against the tax on bonds?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I am unalterably opposed to a tax on the bonds of the state of Ohio or of any political subdivision thereof.

Mr. ANDERSON: Would you be in favor, as an abstract proposition, of any per cent limitation?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Only if accompanied by that which to me is abhorrent, the uniform rule. With the present tax assessment of one hundred and one hundred and twenty-five per cent on our farms and homes, with the knowledge that that assessment will never go down, we know that the rate of taxation must go up. Now I am willing to hold on to the Smith one per cent law if the people are sincere about it, with fifteen mills as the maximum, and if that doesn't produce sufficient revenue, then the people, under the eight per cent initiative, will have a chance to change it. I am willing to make that concession.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not believe that the retaining of the Winn amendment in the proposal will cause thousands and thousands of votes to be cast against the uniform rule, and therefore against the inheritance, income, production, franchise and bond tax?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: No, sir; I believe that the advocates of the uniform rule to be consistent must demand the limitations of the so-called Smith bill—they are bound to do it if they are logical.

Mr. ANDERSON: Did you vote in favor of the Winn amendment because you are in favor of it or because you wanted the uniform rule killed?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I voted for the Winn amendment because it was my constitutional right to do so, but I claim to be logical before I am sentimental, and I therefore again insist that limitation of the total tax levy ought to accompany the uniform rule of taxation, unless you wish the latter to develop into a colossal failure.

The delegate from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] was recognized.

Mr. PETTIT: I have been trying to get an opportunity to address the Convention for days, and I demand recognition. I was first on my feet and the chair, under the rules, is required to recognize me, and I am going to remain here, too.

Mr. HOSKINS: I have been trying to get recognition for a good while myself. Mr. President and Gentlemen—

Mr. PETTIT: I demand recognition.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] is out of order.

Mr. PETTIT: I am not out of order. The rule says the man who addresses the chair first shall be recognized.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. PETTIT: You have a list up there and you are trying to go by that regardless —

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HOSKINS: I have been trying to get recognition from the chair for two days, and I finally got it.

Mr. PETTIT: You finally got it because your name was up there.

Mr. HOSKINS: My name was not up there.

Mr. PETTIT: Then I don't know how on earth you got recognized.

Mr. HOSKINS: I think I addressed the chair before you did.

Mr. PETTIT: You didn't do anything of the kind. I was up here before you were on your feet at all. I want to know, Mr. President, if you are going to sit up there as an autocrat. I want to know that right now, for I want to test your power.

The PRESIDENT: The member is out of order.

Mr. PETTIT: Why am I out of order? Tell me.

Mr. HOSKINS: May I ask you a question?

Mr. PETTIT: I am talking to the chair now. Why am I out of order?

The PRESIDENT: If I may be permitted to make a few remarks, the rules give the president a right to recognize any member who he thinks is on his feet and demanding recognition first. The president exercised that discretion under the rules, and recognized the gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS]. The president rules that the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] has the floor and that the member from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] is out of order. The remedy of the member from Adams is to appeal from the decision of the chair. Does the member wish to appeal?

Mr. PETTIT: Will the gentleman tell me what rule that is?

The PRESIDENT: The member can find the rule easily.

Mr. PETTIT: I know you have been overriding Rule 19 right along.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I call the gentleman to order. His conduct is unseemly and casts discredit on the Convention.

Mr. PETTIT: This gentleman has been hearing his own voice almost incessantly, but when I get up I am not allowed to speak.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] wish to appeal from the decision of the president?

Mr. PETTIT: I wish to be recognized as a member of this Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Adams is out of order and will kindly take his seat.

Mr. PETTIT: I decline to take my seat. I will stand as long as I want to.

The PRESIDENT: The president has no other recourse than to call upon the sergeant-at-arms to assist him in maintaining order. The president would be glad to have the gentleman from Adams [Mr. PETTIT], or any other gentleman, appeal from the ruling of the chair in order that the ruling can be tested.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: In order to test the matter I appeal from the decision of the chair.

Taxation.

Mr. DOTY: And I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Crawford [Mr. MILLER] appeals from the chair, the yeas and nays have been demanded and the secretary will call the roll. The question is, Shall the decision of the president be sustained?

Mr. HOSKINS: We are on an important question and there is unlimited debate. How much time do you want, Mr. Pettit?

DELEGATES: Vote! Vote!

Mr. HOSKINS: I have not said a word yet.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the appeal be laid on the table? Those in favor of the motion will answer aye as their names are called, and those contrary no.

Mr. FESS: I wish the gentleman would withdraw that motion. I sat here and I saw Mr. Hoskins trying to get the floor when Mr. Harris tried to get the floor, and while Mr. Pettit may have been up a little earlier than Mr. Hoskins, Mr. Hoskins had been trying to get the floor for some time, and it was easy for anyone to decide that Mr. Hoskins was up first.

Mr. PETTIT: If that is your statement, I have no reason to doubt it.

Mr. DOTY: I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOSKINS: I think everybody will be given a fair show.

Mr. PETTIT: Well, they have not had a fair show.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I withdraw the appeal. My only object in making it was that I knew there were not more than three men in this Convention who would not sustain the decision of the chair. I saw Mr. Hoskins up five seconds before Mr. Pettit was up. I just made the motion to bring the matter to a test.

Mr. PETTIT: If this is correct, I am all right.

Mr. HOSKINS: I surely think it is, for I have been trying to get recognition each time when the last three speakers got up.

Mr. FESS: That is so, Mr. Pettit.

Mr. PETTIT: Then I will take your word.

Mr. ANDERSON: I make the point of order that we are not in order.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is well taken, the member from Auglaize [Mr. Hoskins] will proceed.

Mr. HOSKINS: I am very sorry to have this occur, because we have lost so much time in parliamentary wrangling, with which I am not very familiar. I have not said a word on the question of taxation down to the present moment, and I would like to suggest to the membership that there is a large number of delegates who would at least like to say a few words on this proposition, and who before the debate closes ought to be permitted to say those words, and if certain members occupy too much of the time in their discussion, I want to suggest in all kindness that it is a little bit unfair to the other delegates. Our votes are not always understood, and we have at least a right to explain our positions before the Convention. That is practically all I wish to do.

I came to this Convention believing that it was right and proper that authority might exist for classification of property for taxation purposes. I am not a tax expert. I do not pretend to be a tax expert. Only as I observed the rules and methods of taxation in my own every-day business and in my own every-day experience did I come to the conclusion that to permit the legislature to classify property for the purpose of taxation would be the proper thing to do. I have not seen anything since I came here to materially change my mind on that proposition, and yet it seems that a majority of the Convention are adherents of the uniform rule. I think it is only fair to say that I have no criticism to make of those members who desire to maintain the present uniform rule, but I do have a criticism of their attempt to tax bonds under the uniform rule. I want to say here that I am and have been at all times in thorough sympathy with the so-called one per cent law. I believe it did a great deal of good in the state of Ohio, but that one per cent law is a statutory matter pure and simple, and is not a matter which ought to be written into the constitution; and I want to appeal to the membership here not to be foolish, not to do a radical thing. We all admit this much, that the one per cent law is the minimum. Nobody has made any provision to write in one-half or three-quarters of one per cent. Nobody has undertaken to write that into the constitution, but you have undertaken to put in what all of us say is the actual minimum on which the government of our cities can be maintained. We may get along out in the country, although we have one or two school districts that have been unable to maintain themselves and pay their expenses this year, but possibly that is not so much the fault of the one per cent rule as of the method of assessment, all of which will correct itself in time. But we admit this, that in writing in one per cent you have written the minimum under which the government can be maintained. How does that appeal to you as a constitutional matter, to write in the very lowest thing under which the government of municipalities can be maintained? Is it good constitution making to take the extreme and radical view of the proposition and attempt to write it in the constitution?

Now, I am opposed to including the Smith one per cent law in the constitution, and I am perfectly consistent. Being an ardent supporter of the Smith one per cent law, I do not want to be misunderstood, but I look upon it as purely a statutory matter with which the constitution should not be concerned.

From my point of view the adoption of the initiative and referendum is one of the big things we have thus far accomplished, and if we do not get foolish before we get through and discredit our work the people of the state of Ohio will approve the work we have done on the initiative and referendum. If they do that, what is the status? Have you not a perfect safeguard if the future contingencies do not call for the repeal of the one per cent law? Haven't you ample safeguards in the hands of the people themselves to prevent the so-called reckless and arbitrary and unreasonable and mercenary legislature from repealing that one per cent law? You can refer it to the people and prevent the repeal and hold the Smith one per cent law in the present statute. If conditions that may develop in five or ten or fifteen years from now do not demand its repeal, and the law works well, the people have it in their power to fix that law on the statute books.

It is almost certain that the initiative and referendum proposition will be adopted, and the people in the state of Ohio will have it within their own power to keep this one per cent tax law as long as it subserves the interests of the state and its municipalities, and as long as they can live under it. I fully believe that with proper administration of public affairs you will fully be able in your townships and municipalities to get along on the maximum, the one and a half per cent rate.

Now I think too that it is much more important that there be adopted in this constitution a provision that would provide for a production tax, for an income tax, for an inheritance tax and for a franchise tax. I am not sure just how many of those are already permitted. I do not think the inheritance tax is prohibited under our present constitution. I do not think the income tax is, but in providing for a working tax law in this Convention I believe we should provide for those four taxes. As I understand it they are provided for both in the direct and in the alternative proposition.

I do not care to go into any extensive argument of the proposition, but it seems to me if those who want to maintain the uniform rule in Ohio, want to be fair with the voters of the state and want to put up the principle of taxation to the people, that the people may pass on that proposition, they should put up both alternatives, and let the people pass on both. I do not know of any reason why those who support the initiative and referendum should not be willing to let the people pass on both of these propositions, and let us accept the verdict of the people at the polls.

I come from a rural county. It is one of those poor counties that were mentioned by the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN], poor, because it is not as large as Hamilton or Cuyahoga, but I think we are as rich as any county in the state. I think we can get along under the one per cent rate, and I want to say this further, as a farmer: Appeals seem to have been made to farmers, as if the proposition not to write a limitation were a conspiracy against the farmer. I do not look upon it that way. I have more of my little earthly possessions in farm lands than anything else. I am more interested in the productiveness and in taxes on farms than in any other business proposition outside of my own profession, and I do not sympathize with these appeals that have been made as if the proposition to not write a limitation in the constitution were liable to result in a higher tax on farm lands.

Now I want to appeal to the fairness of men from the rural counties. While you may be with me supporters of the one per cent tax law, believing it should be kept on the books until thoroughly tried, I feel that it is unfair for us, over the protest of the men living in the large municipalities, to write this minimum limitation in the constitution; and I am tempted to question the sincerity of the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] when he made his appeal last night to the men of this Convention to write that extreme limitation in the constitution. I do not believe he means it. I believe that the many votes cast on that proposition in favor of writing that limitation in the constitution were for the purpose of loading it down and defeating it at the polls, and I do not believe we should do that. I think we should vote our sentiments. I do not think we should load anything down so as to defeat it at the polls, and if you insist on writing into the constitution this matter which is legislative and which the people and their representatives have a right to pass upon, you will load it down with something that will defeat it at the polls. If you believe in the intelligence of the people, give the alternative propositions to the people, so that the people can pass upon their system of taxation in an intelligent way, and if they retain the uniform rule all well and good. If a majority of them vote for classification you ought not to complain, because it will be an intelligent verdict of the people of the state of Ohio.

Now I want to say again, and then I shall have no more to say on the taxation question from beginning to end, I favor writing a production tax in the constitution; I favor writing an income tax in the constitution; I favor writing an inheritance tax and a franchise tax in the constitution, and I want the provision so drawn that when the voters pass upon it this fall they will approve those propositions and not defeat the constitution because it is loaded down with statutory matters that ought not to be in it.

What will we do if you furnish all the arguments against the proposition that are furnished in the Winn amendment? It means defeat of all of the constitutional amendments. It will mean the defeat of the franchise, the income, the inheritance and the production taxes, and all the other things we are seeking to arrive at, and I want to warn you if you attempt to put through this arbitrary method of taxation, and give the people no choice between the two methods, you are loading it down, and you who are pretending to want these other methods of taxation, the franchise, the inheritance, the production and the income taxes, are simply going to defeat the proposition yourselves, and the blame will be upon your heads when the polls close at the time this matter is submitted. I appeal to you in common honesty and fairness, give us these alternative propositions, and if you want the uniform rule, you had better cut out the Winn amendment.

Mr. HOLTZ: If we incorporate this limitation in the constitution, can we not under the initiative and referendum by a vote of the people increase the limitation if we find the limitation is too low?

Mr. HOSKINS: Increase the limitation?

Mr. HOLTZ: Yes?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes, you could; but you would have to change the constitution to do it.

Mr. HOLTZ: But under the initiative and referendum we have a provision for that, as I understand it.

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes. I would ask you, are you satisfied with the present Smith law?

Mr. HOLTZ: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: If we adopt the constitution without any limit whatever, under the initiative and referendum can you not prevent the legislature from repealing the Smith law by the referendum?

Mr. HOLTZ: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then it is all right.

Mr. BIGELOW: Mr. President: Next to the initiative and referendum, which seek to get government back as close as possible to the people, the measure before the Convention now is the one to which I have given most thought, and in which I have the most concern. In view of this, I trust it will not be thought out of place for me to have a few words on the floor, and to give my reasons for urging the adoption of the amendment now pending.

The issue before the Convention is this: The Convention has gone on record so that there is no question that a majority of the members believe in the position taken by the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN]. They believe in the uniform rule. There is no dispute about that. Now there is one other question before us. There is some reasonable doubt as to whether the people of the state of Ohio agree with the position taken by the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN]. I think every man here will admit that there is some reasonable doubt as to that. Now, in opposition to the member from Defiance and his friends, there are those in this Convention who feel very strongly upon this subject. They take issue with him. They know the Convention is with him, but they honestly believe that the people are with them. They come here with this single request, that this Convention will not prejudge the question as to where the people stand, but that this Convention will permit a clear, clean issue to be drawn before the people themselves, as between one side and the other of this dispute. Wendell Phillips once made a beautiful use of that story in the Bible about the healing of the cripple at the pool of Bethesda. The cripples sat about hopeless until the angel came and stirred the waters. It was only when the waters were agitated that there was healing in their flow. We feel thus about this question of taxation and public opinion. Who can oppose the agitation of this question before the people? Who can deny our right to go out before the people at the polls the latter part of August or the first of September, when this question is to be submitted, and try to educate them, and talk to them as we are talking to each other about this question?

Now this is the issue, members of the Convention. Our fellow members—and I say this to the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] and to the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], and I say it to every one of you, though you may differ with us. Will you give us that chance? Will you give us the right to carry this question directly to the people? I remember the saying of the great abolitionist orator of Boston that "He does not really believe his own opinions who dares not give free scope to his opponent." Are you going to take that position today that you are so sure you are right and so sure the people are with you that you will not allow a referendum on this question, or give us a chance to take the matter to the people and let them say what their opinion about it is?

We have heard a great deal about the farmers and bonds and property. I want to say a word about something about which not much has been said. I want to say a word about humanity, and the relation of this question of taxation to it. The two greatest problems that affect the material welfare of mankind are the problems of wages and prices.

Now I look upon the power of taxation as the most effective instrument that the state has to reduce prices and to increase wages, to swell the volume of business and create prosperity. It is because I think I see the social result of a righteous system of taxation, and the social evils of a wrong system of taxation, that I am anxious that at no time in the future shall the power of the state be thwarted or the hands of the people be tied, but that we may be forever free to use this power as at any given time our judgment dictates, in order that we may work with this power to reduce prices and increase wages and bring prosperity and justice to man. Now a word about that.

First about prices: There can be no dispute among thoughtful men that every time you put a tax upon the product of labor you increase the cost of that thing to the consumer. Take an old cow in a farmer's barnyard. The assessor comes around and taxes the cow. He taxes the cow as a going concern. He taxes the hide on the back of the cow. The cow is killed, and it is skinned and the hide is sent to a tannery. The assessor comes around and puts another tax on that hide. The hide is made up into a piece of leather and it goes to the warehouse of a leather manufacturer and while there the assessor comes around. He is supposed to put everything the man has on the duplicate. If he does, he puts another tax on that hide. The leather is made into a harness and sold to a jobber, a friend of mine. He has it in his store, and the assessor comes and is supposed to put everything the man has on the duplicate. If he does, he puts another tax on that hide. The jobber sells the harness to a retail merchant down in Kentucky or Tennessee some place, and the merchant hangs the harness up in his front window. He is sitting in the rear of his store and a man comes in not to buy harnesses but to tax them. The assessor is supposed to put on the duplicate everything the man has. If he does, he puts another tax on that hide. At last the merchant sells that harness to a farmer and the farmer takes it home. Then the farmer receives a visit from the tax assessor. The theory is that if the farmer has made any improvement he has to be penalized. If he has built a fence, or dug a ditch or built a barn, or bought a piano for his daughter, or purchased any machinery, if he has done anything useful that in any way contributes to the employment of labor and the general prosperity, his taxes are increased that much. The assessor looks for some evidence of prosperity and is about discouraged when his eyes light on that new harness. If he carries out the theory under which he is working, he puts that down; so the old hide gets another tax. It is a harness in the hands of the farmer, and perhaps the same farmer who owned the cow with which we started.

You will say the hide will go through quickly enough to escape some of those taxes, and I grant it, but it certainly will get some of them, and every tax adds to the price of the harness to the consumer.

Talk about high prices. There is your greatest cost. For every time you lay a tax on the product of labor you increase the price to the consumer, and when you increase the price to the consumer you to that extent reduce his purchasing power, and when you reduce his purchasing power he cannot buy as much as he needs of the retail merchant, who cannot order as much from the wholesaler, who cannot buy of the factory. Then the men in the factory are not employed steadily at good wages, and the result of that system of loading all the burdens of taxation on the products of labor is to start an endless chain of depression, a lowering of wages, and an increase of prices to make poverty in the cities, and hard times for many. You ask me if there is any way to raise taxes without that? Most assuredly. In Cincinnati we have a street car company that is operating under a grant that I regard as nothing short of legalized robbery. Under that franchise that street car company takes five cents every time a man or a woman rides. You can get the same ride for three cents in Columbus, and you can get the same ride for three cents in Cleveland. If we were able to have some latitude in this matter of taxation, so that Cincinnati could do a little as she pleases in a matter of this kind, if this Constitutional Convention and the people and then the legislature would say that the people of Cincinnati might have some latitude in this matter, what could we do? Why, we could put a tax on that franchise, and by every criterion of justice we should put a tax on that franchise, and take part of that two cents that that company steals every time it collects a fare. Every penny of that would be a clear gain to the public and would not increase by a mill the expense to the people riding on the street cars.

There are other ways in which the power of taxation, if properly used, could be used for the benefit of the people, and without any discouragement to industry or any reduction of price or employment of wages.

Take the tenement house problem in Cincinnati. There is not an expert who ever studied the problem who has not seen the relation between that problem and the problem of taxation. What did the tenement house commission in New York say after investigating this question? What is the view of all the students who have studied the subject? Why, I can hardly find words fitly to describe the murder pens where the little children of my city pant for breath in the summer time, where they are denied playgrounds and spend their lives between brick walls, with hardly a blade of grass or a ray of God's sunshine. Give a bonus in the way of exemption upon model tenement houses, and let us in Cincinnati, if we please, use the power of taxation to fight this evil of the tenement house, where conditions are such that people perish in body and perish in mind and perish in soul. Do you mean to say that the members of this Convention will not even allow us to go to the people with this question in order to try to get the problem of taxation so fixed that in the cities, when we desire and when we understand that there is a way by which we can use this power to oppose social evils that we have confronting us, we cannot use it to increase the opportunity of men to help them make a better living for themselves? Do you mean to say that when we see how this power may be so used that you in the Constitutional Convention will not grant us the right to use it that way? You are fixing it now so that we may not even receive it from the legislature. You bind our hands for all time in our efforts to solve this problem in the cities.

But our motives have been impugned. It is so easy to accuse somebody of working for some special interest, just because he differs with you. I remember the gentleman from Hamilton county [Mr. PECK] the other day standing on this floor, and I saw his gray hairs. I remember the magnificent service he has rendered in this Convention and what an honor his record here will be, and how much it will be appreciated back in Hamilton county where the people love him; and, knowing him as I do—I saw him standing there with his gray hairs, giving his opinion on this matter of taxation, and then I saw the member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] stand up and dare to put to that man the question, "Do you own any bonds, or do you represent any bond brokers in Cincinnati?" Nothing like it has happened on the floor of this Convention. Nothing like it should ever happen again. Oh, my friends, it is easy to accuse some people of sinister motives, though I should think it would be hard to suspect unworthy motives of my noble colleague from Hamilton county, Judge Peck.

But our motives are impugned. I was accused last night of tearing up a piece of paper containing a list of names of members in the order they had asked for recognition, presumably to give some one an advantage in this debate. That paper was torn up last week because I took it for granted that we were going to start anew when we gathered here this week. Now, my friends, you may impugn my motives. Some people may say that I am a singletaxer, and I frankly admit, I proudly acknowledge, that I am a singletaxer, but when a man says I want this because I think it will bring single tax, he accuses me of dishonesty and deceit. I leave it to him whether he can in good conscience impugn my motives in this matter. I want the power because I know that it is a tremendous power that may be used to the detriment of the poor people of my city or to their great blessing. My people probably do not know enough about this question of taxation. They may not have given enough thought to use it in the way that I would think the most intelligent, but we are not sure, are we, that we have all the wisdom upon this subject? We are not sure that we have already said the last word upon it, that we are not only not willing to learn more about it, but that we are actually willing to tie the hands of this great state and say by constitutional amendment, "You shall not learn anything more." Everybody knows that there is only one possible condition of progress, and that is the right of men to experiment with their problems. Untie the hands of the people of this state, allow the legislature some latitude in the matter of taxation, so that at some time in the future, if it wishes to, it may say to the city of Cleveland or Cincinnati or to this, that or the other county, "You may have some latitude on this question, you may experiment within certain restrictions laid down by the state law in this matter of taxation." Then each community as it desires may by experimenting learn a little something. Possibly they will make mistakes, but they will learn from those mistakes. The only possible condition of progress is that men shall be free to experiment. I have not enough wisdom to settle this question. I do not believe that any other member of the Convention has enough wisdom to settle the question for a generation, and I think the wisest statesmanship and the highest wisdom now is for us to leave this great state with as much freedom as possible, in the confidence that the people in their freedom will learn more than we in our wisdom know now.

I know the members from the country do not appreciate these problems. Members of the Convention, have not the cities of the state suffered enough by this disposition of the farmers to attempt not only to run their own affairs, which they have a right to without let or hindrance from the city, but also to run our affairs too? Why, some of the members discussed this question as though they were endowed with that wisdom which enables them with a single pair of eyes to encompass the globe. I remember that the fifty-year franchise, by which they are robbing the people of my city, was put through this legislature by the votes of farmers who came from counties where they didn't have a street car in the county.

I spoke on this question once in Shelby county and a man came up after the meeting. It was a Chautauqua up there. He had been a senator from that district when the fifty-year franchise was granted, and that afternoon he defended his vote. He said, "Why, you have so much political corruption in Cincinnati I thought it best to give that fifty-year franchise away. You could never have any more boodle about it then." He wanted to save us from ourselves. Gentlemen of the Convention, cities of Ohio are well able to take care of themselves. They only want the privilege of looking out for their own salvation. They do not want to be run by men who do not know their problems.

Taxation.

I have been for fifteen years and more a minister of a church in the midst of the tenement house district of my city. I have seen two kinds of poverty. I have seen the kind of poverty that is the result of shiftlessness or dissipation or laziness. That kind of poverty should never be interfered with by law. When a man brings that kind of poverty upon himself it is his natural punishment, and it ought to be the aim of all legislatures to let the man bear that kind of poverty as long as he chooses to bring it upon himself.

But I think I have seen a different kind of poverty in my city, a poverty that has been due to what I conceive to be bad laws, which increase prices and restrict the volume of trade, curtail the chance of employment, reduce wages and crowd many out on the very verge of starvation. I remember one case of that kind. It was on the last night of the old year that I received a letter from a man in our city infirmary. This man was about to die. He had dictated a letter to me. He wanted me to come out to see him once more before he died. I had known the man. He was a switchman in the C., H. & D. yards in Cincinnati when I first knew him. He and his wife were consumptives. They struggled along until he injured himself at his work. He was not able to continue that work. They opened a candy store and he went out on the street to sell papers while his wife stood in the store. His arm was injured so that he could not hold his crutch, and they strapped his crutch to him, and he went out on the street to sell papers, and his little wife took care of the store and their one child. She washed and she cooked, and she worked and she wasted away day by day. Oh, the heroism of that struggle against poverty! But the battle went against them. At last the mother broke down under the load and died. I went out into Indiana to the old grandmother's to bury her, and they gave the child to that grandmother, who was wretchedly poor and very old. The father was anxious to do something to help her care for the child. So he moved into a tenement house within a stone's throw of my church. There he continued selling papers. The inmates of that tenement may have begged or stolen down on the street. But they were good to this cripple. They helped him on and off with his clothes. They went on errands for him and steadied his palsied feet up and down the rickety stairs. I remember one night near Christmas time groping my way through the dark halls to see this man. I knocked at the wrong door. A voice called to me to come in. I opened the door. In the middle of the room stood a woman bending over a wash-tub. Washing all day long somewhere else, she was washing her own clothes there. I asked her where my man lived, giving his name. "You mean the cripple," she asked, "the one who sells papers?" Taking the lamp she went out with her steaming arms into the cold hall to show me where the man lived.

Now I am pleading with you to allow the cities by taxation to destroy these tenement houses, and I would like to show you the picture I saw there. An old dry goods box for a table. On it a few dirty dishes. A stove, but no fuel. The walls reeking with filth. The floor bare, and in one corner of the room a bed, and on it lay this shadow of a man who recognized me and put his arm up to me. I took his hand. With tears in his eyes he said, "Friend Bigelow, there is only one place for me now. I have seen it coming for a long time, and I have been fighting against it, but I have to go to the poor house." I saw how he hated to say the name of the place. No man begins life with the expectation of ending it in the poor house. A few days afterward he went to the poor house. I was there the last night that he was on earth. I received a letter from him calling me there, and the last line of the letter showed where the man's heart was, "I shall never see my boy again." I went out that night. He was still able to talk in a whisper, and he told me the name of the doctor to whom he wanted me to send his dead body. The doctor had served him and his family, and as many an heroic doctor does in the slums of my city, he had served without pay, and now on his deathbed, this man was grateful, and if the doctor wanted his old body, he desired that he should have it. After giving me this strange direction, there came a sinking spell and I thought the man was going down into the Valley of the Shadow, but at last his lips moved, and leaning I caught these words, "Death, that is not hard; that is only a change of cars, but, my boy, my boy!" Do they tell you the poor do not mind their poverty, that they get used to it?

The toad beneath the harrow knows
Exactly where the tooth point goes;
The butterfly upon the road,
Preaches contentment to that toad.

Ah, my friends, in the name of those broken hearts, in the name of those blighted hopes, in the name of those ruined lives, we plead for justice of laws, laws that shall give men greater freedom to labor while it is day, and more of sweetness to remember in the night that cometh when the day is done. I am not here to erect any sign posts warning men not to venture into untried ways of government. I think it is my highest function in this Constitutional Convention to leave to the people of the state of Ohio the largest possible freedom in dealing with this greatest of all problems, and I appeal to you, my friends, if you do not agree with us, at any rate, let us go to the people themselves, and let them decide as between you and us. I thank you.

Mr. COLTON: At the beginning of the discussion when it seemed that a majority of this Convention were in favor of the minority report, it was thought that discussion would be throttled and we would not be fair with our opponents and allow a free expression of opinion; but there was no such disposition on part of the majority. We wanted to allow a free and full discussion and I believe that has been thoroughly accomplished.

Mr. DOTY: Agreed.

Mr. COLTON: Now, with the understanding that we would not take an unfair advantage of those evidently in the minority, we kept faith with them and we have listened to every phase of the matter and have had an eloquent appeal for the submission of an alternative proposition to the people. The very eloquent picture of the condition of the tenements of Cincinnati appeals to us and touches our sympathy, but we should not forget the tenement problem is an ever-present problem in the city of New York under classification and we do not see how classification of property for taxation is going to be a solution of that problem. The evils of taxation have been very eloquently pictured to us. We are living under a civilized government in a civilized world and such government can not be continued and maintained without taxation. I wish it could. Our system of taxation is based upon the uniform rule. We believe so long as we have a property tax the uniform rule is a just method of applying taxation. Believing that, gentlemen, I appeal to you to stand together, shoulder to shoulder, in the votes that are to come and express your convictions squarely and guard yourselves against being swept away from the position which you have come here to defend by eloquence which I confess is very enticing. Stand together upon the votes that are to come and vote your conviction. There is no reason why we should submit this alternative proposition to the people. We believe uniform taxation is right, that the main proposition of the minority report is right, and let us vote our convictions and submit this to the people in practically the form that it is before the Convention. Mr. President, I move the previous question.

Mr. DOTY: Before that is put I demand the yeas and nay vote on the amendment.

The main question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is, Shall the amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] be agreed to?

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 57, nays 53, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Fox,	Mauck,
Antrim,	Hahn,	Nye,
Beyer,	Halenkamp,	Peck,
Bowdle,	Halfhill,	Read,
Brown, Lucas	Harris, Hamilton,	Redington,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL [during roll call] Gentlemen of the Convention: I hardly know what to do, but I am going to rest this with the people. I want the matter settled right and we will let the people settle it. I vote aye.

Mr. LAMPSON: A point of order. There is nothing in order except the finishing of the roll call.

The roll call was then finished.

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to explain my vote too.

Mr. LAMPSON: The previous question has been ordered on all of these amendments.

Mr. DOTY: I withdraw my demand for the yeas and nays and I am willing to have a division.

The PRESIDENT: The next amendment in order is the amendment offered by the delegate from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER].

Mr. PIERCE: I desire to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. The main question has been ordered and no amendments are in order.

Mr. WOODS: Is a motion to lay on the table in order? If so, I move to lay the Fackler amendment on the table.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is not in order.

Mr. WOODS: I want it on the table. I want everything on the table. I want to kill everything.

Mr. DOTY: Everything?

Mr. WOODS: Yes; everything.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is the adoption of the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER]. The motion to lay on the table is not in order.

Mr. WOODS: I demand the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. WINN: If the motion to table the Fackler amendment prevails there will be nothing before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: There is no motion to table before the Convention. The question is on the adoption of the Fackler amendment. When that is disposed of the Anderson amendment will be left.

Mr. WOODS: Do I understand this Doty amendment has been adopted as an amendment to the proposal and to be submitted separately?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Then how can that be submitted by less than sixty-one votes.

Mr. DOTY: It is an amendment to the proposal itself. It comes at the end of whatever proposal is adopted.

Mr. WOODS: If that is the way, we had better adopt the Fackler amendment and then kill the whole thing.

The PRESIDENT: The member is out of order.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I would like some information about the proposal. Is the Doty amendment to the Fackler amendment?

The PRESIDENT: The amendment offered by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty], which was adopted, becomes attached to whatever proposal is finally adopted by the Convention.

Taxation.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Does it become a tax—

The PRESIDENT: I said attached — “a-t-t-a-c-h-e-d”.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: In an alternative sense.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Is it not understood that the Doty amendment will be submitted not as a part of the one now attempted to be adopted, but as an alternative?

The PRESIDENT: That is right, detached.

Mr. LAMPSON: It is an independent proposition, and has not received a proper number of votes.

Mr. DOTY: It is not an independent proposition.

Mr. KING: Do I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Mahoning changing the phraseology in line 10 and line 13, was adopted or made a part of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT: That was an amendment to the original proposition and not an amendment to the substitute offered by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Fackler]. The question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by Mr. Fackler, and on that the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 93, nays 15, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

The amendment of Mr. Fackler was agreed to.

Mr. LAMPSON: I rise to a question of order, and to know just exactly where we are, I would like to have the first part of the amendment adopted read to see what it means.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will read what the member desires.

The SECRETARY [reading]: “Substitute Proposal No. 170—Mr. Worthington. To submit an amendment to article XII, sections 1, 2 and 6 of the constitution, and by adding thereto sections 7 and 8, relative to taxation.”

Mr. LAMPSON: That was all stricken out and the Anderson amendment adopted several days ago.

The SECRETARY: This is the Anderson amendment I am reading.

Mr. LAMPSON: Which was adopted several days ago. Now I want to hear the first part of the Fackler amendment.

The SECRETARY [reading]: “Strike out all after the resolving clause—

Mr. LAMPSON: We have stricken out every thing after the resolving clause of the substitute Anderson amendment.

The SECRETARY: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: I would like to know where the Doty amendment comes in then.

The PRESIDENT: The amendment comes in as an addition to the proposal as amended.

Mr. LAMPSON: Now I would like to have the first part of that read.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY [reading]: “Mr. Doty moves to amend Proposal No. 170 as follows: At the end of the proposal add”—

Mr. LAMPSON: I make the point that by the adoption of the Fackler amendment we have stricken out the Doty amendment, and I call for a vote upon the original as amended by the adoption of the Fackler amendment.

Mr. DOTY: The time for making that point of order has long since passed. We are under the previous question, and that point of order will not lie at this time.

Mr. LAMPSON: It does not need to be a point of order. I have taken pains to show you what we have done and I only want the members of the Convention to understand what they are voting upon, as shown by the record, which is to adopt the original Worthington proposal as amended, and the Doty amendment has been stricken out by the adoption of the Fackler amendment.

Mr. DWYER: I rise to a question of information. Before the vote was taken I inquired of Mr. Doty whether there was any contradiction between his amendment and the Fackler amendment and he assured me there was not. If there was then my vote was given through a mistake. Mr. Doty can explain whether that is a fact. I asked him the question because I wanted to support his amendment.

Mr. DOTY: The member is right. He did ask me that and I said it did not conflict with the Fackler amendment and it does not. The member did get that information from me in good faith.

Mr. LAMPSON: I simply want the Convention to understand that by the adoption of the Fackler amendment they struck out everything that had been adopted prior to that except what was included in the Fackler amendment; they struck out all after the resolving clause.

Mr. MARRIOTT: On the contrary, have we not adopted the Fackler substitute with all the amendments that have been added to it, one of which was the Doty amendment?

Taxation.

Mr. LAMPSON: The Doty amendment was not added to the Fackler amendment. It does not pretend to have been added to the Fackler amendment, and I again call for the reading of the first part of the Doty amendment so that every member may understand it. That Doty amendment preceded the Fackler amendment.

Mr. MARRIOTT: No, sir; it followed it.

Mr. DWYER: I move to recess until two o'clock to enable the president and secretary to get things straight. I want to know where we stand.

Mr. LAMPSON: I want to have the first part of the Doty amendment read again.

The SECRETARY [reading]: "Mr. Doty moved to amend Proposal No. 170 as follows: At the end of the proposal add."

Mr. LAMPSON: It was at the end of Proposal No. 170 that it was added. Subsequently thereto the Fackler amendment was adopted which struck out everything after the resolving clause.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It has been accepted without controversy that a number of amendments have been directed to the original proposition and they had no force as applicable to the Fackler amendment. Is not the same thing true about the Doty amendment?

Mr. ANDERSON: So that we may not have mental confusion concerning this, I move that we recess until two o'clock.

Mr. LAMPSON: I make the point of order that the previous question has been ordered and the motion to recess now can not be entertained.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken.

Mr. DWYER: We ought to know where we are and a recess will let us find out.

The PRESIDENT: The president would say to the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] and the member from Montgomery [Mr. DWYER] that that motion is not in order until the previous question has been exhausted.

Mr. KING: The Fackler amendment offered when it was offered was to do nothing more than to strike out the Anderson amendment. Long after that the Doty amendment was offered and carried and made a part of Proposal No. 170. Now by adopting the substitute offered by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] it only amends that part of Proposal No. 170 that it described in the condition in which it was when it was offered, and the amendment by Mr. Doty is an addition to whatever may be adopted as a substitute for the proposal as it read at the time of the offering of the amendment by Mr. Fackler.

Mr. LAMPSON: Whatever was added by the Doty amendment is stricken out by the Fackler amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The president will have to rule otherwise.

Mr. WOODS: We ought to understand each other. Before we voted on the Fackler amendment I made a motion. I supposed at that time the Doty amendment was to the Fackler amendment, because I could not see how it could be otherwise. The Fackler amendment struck out everything. That is the reason I made the motion to lay the Fackler amendment on the table, and would have voted against the Fackler amendment if I had not been informed by the chair that the Doty amendment was no part of the Fackler amendment. Certainly, under no circumstances would I have voted for the Doty amendment. I would not do it in its original place and I would not have voted for the Fackler amendment if that had been a part of it.

Mr. DOTY: Did you not vote for the Fackler amendment with the distinct understanding that my amendment was not a part of it?

Mr. WOODS: I voted for it because I was informed that your amendment was not part of it at all.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is not this the situation: First the Anderson substitute, by being adopted yesterday, became the basis for all other amendments. Then next in order was the Fackler substitute. So that was the substitute in the so-called Anderson proposal. Then, after that, there was a correction of phraseology offered in the way of amendments and it was ruled that that attached not only to the Fackler amendment but to the Anderson proposal. Now by this last vote upon the Fackler amendment has not that entirely taken the place of the Anderson amendment or proposal? Now to what was the Doty amendment directed, toward the Anderson proposal or toward the Fackler amendment? To which is it attached?

The PRESIDENT: The amendment is attached to either one automatically.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then it was out of order?

Mr. LAMPSON: And it required sixty votes to pass.

Mr. HALFHILL: The amendment of the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] was to the proposal, was it not? I do not see anything else to it, and the proposal is the proposal of Mr. Worthington; it was the minority report bearing that name. This is all a mere matter of parliamentary hairsplitting. Do you suppose I would have voted for the Fackler amendment without a full understanding, as the other members generally understood it, that we were going to have that alternative submitted?

Mr. ANDERSON: What was your understanding with reference to the Doty amendment? It had to attach to something or it was out of order.

Mr. HALFHILL: It attached to the proposal that was before the Convention.

Mr. ANDERSON: To what did it attach? Did it attach to the Anderson proposal that took place of the minority report?

Mr. HALFHILL: To the proposal before the Convention. It was offered to and made a part of the proposal under consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON: It had to attach to something. To what did the Doty amendment attach? Did it attach to the Fackler amendment or to the Anderson substitute?

Mr. HALFHILL: You are splitting hairs.

Mr. DWYER: Mr. President: You very beautifully appealed to the Convention for fair play in your speech and I trust we shall have perfectly fair play and a full understanding of the different amendments before we dispose of this question. I want to know where we are. I would rather suspend business for ten or fifteen minutes and enable you to present the matter fully before us.

The PRESIDENT: The president thinks he can rule on the matter. The question is on the adoption of Proposal No. 170 as amended, and when adopted it stands amended with the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty].

Mr. LAMPSON: Did not the amendment of Mr.

Taxation.

Fackler strike everything out after the resolving clause and so did it not take with it the Doty amendment?

The PRESIDENT: The president does not so understand.

Mr. FESS: I would just like one word. Our confusion is due perhaps to a little carelessness in the wording of the amendment. I don't think there is any doubt that it was understood that the Doty amendment when carried would apply to whatever we finally adopted, but it does not seem to be so worded. It specifically says "amend the Worthington proposal" and we are in confusion that will not be settled in any other way than by a vote to interpret its meaning. That is the only possible way. Here is one set of men saying it means one thing and here is another set saying it means another, and the president will rule upon the matter. Then I will appeal from his decision and the vote of the Convention will decide what is the interpretation. Let the Convention decide it. That is the only way it can be done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is not altogether fair. Suppose it goes to an appeal, it takes two-thirds to overrule the president.

Mr. FESS: It takes only a majority. That is the only way to get out of it, to let the Convention interpret.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: That I think will get at it, but I think it might be well to take time to settle the matter, and I move that we suspend the rules and take a recess until 2:30.

DELEGATES: No.

Mr. ULMER: It seems kind of funny to me that this body of learned men do not understand what we have voted on. I am a simple citizen and not a lawyer, but I know what we voted on and it was not the proposal. It was the Doty amendment, which, as it was stated fairly and frankly, would be submitted as a separate proposal to the people. It was not to the amendment of Mr. Fackler. It was a separate proposition. Was it not so stated? It was stated that it should be an alternative.

The PRESIDENT: Of course, debate on this is out of order, but limited discussion seems to be perfectly proper.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It seems to me that the member from Greene [Mr. Fess], with his usual good sense, has offered a solution. The Convention clearly expressed a wish that the alternative proposition should be submitted to the people. Now by some parliamentary tangle it seems that that may or may not be done in the regular order of procedure at this moment. Doctor Fess has offered a solution. Let the president make his decision, which will be appealed from, and the common sense and justice of this Convention will decide that question in a minute, and we can dispose of it without a whole lot of parliamentary maneuvering.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Mr. President: If I understood you correctly in your remarks, you pleaded with us to give the people an opportunity to have the alternative proposition. Was I correct in so understanding you?

The PRESIDENT: The president does not feel that he has a right to engage in the discussion from the chair, but is willing to rule.

Mr. LAMPSON: Just a word. I do not want to be captious about the matter. I am simply calling attention to the record. I am not appealing. I want it understood that the record is as it has been read, and will have to be made up that way unless the Convention changes it, and an appeal would not settle it. I will not sit here and vote against my judgment on a question of order for the purpose of correcting the record. The way to correct the record is to do it properly and not go on record on a point of order, exactly the opposite of what is parliamentary.

Mr. FESS: I would ask the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] if there is any possible way of stopping this confusion other than the way I suggest?

Mr. LAMPSON: There is a way when it is all about correcting the record.

Mr. FESS: What is there in the record that needs correcting?

Mr. LAMPSON: If this is adopted the record will not show that the Doty amendment is adopted.

Mr. FESS: It does show.

Mr. LAMPSON: It will not, and if you will take the record and read it after it is all over you will see the point.

Mr. FESS: Oh, I understand your position.

Mr. LAMPSON: Everything after the resolving clause is stricken out in the proposal as amended in the adoption of the Fackler amendment. With that statement I am perfectly willing to vote.

Mr. FESS: I would like to know from Mr. Lampson whether if this appeal goes before the Convention he means he would not abide by it?

Mr. LAMPSON: I mean if I vote to sustain the chair, as I should like to do, to be accommodating, and correct the record, I would vote exactly opposite to what my inclination and knowledge of parliamentary law tells me is right, and I do not like to be put in that position.

Mr. PECK: Suppose the president decides, as he probably will, that you are all wrong in your implication and that the record does not lead to the conclusion that you say it does. Will not an appeal settle that?

Mr. LAMPSON: An appeal will not change the record.

Mr. PECK: There is nothing in the record to change, except by implication.

Mr. LAMPSON: I am not objecting to a vote.

Mr. PECK: You people are trying to make all the trouble you can.

Mr. KNIGHT: I doubt if there is any member of the Convention who has a particle of doubt in his own mind as to what he thought we were doing when we voted for or against the so-called Doty alternative proposition. Those of us who are not sharks on the subject of parliamentary law knew perfectly well what we were voting for, and when it was adopted it was adopted to be attached to whatever should be finally the form of Proposal No. 170. It seems to me that the Convention having voted that way should adopt the best way possible of making our record conform with the facts. We know what the facts were, and every one of us knows what we really did, although it may or may not have been in strict parliamentary order. The only question before us is how to get the record in shape to show exactly what we thought we were doing and what we did do.

The PRESIDENT: The president would like to rule on this matter. There may have been some irregularity, to which the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] has called attention, yet the question that presents itself is what is the will of the Convention as expressed by the vote taken. The president understands that the situation was this: The question now before the Convention is the adoption of Proposal No. 170 with the amendments that have been agreed to, including the amendment offered by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty]. I would so rule, and if an appeal is taken the president would be glad to entertain it with the understanding that if the president is sustained—and this is the ruling—that the secretary is instructed and understands it is his duty to make the record correspond to this ruling.

Mr. WOODS: Do I understand from what the chair has said that the secretary will deliberately change this written amendment to correspond with the ruling of the chair, or will he make the record just as it should be made in accordance with what we have done?

The PRESIDENT: This Convention understands the matter. The case has been plainly stated. If there is an irregularity such as the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] has called attention to, the secretary is instructed to make the necessary correction in the record in order that the record may show what, according to the ruling of the president, the real situation is. If the Convention does not choose to authorize that, the remedy is to appeal from the decision of the president.

Mr. WOODS: I want to object to any change being made in the Doty amendment or Fackler amendment and I want my objection to show on the record.

The PRESIDENT: The record will so show.

Mr. WINN: Are we to understand now that the president will give the secretary of this Convention instructions to alter the record as it now appears?

The PRESIDENT: The president thinks that is not quite the situation, but that the Convention by its acquiescence in this ruling does so instruct the secretary.

Mr. WINN: I should like to know very much whether the secretary of the Convention will make up a false record by direction from anybody.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I would like to say how I understand the situation.

Mr. TAGGART: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I understand that when we voted on this, it would be an amendment to the proposal when carried.

Mr. TAGGART: There is no question what any member of the Convention understood. When the record is completed and when it is read it will have to be approved by this Convention and then is the time to correct it. The time for correction and for this discussion is when the secretary reads the record of this day's proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I reserve the right to talk.

The PRESIDENT: Just a moment. The president wishes to say to the member from Wayne [Mr. TAGGART], as others have been exercising the privilege of talking he does not think the rule should now be enforced.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I thank the president for his fairness. He is fair now as he always is. As I understand it, if the president is sustained, he does not change the record, but we authorize the record to be made up according to what a majority of the Convention thought they were doing, and no sort of juggling will make anything else. Now I appeal from the decision of the chair, and if he is not sustained then you make up the record; if he is sustained it has been clearly stated how the majority desire to have the record made up. The question is, Shall the majority of the Convention rule the Convention?

Mr. CROSSER: I take the same view, that this was intended to be a part of whatever was adopted. I do not believe that the gentleman from Greene with his parliamentary procedure will correct it, for the reason that the record is made of the original proposal and also of the amendment. We may have intended one thing, but the mere fact that the chair may rule that that was intended to be other than what the language of the amendment says it is, can not change the fact that the amendment was in the very language it was. If it should go before the people and become a part of the constitution, the court would have to construe it on the language that it contains and not on the rulings of the chair. Now I ask unanimous consent to change the language of the Doty amendment to read that it was to the Fackler amendment rather than to the proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON: You can not change the record by a collateral attack or by inference. The only way you can change a record is to designate just what you want to strike out and just what you want to insert. It has to be definitely inserted. It can not be inserted by inference.

Mr. CROSSER: That is exactly my point.

The PRESIDENT: The president holds to the ruling. The question before the Convention is the adoption of Proposal No. 170 as amended, and this includes the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty].

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Provided that the ruling of the president is sustained, what are the changes in the record as now made up? Are there to be any changes?

The PRESIDENT: The situation will be that the secretary will be instructed to so engross the proposal that it will show that the proposal as adopted included the Doty amendment. It is impossible for the president to say what the intention of the Convention is except in the presence of the Convention.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: If the ruling of the president is sustained it does not change any subject matter of the proposal?

The PRESIDENT: The president understands merely that the secretary will be instructed to so engross the proposal and then it will be before the Convention on third reading, and then any change can be made by the Convention that a majority of the Convention may desire should be made.

The question being "Shall the proposal as amended pass?"

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess and was called to order by the president.

Mr. DOTY: I desire unanimous consent to introduce a resolution in relation to the trip to Chillicothe, which ought to be adopted so that we can properly conduct our business there.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 120:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourns on Wednesday, May 8, 1912, it be to meet in the court house at Chillicothe, Ohio, at 1:30 o'clock p. m., Thursday, May 9, 1912.

The rules were suspended and the resolution considered at once.

Mr. DWYER: What is the meaning of this?

Mr. DOTY: This is a formal matter to make our meeting there legal.

Mr. MARSHALL: I would like to ask whether the one hundred and nineteen members and all the servants and attaches of the Convention are to go along? I mean the stenographers, the doorkeepers and everybody are all to go along?

Mr. DOTY: So far as we are informed, anybody can go who has the price to pay his own fare.

Mr. MARSHALL: I thought we were to go free.

Mr. DOTY: I didn't know anything about that, but if anybody knows a way to bring it about I am with him.

Mr. MARSHALL: I understood we were to have free transportation over and back, and I want to know whether the one hundred and nineteen members and stenographers and doorkeepers and pages are going.

Mr. DOTY: We are all going that want to.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FESS: I ask unanimous consent to offer an invitation that comes from the chairman of the meeting which will be addressed tomorrow evening by President Taft. The chairman states if the invitation is accepted by the president and members of the Convention there will be a reservation in the hall and that all courtesies will be extended, so I move that the Convention accept the invitation to attend the meeting at Memorial Hall on Wednesday evening, May 8, 1912.

Mr. DOTY: Is this to interfere with the meeting of the Convention tomorrow night?

Mr. FESS: Not necessarily.

The motion of the delegate from Greene [Mr. Fess] was carried.

Mr. TAGGART: I desire unanimous consent to submit a report from a standing committee.

Consent was given and Mr. Taggart submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Schedule, to which was referred Proposal No. 229—Mr. Rockel, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following recommendation:

That the same be referred to the standing committee on Legislative and Executive Departments.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. FESS: I move a reconsideration of the vote that was taken on the matter of taxation this morning.

The motion was seconded.

Mr. DOTY: I move that further consideration of this motion be placed on the calendar for tomorrow.

The motion to postpone further consideration was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the reconsideration.

Mr. DOTY: This starts the taxation fight over again?

Mr. FESS: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: I think the member from Greene ought to state his reason for making the motion.

Mr. FESS: The reason I make the motion is that I do not believe the Convention desires to adjourn without doing something on the taxation question. We got into confusion this morning and much was done that we didn't know the result of and I do not believe it is the wish of this body to let this matter go over so near to the point of adjournment that we may adjourn without anything being done. There are so many things that we can agree upon that it seems strange to me we can not eliminate the things we differ upon and pass the others. I think we should bring this matter up again and I think we can settle it this afternoon very easily and very satisfactorily.

Mr. WOODS: Do you think we can settle it?

Mr. FESS: I think so.

Mr. WOODS: Is it your object to pass the proposal as it came to a vote?

Mr. FESS: With some modification.

Mr. WOODS: With a classification modification?

Mr. FESS: I think not. It is a concession from both sides trying to unite on things that we can agree on.

Mr. WOODS: I am willing to vote to reconsider this matter if it is understood that a classification modification is not to be included in the proposal and that there is to be no alternative. If that is the understanding I am willing to vote to reconsider, but I am not willing to do that if it is proposed to offer any classification or alternative proposition.

Taxation.

Mr. ELSON: Does not the gentleman from Medina [Mr. Woods] believe the people of Ohio have enough intelligence to vote on this subject of classification themselves?

Mr. WOODS: Yes; I think they have, but I don't think the matter ought to be submitted to them. There are only thirty-five votes in this Convention in favor of classification, and if this Convention submits to that idea there are thirty-five members of the Convention who are controlling the one hundred and nineteen.

Mr. ELSON: If the people line up as the Convention did, we could have an alternative proposition carried.

Mr. WOODS: If some one man can line up the people of Ohio as they lined up this Convention this afternoon it can be done.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not think this Convention is not ready to adopt the uniform rule with all the frills that those who believe in the uniform rule want to go into it? Do you think you can make them take just what the uniform people want without dotting an i or crossing a t?

Mr. WOODS: I happen to know what this Convention was called for. I know who called this Convention. I know that it was the Ohio State Board of Commerce. I helped to get the resolution before the general assembly. I was for the Constitutional Convention, but I was not for it for the same purpose that those fellows were for it. Now we have had this Convention called for the purpose of getting amendments through classifying property for taxation. I know what that is done for. Now this Convention is supposed to be controlled by people here in the interest of the people and not in the interest solely of the members of the State Board of Commerce. Here on this taxation proposition we have the State Board of Commerce and those supposed to be friends of the people working hand in hand and undertaking to do the bidding of the State Board of Commerce. I do not think our taxation laws should be fixed solely for the State Board of Commerce. The State Board of Commerce wants property classified. Why? Because they expect to get rid of taxes that now they have to pay. Nobody who expects if property is classified they will have to pay more money is asking for classification of property. Now, are they? This whole question of taxation is simply the question of making the other fellow pay the tax. I believe in making everybody pay his share of the taxes. I think the only way to do that is by the uniform rule and I am not willing, just because the State Board of Commerce asks for classification of property to have property classified. I do not know much about classification, but I do not need to know much about classification in order to know which way to vote. The people who are asking for classification are enough to tell me how to vote on it, because it is the people who have the most money and property and who can best afford to bear their just share of the burdens of government.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you suppose for one minute that the fifty-seven members of this Convention who went on record this morning in favor of the alternative proposition of classification are going to stultify themselves this afternoon by not voting in the alternative of the proposition? If you think that I suggest that you defeat reconsideration.

Mr. DWYER: I would like to suggest to the gentleman that this morning we intended to have it presented in both forms to the people. We were all willing for that. I am willing for it still. I am willing that the Doty amendment and the Winn amendment be submitted to the people and let the people settle it. Let the classification question go to the people as intended this morning.

Mr. PIERCE: Do you not know it is the intention of this Convention to call a special election to pass upon the work of this Constitutional Convention?

Mr. DWYER: Yes.

Mr. PIERCE: Are you in favor of submitting this question at a special election when there will not be one-half of the voters of the state who will cast their votes?

Mr. DWYER: I think we will have a full vote. The people are better qualified to settle it than we are.

Mr. PIERCE: Do you not know the vote probably will be taken within ninety days?

Mr. DWYER: That may be.

Mr. PIERCE: Are you still willing to risk this important question?

Mr. DWYER: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Gentlemen of the Convention and Judge Dwyer: I can not see any reason why the alternative proposition should be submitted upon this matter of classification any more than upon all the other forty matters that this Convention is going to submit to the people. I can not see any reason for it at all. A minority, about one-fourth of the Convention, is in favor of classification. The other three-fourths of the Convention are against classification. Certainly at least two-thirds are against it. Now, suppose the classification members submit a proposal of this kind without the uniform rule proposition. You could not expect to pass it, could you? You would not have any show of passing it. You could not muster the sixty votes that are necessary to pass it. So why should the thirty-five men here who are in favor of classification be able to submit that proposition to the people when no other thirty-five members can submit any other proposition?

Now take this taxation matter with reference to what Judge Dwyer says. You take this Convention and take the people in the state of Ohio. At least they know as little about the question of taxation as they do upon any other subject. They are not posted. It is a deep, intricate question, and it takes a whole lot of study. I do not know much about it.

Mr. PECK: Agreed.

Mr. WOODS: And I do not think the people in the state of Ohio, if you submit to them the question of classification or uniform rule, are going to understand it. I do not believe you can vote intelligently on it. Some of you may, but the large majority can not. Now there are some things that I am willing to do and if the vote by which the measure was defeated is reconsidered and there is not to be submitted an alternative proposition I think I would vote for the reconsideration. I will stand for almost anything except that alternative proposition. If I understand that is going to be offered I am against any reconsideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It will be.

Mr. WOODS: Will that be included?

Mr. FESS: I will answer to this effect, that a few of the members who would like to have the Convention do something definitely thought there were some points that could be agreed upon and that the question of classification could be entirely eliminated. I think the question of limitation will be entirely eliminated, but I could not promise anything here because when it comes back here it is open for anybody to offer any amendment of any sort and it would be unfair for me to say it is going to be thus or so, because the Convention will decide what is to be done. So far as I know the matter you are concerned in will not be offered at the outset. Later on it may be put in the amendment.

Taxation.

Mr. WOODS: Is not there the understanding if this vote is reconsidered the vote on the Fackler amendment will be reconsidered and the vote on the Doty amendment be reconsidered and clear on back to the votes of the previous question?

Mr. FESS: I understand the whole matter is to be opened up in this Convention?

Mr. WOODS: Then there is an understanding that it is to go back to and include the previous question?

Mr. FESS: Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will Doctor Fess name the advocates of classification by whose authority he makes that statement?

Mr. FESS: The authority is mine. The source of information is that the people who voted ninety-three votes, I think this morning, adopted the Fackler amendment. It is something like what was introduced by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] that is to be introduced with a little modification.

Mr. DOTY: As far as the agreement is concerned we haven't yet had any tangible evidence of any kind of an agreement. Doctor Fess states that he hopes there will be an agreement and gives himself as authority. He could not give any better authority so far as authority goes, and after all, with all due deference to the member from Greene [Mr. FESS], it does not reach very far. This morning I had as clear an agreement as you could have with those in opposition to me on this taxation question that the amendment I had proposed should be adopted with all of the so-called classification ideas and the uniform rulers should put up anything that their members desired. Now there was nothing official about that agreement, and I am holding nobody particularly responsible for the breaking of that agreement, but I had a right to have that kind of an understanding; and what happened? After the amendment I proposed was adopted we turned around and by a vote of ninety-three, which must necessarily take in both sides, a large number of whom were not in favor of the Fackler amendment on account of the uniform rule, voted for that Fackler amendment, carrying out our understanding. Then what happened? The whole thing was voted down. The uniform rulers in this Convention voted it down. So much for the agreement. If we are going to vote for this reconsideration upon the understanding that there is any agreement, let us have the agreement first, and if we are going to have a gentleman's agreement, let it be carried out, but let us not try to carry it out until we know what it is. There seems to be a tremendous amount of mystery about this so-called compromise.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understood you to say there was an agreement among the classification delegates and the uniform rule delegates by which the uniform rulers were to put up their proposition in any form they pleased, with the understanding that an alternative proposition was to be submitted with that. Is that the reason a lot of men who last night were against putting in the one per cent limitation in the constitution as a limitation, now vote as they do?

Mr. DOTY: I am not one of those and can not answer. I am not saying there is an agreement such as now hinted of here. I did not say to the member from Defiance that the amendment I offered was to be voted in. I said to the member from Defiance that the Fackler amendment was to be voted in and I said to the member from Defiance, "Does the Fackler amendment include what you want?" and he said it did. I am not holding him responsible now. We are not having any trouble, and so far as I know there is no agreement. I know that I have none and I never heard of one until the member from Greene [Mr. FESS] mentioned it. I presume in some casual conversation there may have been some hint, but it made no impression upon my mind, because, as I understood the member then, he hadn't made up his mind whether to move a reconsideration or not.

Mr. ELSON: Would you be willing to make any private arrangement —

Mr. DOTY: No private arrangement. If there is any arrangement it has got to be open and public.

Mr. ELSON: Just secretly between you and me, to leave in the old constitution the provision for nonclassification and leave out all further thought of classification on one side and of maximum limitations on the other side, and put in the provision authorizing the tax on franchises, production, incomes, and inheritances?

Mr. DOTY: When I get into such a frame of mind that I think I know more about taxation than all the other people of the state, then I may be willing to put it up to the people and say, "Take this or nothing." I do not believe in that on so controverted a question as this. Now the subject of taxation has been somewhat exhaustively argued and considered. There has been no disposition so far on either side to prevent discussion. We have threshed this over and you could take the vote upon the various phases of this question and prove that this Convention is in favor of anything you want, and you can take the same votes and prove it is against anything you want. Does not that indicate to you that this Convention, so far as this body of men are concerned, are thoroughly divided on the question of what we ought to do on the subject of taxation, and that it might be a pretty good thing to leave the matter to the people and let them have a fair square vote, and then if there is any mistake let them make it? Now if we are going to have an agreement, I for one, before I vote upon the question for reconsideration, claim that I have a right to know what the agreement is and what the proposed compromise is. There seems to be an effort to compromise on principles, from start to finish, and I for one am tired. If we are going to vote up or down some compromise let us know something about the compromise before we start to voting.

Mr. DWYER: Suppose we fix five o'clock to vote on the reconsideration, and in the meantime let the gentlemen get together and try to get something in shape.

Mr. DOTY: I made one motion to postpone. I have no objection to the motion of postponement, and I yield the floor to the gentleman to make the motion if he so desires.

Mr. DWYER: I move that we postpone the consideration of this until five o'clock, and in the meantime let the gentlemen get together and see if they can not frame something that we can agree on. I think it would be a shame to adjourn this Convention without something on the tax question. We came very close to agreeing this morning, but some confusion occurred. I believe we can agree now and I move that we take a reconsideration at five o'clock and give these gentlemen a chance to do something.

Taxation.

Mr. FESS: There has been so much said about agreement that it embarrasses me just a little bit and I do not want to be misunderstood. I have taken absolutely no part in the discussion of this question, simply because it is so complicated. While I have been a student of it, I see such a variety of opinion that I am in the situation Mr. Doty referred to. You can find objections to almost every proposition offered and yet you will find support for it. I have avoided participating in this discussion from that standpoint, but there are things we can agree upon and I think it would be absolutely fatal for us to adjourn this Convention without doing anything upon the biggest question that has come before us. I wrote to the president of this Convention and said to him before we came into session that I thought the taxation question was the biggest thing to come before the Convention. I still believe it, but we are so hopelessly divided and so near the point of adjournment that we are just in the attitude of being ready to adjourn without doing anything, and I am getting somewhat anxious about it. It is really serious. We can agree upon the income tax and upon the inheritance tax and upon one or two other things, and I simply made this motion for reconsideration without consultation with a single person as to what would be the final compromise, but thinking we could certainly agree upon a few things. There was no other agreement. I am willing, if you wish to have more time, to support a motion to postpone this matter until five o'clock, if it is understood that we are to act upon it at that time.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: Some of the members of this Convention are not old enough to remember the very serious time we had after the Civil War with the national debts. Nobody thought we could pay off $2,600,000,000. There were all kinds of people and all kinds of views. Some were for scaling, some were for paying it in greenbacks, others were readjusters and some were repudiators. Finally the opinion of a very famous man in the state of Ohio was asked. It was J. N. Free, sometimes called "the Immortal J. N." He said, "Let the Indians assume the debt." This is the way with taxation. One side believes in one thing and the other side believes in the other, but the trouble is there are no Indians to turn to. They are civilized and they are not assuming our taxes right now. I think right here there should be a conference and we should agree on something and return that agreement to the Convention.

Mr. ANDERSON: Gentleman of the Convention: I do not believe we can have any so-called agreement on this much mooted question. If you take Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, and Mr. Doty, of Cuyahoga, Judge Winn, of Defiance, and Mr. Jones, of Fayette, and send them out what chance of an agreement would there be? The only way we could arrive at anything is to fight it out in the Convention right here and now.

Mr. DWYER: My idea is to formulate what we did this morning in presentable shape. We had the Anderson amendment and the Doty amendment and the Fackler amendment, and we could put them in shape so we could understand them, and we can submit that and see if we can not agree to it.

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not think you would want the task of choosing the committee to draft something to suit both sides. It would be impossible. We can agree on a taxation measure that will be a great improvement over anything we have now. I do not believe that classification as such should be submitted to the voters, but let us have a fair, square and honest vote upon the things that a large number of us here favor, to wit, the Fackler amendment, before the Doty amendment was passed.

Mr. LAMPSON: I simply want to call attention to this situation: This taxation proposition, with the Doty amendment, will divide the state of Ohio into the most bitter factions that have been in existence for many years.

Now what is the proposition? To go to the people with that sort of a question in the months of June, July and August, when all the farmers from one end of the state to another are busy in their fields and when the weather is hot. It is no time for public meetings, when the people in the country have no time to attend. To undertake to fight out this kind of a proposition during those months, in my mind, is very unwise in view of the differences which have developed here. I think we had better just drop the whole subject.

Mr. FACKLER: Now, gentlemen of the Convention, let us not do a foolish thing by dropping this taxation proposition because the Convention is unalterably divided on classification and uniform rule. I hope you will vote to reconsider the vote of this morning, and if we can not do anything else on the subject of taxation, let us adopt sections 7, 8, 9 and 10, which provide for the income tax, the inheritance tax, the franchise tax, the excise tax, the production tax and the provision whereby the municipalities shall make arrangements for the liquidation of their debts. We can do that much.

Mr. DOTY: Is the member now attempting to get an agreement to do that and nothing else?

Mr. FACKLER: No, sir; I am not attempting to get an agreement, but I am simply appealing to the sober, good sense of the Convention not to throw down an opportunity to make progressive legislation on the taxation question because we are divided on the features of it. Let us do something that will be regarded by everybody as a step forward in the matter, and let us not throw away an opportunity because of rancor that may have been injected in this debate because of the uniform rule and classification.

Mr. HOSKINS: You included section 9?

Mr. FACKLER: Sections 7, 8, 9 and 10.

Mr. HOSKINS: Section 9 is the limitation.

Mr. FACKLER: No, sir; it is the excise tax, the production tax on coal, gas, oil and minerals. Let us do something in favor of progressive taxation.

Mr. HOSKINS: What about the limitation?

Mr. FACKLER: Let us leave that where it is. Let us get these things we are in favor of adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not believe a large number of delegates are in favor of putting bonds on the duplicate?

Mr. FACKLER: They have so voted, but let us get these things that I firmly believe a majority of the people of the state are in favor of. Let us at least do that. I appeal to you not to throw away this opportunity.

Taxation.

Mr. FESS: If we consider —

Mr. FACKLER: I have an amendment prepared to accomplish what I have been suggesting.

Mr. FESS: Would there be any legal or parliamentary objection for any member to introduce an amendment on the bond proposition?

Mr. FACKLER: Let the Convention be a rule unto itself. This is a question of reconsidering and not a question of what we are going to do.

Mr. JONES: Gentlemen of the Convention: I do not suppose there is a man in this Convention who does not understand thoroughly what the reason and cause of the defeat of all these propositions with reference to the reform of our tax laws was. It is perfectly apparent to everyone that that measure which came to a vote just before we took our recess was defeated solely by reason of the division of this Convention with reference to the submission of this alternative proposition, which in fact is not an alternative proposition. But I do not want to discuss that matter. That is the rock upon which this Convention splits, and it is the only one upon which it splits. The vote taken heretofore indicated as clearly as it is possible to have anything indicated that a great majority of the Convention upon the question of classification, for instance, was opposed to it; that the majority of this Convention was in favor of the removal of the exemption from taxation of the bonds; that a majority of the Convention was in favor of taxing inheritances and providing for a graduated tax upon inheritances; that a majority was also in favor of the income tax and in favor of taxing coal, oil and other natural resources. It also developed that there was at least a small majority in favor of writing into the constitution some limitations. Now, if this one rock upon which this Convention split, this alternative proposition, were eliminated, and this question of tax rate could be eliminated, it does occur to me, as a sober, sensible man, that we ought to have no trouble, by at least a substantial majority in putting this thing in shape to submit it to the people. With the overwhelming judgment of the Convention in favor of certain features it occurs to me that, if this motion is reconsidered, we could offer something that will be acceptable to a majority of the Convention. Put in the proposition to remove the bonds from taxation and to have our inheritance provision and income provision and the other provisions upon which there has been no substantial division. I do hope that we shall not act on this motion to reconsider under the same unfortunate circumstances—to say the least of it—under which we voted just before recess, and that we shall reconsider this matter, and then, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY], that we will do at least what we all agree should be done along the line of progress in the reform of our tax laws.

Mr. WINN: Mr President and Gentlemen: Having sat here for several days—at least for three or four days—and urging with all the power I could a constitutional limitation on the amount of taxes that might be levied, I feel that I might say something along the line of compromise. It was on May 2 that Mr. Anderson offered an amendment, the purpose of which was to strike out all after the word "proposal" in Proposal No. 170, and insert the language employed in his proposed amendment that embodies the proposition that there shall be no poll tax levied, that laws shall be passed taxing by uniform rate all money, securities, etc., that outstanding bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation, but that bonds shall be taxed hereafter, that no debts shall be contracted except as provided in the constitution, and section 7 provides that laws may be enacted providing for taxes on the right to succeed to estates. Section 8 provides for taxes on income. Afterwards another amendment was offered by the gentleman from Cleveland [Mr. FACKLER] which you will find on page 6. That contains all that was embodied in the Anderson amendment. I speak of that for this purpose. We know Mr. Anderson is in favor of everything he embodied in his amendment, otherwise he would not have offered it. Also the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] was in favor of everything in his amendment. The amendment by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] was practically the same as the one offered by the member from Mahoning, except that it goes a little farther. It embraces a proposition for a tax on inheritances, also a tax on incomes of a certain amount, and then in section 9 it provides, and this is a very important provision, "Laws may be passed providing for excise and franchise taxes and the imposition of taxes upon the production of coal, oil, gas and minerals." Section 10 provides that no bonded indebtedness of the state or any political subdivision of the state shall be incurred or renewed unless under the legislation in which the indebtedness is incurred or renewed provision is made for the payment of not less than 2 per cent annually until the indebtedness is paid. Now I think we were all agreed upon that—practically all agreed. I think all of those who were wedded to the classification notion were opposed to it, but all of the others were agreed that that was a splendid proposition. But there were some others of us who believed that a limitation should be incorporated in it, and that is the reason I offered my amendment. I believe now that it would be an ideal provision in the constitution if we could have that limitation incorporated. But we cannot do it. I feel that we would be derelict if we were to go home without doing something on these lines. It seems to me it would be so easy for us to simply put it upon its passage without any limitation at all. For me to vote upon a proposition of that sort will be as distasteful as it can be to any other member of the Convention, but when I know the limitation is impossible, I stand for the best I can get, and I believe we may all agree and agree at once on the Fackler amendment practically as it was offered.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on postponing the further consideration of this matter.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is, Shall the motion by which Proposal No. 170 failed of passage be reconsidered?

Mr. LAMPSON: I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. WINN: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 45, nays 60, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Brown, Pike,	Cody,
Bowdle,	Campbell,	Collett,
Brattain,	Cassidy,	Colton,

So the motion to lay on the table was lost.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark [during roll call]: I cannot go home and say that I voted to dodge this question.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the adoption of the proposal.

Mr. FACKLER: Are amendments in order?

The PRESIDENT: The president will rule that amendments are in order.

Mr. FACKLER: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Proposal" and insert the following:

"To submit an amendment to article XII, by adding sections 7, 8, 9 and 10 relating to taxation.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 7. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value.

Such tax may also be levied at a different or higher rate upon collateral inheritances than direct inheritances and a portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to such incomes as may be designated by law, but a part of each income not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 9. Laws may be passed providing for excise and franchise taxes and for the imposition of taxes upon the production of coal, oil, gas and minerals.

SECTION 10. No bonded indebtedness of the state or any political subdivisions thereof, shall be incurred or renewed, unless in the legislation, under which such indebtedness is incurred or renewed, provision is made for the payment of not less than two per centum of the principal together with the annual interest on the same, each year, until such indebtedness is paid.

Mr. FACKLER: This amendment as proposed will leave the constitution just as it is in the first six sections of article XII, but it adds sections 7, 8, 9, and 10, providing for the inheritance taxes, income taxes, production taxes on coal, oil, gas and minerals, and a provision relative to the liquidation of bonded indebtedness.

There are some here who are in favor of tacking on a provision that will make municipal bonds hereafter subject to taxation. Let those offer an amendment to this amendment, and let it be adopted if they have sufficient votes, although I am frank to say I shall vote against it. I hope this amendment will not be voted down, and thus precipitate the whole fight on uniform rule and classification and limitation of bonds, etc. Let us adopt this at any rate, if we cannot do anything else.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like to know something about that section 10.

Mr. FACKLER: That is simply to prevent the piling up of bonded indebtedness without making any provision for the payment of it. I believe it is unjust to the people that come after us for us to issue bonds and take the benefit of them and then say that the burden shall be put on the coming generation.

Mr. ANDERSON: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the amendment of Mr. Fackler and substitute therefor the following:

To submit an amendment to article XII, sections 1, 2 and 6, of the constitution, and to add thereto sections to be known as sections 7, 8, 9 and 10.—Relative to taxation.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 1. The levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive; therefore no poll tax shall ever be levied in this state, nor service required therein, which may be commuted in money or other thing of value.

SECTION 2. Laws shall be passed, taxing by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, or otherwise; and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money excepting all bonds at present outstanding of the state of Ohio or of any city, village, hamlet, county, or township in this state or which have been issued in behalf of the public schools in Ohio and the means of instruction in connection therewith, which bonds so at present outstanding shall be exempt from taxation; but burying grounds, public school houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property, to an amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars for each individual, may by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published as may be directed by law.

Taxation.

SECTION 6. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution the state shall never contract any debt for purposes of internal improvements.

SECTION 7. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value.

Such tax may also be levied at a different or higher rate upon collateral inheritances than direct inheritances and a portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to such incomes as may be designated by law, but a part of each income not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 9. Laws may be passed providing for excise and franchise taxes and for the imposition of taxes upon the production of coal, oil, gas and minerals.

SECTION 10. No bonded indebtedness of the state or any political subdivisions thereof, shall be incurred or renewed, unless in the legislation, under which such indebtedness is incurred or renewed, provision is made for the payment of not less than two per centum of the principal together with the annual interest on the same, each year, until such indebtedness is paid.

Mr. LAMPSON: A lot of the members have voted to reconsider this matter on the theory that all that was to be attempted was the Fackler amendment, and I now move to lay the Anderson amendment on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have the floor. You can't make that motion. You will find this proposed amendment on page 9 of your journal. It is the Fackler amendment in its purity and completeness. It is the amendment that Mr. Fackler was in favor of, and the only difference between the Fackler amendment, as I carry it in my mind, and this other, is that bonds are taxed or put back upon the tax duplicate. Something has been said to the effect that it was not the agreement that we should introduce the question of bonds before the Convention. Where was any agreement made and by whom? Let us analyze that just a moment.

Mr. PIERCE: You probably unintentionally mislead. You say the bonds are put back. You mean bonds issued from this time on.

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; bonds issued after the constitution is adopted by us and ratified by the people. All bonds issued after that will have to pay taxes, if this amendment carries, but none other, and I find that the men who are opposed all the time to taxing bonds are the men now claiming and insisting that it was an agreement that we should not inject the question of bonds into the Convention now.

Mr. FACKLER: Who raised that question?

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. Lampson.

Mr. FACKLER: Is he one of the class you describe?

Mr. ANDERSON: I would think so.

Mr. LAMPSON: I would like to have it understood just what my position is. Mr. Fackler came around here with the prepared amendment. At first I did not know what it included. I was opposed to reconsideration, but I found out what it included, that it was supposed to include the subjects not seriously controverted, and I said if that were all of it, all right, that I would be willing to have it adopted, if there were to be no controversies on it.

Mr. ANDERSON: And after that you moved to table it?

Mr. LAMPSON: No; I did not move to table the Fackler amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON: Well, you tried to avoid reconsideration?

Mr. LAMPSON: That was before the agreement. That was before I found out what the Fackler amendment included, and when I did find out I said I would support it.

Mr. ANDERSON: We find that the men who are opposed to placing bonds back upon the tax duplicate are men who do not want any changes made in the present constitution. In other words, they are willing to forego the benefit that will come to the community by reason of the inheritance tax, the income tax, the production tax and the franchise tax to escape putting bonds back on the duplicate. That is the situation exactly. They are willing to leave the constitution just as it is, and are willing to adjourn without our work being completed, and go before the people and acknowledge that we could not do anything upon the question of taxation, just simply to escape putting bonds back on the tax duplicate.

Mr. PECK: All of those powers exist under the constitution now, and the legislature has had this power since 1851.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; since 1905.

Mr. PECK: I do not know anything about that. I am talking of the constitution of 1851. You have simply gone insane on that subject. You simply go back to that one subject always.

Mr. ANDERSON: I go back to it because that is the one thing I am trying to do away with.

Mr. PECK: We may ask you about anything else, but you slip back to that.

Mr. ANDERSON: You object to placing bonds on the tax duplicate, and you are with the rest opposing it. I insist that you are wrong there and that we should retain the Smith one per cent law if you are in favor of bringing property out of hiding, as you say you are, and in favor of taking taxation off of land and placing it somewhere else. Let us have the income, inheritance, production and franchise taxes, and the tax upon bonds, but let us adhere to that law.

Taxation.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that that amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. WINN: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 48, nays 58, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim	Hahn,	Nye,

So the motion was lost.

Mr. RILEY: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

"To amend the Anderson substitute to Proposal No. 170 as follows: After the words "for each individual" in section 2, insert the words "and also an amount equal to the bona fide indebtedness of such individual,".

Mr. RILEY: A number of delegates on this floor have expressed a great deal of sympathy with the poor man and regret at the high rate of taxation. A proposition was offered sometime ago seeking to prevent double taxation. From time almost immemorial the rule has been that in listing property debts could be deducted from credits. There was a time—the delegate from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] referred to it—when they, in 1846, passed a law that provided that debts might be deducted from moneys or credits. Just how long that law existed I am not advised, but for a long time it has been a rule that debts could be deducted from credits. Why not deduct this from other property than credits? If a man happens to have notes or mortgages outstanding why should he pay taxes on property that in effect he does not own? I think this is a fair proposition and should meet with general approval. There should not be any double taxation.

Mr. TAGGART: What section does that amendment connect with?

Mr. RILEY: Section 2. It is on page 9, line 12, down after the word "individual". It will then read, "An amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars for each individual, and an amount equal to the bona fide debts of such individual, whether notes, mortgages or bonds."

Mr. CRITES: I offer an amendment.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken. We have already three amendments pending.

Mr. COLTON: The amendment that has been suggested by Mr. Fackler embodies the essential features of the report of the minority of the Taxation committee. I believe they meet the approval of nearly all the members of this Convention. They certainly are worthy the consideration of the Convention. We ought to have an income tax, and we ought to have it fixed so that the legislature can impose it. We ought to have an inheritance tax, and a production tax, and a franchise tax, and we ought also to have the provision about the bonds, and we should have a separation of state and local taxation, but that may come later. I believe too we ought to have bonds on the tax list. I go further than the amendment of Mr. Fackler. I can see no reason for exempting bonds from taxation that will not apply to the note of an individual, and let us have it clearly in mind that the bond of a municipality is nothing more than another name for a note. It is a note of a village or city, and why should we say that the one particular kind of intangible property shall be exempt from taxation, while on every other kind of the same intangible property we put a tax? I say that is class legislation of the worst possible sort, and there is no excuse for it. I admit that it is of advantage to the municipality to have its bonds free from taxation, but you will admit equally freely that it will be an advantage to the individual to have his notes exempt from taxation. Now, if all the municipalities were issuing bonds of the same relative proportion, and all individuals in this state owned bonds in the same relative proportion, there would be no injustice. It would be a giving on one thing and a taking on the other, but it is a well-known fact that the great borrowers in this state, and the great issuers of bonds are the large cities, and there are hundreds and hundreds of townships in this state that have no bonds whatever and are not in debt. These people have to bear the burden of the cities issuing the bonds. The bonds are bought more or less by our own people, and the people holding the bonds are exempt from paying their share of the state and local taxation. They do contribute something in the cities by submitting or accepting a lower rate of interest, but they are exempt from local taxation, and they are exempt from bearing their share of the burden of local government. It is unjust, and I shall cast my vote and give my influence toward restoring bonds issued hereafter to the tax duplicate, and I move the previous question.

Mr. FESS: On what?

Mr. COLTON: On the whole thing.

Mr. FESS: Before the previous question is put I move to table the last amendment.

Taxation.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the amendment lie on the table?

The motion to table was carried.

The PRESIDENT: Now the question is, Shall debate close?

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded, taken, and resulted — yeas 76, nays 28, as follows:

The motion was carried and the main question ordered.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the amendment of the delegate from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. DOTY: An inquiry, so that we can understand exactly what we are voting for. If a member votes aye on the pending question it strikes out all of the Worthington proposal and substitutes this in place of it?

The SECRETARY: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: And if we vote the Anderson amendment down the proposal is in exactly the same shape as when we voted at noon?

The SECRETARY: No; there is the Fackler amendment and the Anderson amendment.

Mr. DOTY: Then all we are voting on is the Anderson amendment to the Fackler amendment?

Mr. WINN: Yes.

The question being "Shall the amendment of Mr. Anderson be agreed to?"

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded, taken, and resulted — yeas 67, nays 41, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now upon the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] as amended.

Mr. DOTY: An inquiry, before we vote so that we may understand what we are voting upon. Do I understand if we vote aye upon the pending question we now substitute for the whole proposal the Anderson-Fackler amendment, and if the Fackler amendment is voted down, then the proposal is exactly the same as when we voted this noon, which is the Winn amendment, and the amendment I proposed as an alternative proposition?

The SECRETARY: Yes.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is, "Shall the proposal as amended pass?"

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 170 — Mr. Worthington. To submit an amendment to article XII, sections 1, 2 and 6, of the constitution, and to add thereto sections to be known as sections 7, 8, 9 and 10. — Relative to taxation.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 1. The levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive; therefore no poll tax shall ever be levied in this state, nor service required therein, which may be commuted in money or other thing of value.

SECTION 2. Laws shall be passed, taxing by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies, or otherwise; and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money excepting all bonds at present outstanding of the state of Ohio or of any city, village, hamlet, county, or township in this state or which have been issued in behalf of the public schools in Ohio and the means of instruction in connection therewith, which bonds so at present outstanding shall be exempt from taxation; but burying grounds, public school houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property, to an amount not exceeding in value two hundred dollars for each individual, may by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property, so exempted, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published as may be directed by law.

SECTION 6. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution the state shall never contract any debt for purposes of internal improvement.

SECTION 7. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value.

Such tax may also be levied at a different or higher rate upon collateral inheritances than direct inheritances and a portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to such incomes as may be designated by law, but a part of each income not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 9. Laws may be passed providing for excise and franchise taxes and for the imposition of taxes upon the production of coal, oil, gas and minerals.

SECTION 10. No bonded indebtedness of the state or any political subdivisions thereof, shall be incurred or renewed, unless in the legislation, under which such indebtedness is incurred or renewed, provision is made for the payment of not less than two per centum of the principal together with the annual interest on the same, each year, until such indebtedness is paid.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move to reconsider the vote by which the proposal was adopted, and I move to lay that motion upon the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I rise to ask for leave of absence for Judge Kerr, and also to demand that Proposal No. 308 be taken from the Taxation committee for immediate action by this Convention, and I demand the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. DOTY: It does not take the yeas and nays. The proposal is before the Convention and I move that the proposal be laid on the table.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I demand the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think we should have the proposal read.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will read Proposal No. 308.

The proposal was read.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the proposal be laid on the table?

So the motion to table was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I now demand the regular order.

Mr. ANDERSON: I move that 2,000 copies of the Worthington proposal, No. 170, be printed.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next business in order is Proposal No. 134.

Mr. FACKLER: I move that the Convention recess until seven o'clock p. m.

The motion to recess was lost.

The president recognized the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. HALENKAMP].

Mr. HALENKAMP: Gentlemen: Since Thursday afternoon, April 25, when this proposal was voted upon, there have been several changes suggested, and while I am reluctant personally to depart from the original draft, I nevertheless have agreed to the amendments which have been suggested, and which I will submit before I take my seat. Some of the pages have copies and are passing them around. The amendment simply guarantees a jury trial for contempt committed elsewhere than before the court.

The end sought by this proposed amendment to the constitution is to guarantee a jury trial in cases of contempt committed elsewhere than in the presence of the court and to restore the writ of injunction to its proper function.

The Hon. Henry Clay Caldwell, presiding judge of the United States court of appeals for the eighth district, has said:

Reduced to its last analysis the intelligent and impartial administration of justice is all there is to free government. It is to the courts that all must look for the protection of their liberty, person, property and reputation. It is public justice that holds the community together.

So, therefore, when the courts fail to protect the liberty, person, property and reputation of an individual or a class of individuals, it is no more than natural that they should protest and avail themselves of every opportunity to secure redress. Men in the usual walks of life outside of the ranks of labor can little realize the depth of the feeling and resentment felt by the working people of our state and nation in regard to the interpretation given to laws which discriminate against the working people as such. The working class are suffering from gross injustice by the judicial interpretation of the laws and the assumption of the jurisdiction in the issuance of injunctions and conduct of contempt proceedings. Hence, we come to this Convention, pleading that, in so far as this state is concerned, we be given equality before the law; the right to exercise our natural, normal constitutional activities, the activities and rights accorded to the people of nearly every civilized country on the face of the globe, but which are denied to us through the use of the writ of injunction.

Right of association, the right to demand a normal work day, the right to demand sanitary surroundings, the safeguarding of machinery, the proper safeguarding of mines, factories and workshops, a decent living wage, and associate efforts to accomplish these things may be denied and have been by injunctions which carry with them the threat of contempt proceedings and imprisonment without a trial by jury.

We do not contend that judges are corrupt in our criticism of the courts; we are reluctant to believe that their motives in the issuance of injunctions are otherwise than honest motives. We realize that the conception of the courts as a rule is that there is on the part of the employer some sort of property or property right in either the workingman himself or in the workingman's power to produce. But since the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the federal constitution it cannot be said that one man has a property right in another man, and when a court assumes to issue an injunction saying to me that I must not induce you to leave the employment of another man, it assumes, if it does not go beyond the rights to exercise its power where property rights alone are involved, that the other man has a property right in me, and only upon that basis can an injunction of that character be issued and contempt proceedings grow out of it.

As a matter of fact, in the perversion of the injunction, its genesis, and running through it, all the years, there is but one purpose, and that is that the industrial tories of America aim to chain and bind the American men and women of labor to their tasks and deny them the right of ownership in themselves and in their labor power. This is sought to be done through one process or another by the injunction, always over the head of the workers, threatening to decapitate them, and by denying to them fundamental rights which are essential to their well-being and protection. The policy of those industrial tories is to starve men into submission, and when the men undertake by united effort to secure relief from the tyranny and obnoxious conditions imposed, the injunction is invoked, thus placing the men and women in jeopardy of their liberty should they continue to exercise their right of refusing to hold themselves in unwilling bondage.

For a long time the black list was used as a means of defeating labor's right to organize, and the spirit which adopted the black list is now using the power of injunction to accomplish the same end, the defeat of united action by the laborers. C. C. Allen, in his article on injunctions and organized labor, has this to say:

Injunction writs have covered the sides of cars; deputy marshals and the militia have patrolled the yards of railway terminals, and chancery process has been executed by bullets and bayonets. Equity jurisdiction has passed from the theory of public rights to the domain of political prerogative. In 1888 the basis of jurisdiction was the protection of the private right of civil property; in 1893 it was the preservation of public rights; in 1894 it became the enforcement of political powers.

I submit it is hard to deny the proposition as to the original purpose of the beneficent writ of injunction, that purpose being to protect property rights for which there was no other adequate remedy at law; that where there is an adequate remedy at law it was never intended that the injunction process should lie; that it was never to apply, and never should apply to personal relations or even to enforce the provisions of criminal law; that anyone who is guilty of a violation of law of our state or nation may be apprehended and charged with the crime, the violator of the law placed upon his defense and if found guilty punished according to law.

The modern writ of injunction bears no more resemblance to the ancient writ of that name than the day does to night. In recent years it has been arbitrarily used and grossly abused. The restrictions formerly regarded as established have been abandoned, and our courts of equity have traveled over the whole field of human action and subjected the liberty of the citizens to restraint whenever it has seemed to the individual judge that restraint should be imposed.

It has taken the place of the police powers of the state and nation. With it the court not only restrains and punishes the commission of crimes defined by statute, but proceeds to frame a criminal code of its own as extended as it sees proper, by which various acts innocent in law and morals are made criminal, such as standing, walking or marching on the public highways, or talking, speaking or preaching, and other like acts. Men are deprived of their liberty, who do not do anything illegal, or anything for which by trial under the law they could be punished in the least. The court issues an injunction against the workers, forbidding their doing almost everything that is necessary to gain their legitimate object, and unless they obey they are sentenced to a fine or imprisonment at the discretion of the court. For what? Not for having violated any law, but for contempt. Thus the court converts a perfectly lawful act into a crime in order that it may inflict a penalty. This is what we have called "government by injunction."

It is sometimes urged in defense of government by injunction that it ought to prevail where the ordinary government has shown itself inefficient, but clearly, if our courts are to take the place of our governors, mayors, and sheriffs, why not say so outright in the constitution? If these officials are inefficient, there are ways of removing them or forcing them to do their duty. But this new injunction remedy puts the judge into the civil officer's shoes and supersedes him. The judge becomes legislator and executor of the law, and he is himself the sole judge of the validity of his actions. He makes lawful acts unlawful, tries the alleged breaker of his new-made law without jury and then fixes the punishment.

It is obvious that an injunction must enjoin acts which are either lawful or unlawful. If they are unlawful, they are already forbidden by law, and the penal code is a standing injunction against them. Why then issue another injunction? If, on the other hand, the acts are lawful why should they be forbidden? It is a dangerous legislative power to put in the hands of the single judge. Let me read to you from the pen of the late Justice Harlan:

The illustrious men who laid the foundations of our institutions deemed no part of the national constitution of more consequence or more essential to the permanency of our form of government than the provision under which were distributed the powers of government, three separate, equal and co-ordinate departments: legislative, executive and judicial. This was at the time a new feature of governmental regulation among the nations of the earth * * * No department of the government can constitutionally exercise the powers committed strictly to another and separate department.

If Justice Harlan is right, and I believe he is, what right have our courts to invade the legislative field and armed with this powerful writ which has no definite boundaries or limitations, and which may be used at discretion, assume power which may be fairly characterized as imperial?

I think it was Goethe who said that the greatest element of terror is the unknown. One of the reasons why these injunctions have been so great an injury to the wageworkers, is because the injunction is a law unto itself, and it is seldom the case that the court issuing the injunction knows at the time it is issued what interpretation he will place upon it in the event contempt proceedings follow it. The workers can not determine from the injunction itself what are their rights, hence the terror that follows.

The extent of this powerful writ finds its only limitation in that unknown quantity called judicial discretion, touching which Lord Camden, one of England's greatest constitutional lawyers, said:

The discretion of the judge is the law of tyrants; it is always unknown; it is different in different men; it is casual and depends upon constitution, temper, and passion to which human nature is liable.

Mr. Burke pointed out the danger of investing any sort of men with jurisdiction limited only by their discretion. He said:

The spirit of any sort of men is not a fit rule for deciding on the bounds of their jurisdiction; first because it is different in different men and even different in the same men at different times, and can never become the proper directing line of law; and next because it is not reason but feeling, and when once it is irritated it is not apt to confine itself within its proper limits.

It is, I submit, a jurisdiction that is not required to stop anywhere and will stop nowhere. I submit that the government of this state and nation is a government of law by law. The issuance of injunction interferes and invades the sphere of personal relations and personal rights; it is going back to personal government, government by discretion, government by whim, government by fancy, government by favoritism.

Some say and think (and among them not a few judges) that an injunction interferes in some subtle way before the act anticipated is performed. This is nonsense. An injunction does nothing before the act but to forbid it, just as a law forbids a crime. It does not and can not touch the prospective offender until he has offended. It has no miraculous antecedent power of prevention.

Injunctions of this character have violated fundamental rights. I shall assume for the sake of argument, that in every instance the workmen were engaged in acts of violation of the criminal law. What is the necessity for an injunction? I submit again that it is unnecessary and unjustifiable. If the acts are not criminal, then the theory upon which the injunctions are issued is incorrect and admittedly without justification. If the acts were criminal, the criminal law provides the punishment to be imposed and the procedure to be followed. The fact of the matter is that the only reason for issuing injunctions of this character is to dispense with the trial by jury.

When the framers of the Declaration of Independence met to draft a formal statement of the grievances of the colonists against the rule of England, one of the chief counts of the indictment was "for depriving them in many cases of the benefit of a trial by jury". Looking over our federal constitution we find that they did not stop with protesting, but meant to put the principle into practice. The fullness and completeness of the constitution in this respect is amazing. No more resolute purpose to accomplish a particular end ever found expression on paper:

The trial of all crimes, except in case of impeachment, shall be by jury.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service or in time of war or public danger.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury.

In suits of common law where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved.

But notwithstanding, these inherent rights and constitutional guaranties have been swept aside by what may be fairly termed an equitable invention which turns crime into contempt and confers on the courts the power to frame an extended criminal code of their own, making innocent acts punishable by fine or imprisonment without limit, at their discretion. Consider the protection with which the law, as a result of centuries of struggle and experience, safeguards the liberty of the lowliest citizen. If he is charged with crime, there must be a hearing before a grand jury that must be satisfied a crime has been committed and that reasonable grounds for believing the accused guilty exist. Upon indictment by the grand jury he is tried by a petit jury, and even their verdict, if improperly arrived at or contrary to law, may be set aside upon appeal. This protection applies even to one accused of murder.

But by the mere issuance of an injunction all these rights are cast aside. A court, upon the application of an individual or corporation, issues an order commanding the defendants (and for fear that he may miss some one they have added at times the word "whomsoever," thus embracing the whole world) to refrain from doing certain things which are specified in the order. Those violating this injunction are summarily arrested and brought before the same judge who issued the injunction. He inflicts punishment upon them. He himself and alone acts as the judge, jury and executioner. The grand jury, the petit jury, the right of appeal, are all dispensed with. Under such circumstances, what is more natural than the conclusion that the most brutish murderer is far better than the poor toiler whose only offense is that he violated the order of a single individual. Someone has said: "After all, the human skull is but the temple of human errors; and judicial clay, if you analyze it well, will be found to be like all other human clay." Our general assembly, the representative of the people, and the people themselves, through the initiative and referendum, may make law; the governor of our state is authorized to issue certain orders, to all of which there is attached a penalty as for a crime. But the people, the general assembly or the governor may not summarily sentence anyone for a violation of their orders or decrees. No, they must refer the offense to the regular judicial criminal branch.

We contend that there has been abuse of judicial discretion in cases of this kind. Contempt is a disobedience of something impalpable and indefinite, something we may not put our hands upon. In point of fact it is the violation of the commands of a human being, although clothed in the form of law; and it is very, very difficult for that human being to try a case of contempt without personal feeling entering into it, and the difficulty is not removed when the question is sent to one of his associates, who is very likely, in a greater or less degree, to share either the individual feeling of the judge whose orders have been violated, or the general feeling of the bench that whatever proceeds from the bench is itself sanctified. So the work of a jury in breaking the force of those feelings is one of the very greatest possible importance, and of the greatest possible public advantage. The utility of a jury trial is unquestionable. Its immense superiority to any other mode of trial in criminal cases is indispensable. A jury trial is impersonal. It gives expression to the sense of justice of the people, which is the nearest approach to absolute justice attainable in earthly tribunals.

I know there are some who maintain that courts have certain inherent rights, necessary to their dignity and enforcement of their decrees, and that a jury trial in contempt proceedings is the converse of these rights; it impairs the court's efficiency and abridges its dignity. Others argue that it is transferring authority to another tribunal. But we do not propose to take any power from them, nor does this amendment propose to do it. We have no designs upon the dignity of the courts.

There are two classes of contempt in the nature of things, and so recognized by all the courts. One is contempt committed in the face of the court, and the other is contempt committed outside of the scope of the senses of the judge. Our way of dealing with the matter would be to allow courts to deal summarily with what are termed direct contempts, which are committed in their presence. In so doing they would act, to all intents and purposes, as the conservators of the peace. When they come to indirect contempts, however, which are committed far away from the presence of the court, we think those ought to be proceeded with as in criminal cases, with the assistance of a jury, the judge to be the exclusive judge of the law and the jury to be the exclusive judge of the facts.

As a general proposition, let the question of indirect contempt be tried by a jury, thus eliminating forever and a day the question of bias, prejudice and personal feeling, for the juries of our state as a rule can be relied upon to carry out the principles of justice and fair dealing between man and man.

With these remarks, gentlemen, I hope I have made our position plain on these questions. I have not attempted and do not pretend to be original in all that I have said, for the literature contributed to this subject is already overwhelming; the points I have raised have been covered by men in almost every walk of life. From the pulpit, the lecture platform, the political stump, the editor's desk, in our legislative halls and bar associations these principles and doctrines have been defended and enunciated time and time again. We are not alone in our position, and before yielding the floor I must call your attention to the expressions of men of high renown in the legal profession, men who stand for justice and who apprehend the danger if personal, discretionary, and arbitrary government is permitted to take the place of government by law.

Hon. W. H. Moody, justice of the United States supreme court has said:

I believe in recent years the courts of the United States, as well as the courts of our commonwealth [Massachusetts], have gone to the very verge of danger in applying the process of the writ of injunction in disputes between labor and capital.

Hon. Thomas M. Cooley, president of the American bar association, said:

Courts, with their injunctions, if they heed the fundamental law of the land, can no more hold men to involuntary servitude for even a single hour than can overseers with the whip.

Governor Pingree, of Michigan, said:

I consider government by injunction, unless stopped, the beginning of the end of liberty. Tyranny on the bench is as objectionable as is tyranny on the throne. It is even more dangerous, because judges claim immunity from criticism, and foolish people acquiesce in their claims.

Judge H. F. Tuley, of the appellate court of Illinois, used these words:

Such use of injunction by the courts is judicial tyranny, which endangers not only the right of trial by jury, but all the rights and liberties of the citizen.

Governor Sadler, of Nevada, said:

The tendency at present is to have the courts to enforce law by injunction methods, which are subversive of good government and the liberties of the people.

Hon. J. H. Benton, Jr., of Massachusetts, said:

The courts have gone too far. It is impossible for them to go on in the course they have taken and retain the confidence of the people or preserve their own power. It is idle to say that the popular complaint on this subject means nothing, or that, as one judge has said, "Nobody objects to government by injunction except those who object to any government at all." It does mean much. It means that the courts have, in the judgment of many of the most intelligent and thoughtful citizens, exceeded their just powers; that they have, by the so-called exercise of the equity power, practically assumed to create and to punish offenses upon trial by themselves without a jury, and with penalties imposed at their discretion. The people will not and they ought not to submit to decisions like those in the Northern Pacific and Ann Arbor cases.

Professor F. J. Stimson, of Harvard, one of the greatest legal authorities, in his new work on "Federal and State Constitutions," after citing many authorities, says:

These are sufficient to establish the general principle that the injunction process and contempt in chancery procedure, as well as chancery jurisdiction itself, is looked on with a logical jealousy in Anglo-Saxon countries as being in derogation of the common law; taking away the jurisdiction of the common law courts and depriving the accused of his trial by jury:

Judge John Gibbons, of the circuit court of Illinois, declared that:

In their efforts to regulate or restrain strikes by injunction they [the courts] are sowing dragon's teeth and blazing the path of revolution.

In the last edition of his great book, High, the leading authority on injunction, says:

Equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the commission of crimes or to enforce moral obligations in the performance of moral duties; nor will it interfere for the prevention of an illegal act merely because it is illegal, and in the absence of an injury to property rights, it will not lend its aid by injunction to restrain the violation of public or penal statutes or the commission of immoral or illegal acts.

I submit in conclusion that injunctions of this character are never issued against any other citizens of our state and never issue against workmen except when they have had some rupture with their employers. Not alone in the name of labor, but in the name of justice and liberty, in the name of humanity and for the sake of the great principles upon which our state is founded, I earnestly hope that this proposal will become part of the organic law of this state.

I offer the following amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Laws may be passed, prescribing rules and regulations for the conduct of cases and business in the supreme court and other courts of the state, and for the regulation of proceedings in contempt and limiting the power to punish persons adjudged guilty of contempt.

No order of injunction shall issue in any industrial controversy involving the employment of labor, except to preserve physical property from injury or destruction, and all persons charged in contempt proceedings with the violation of an injunction issued in such industrial controversies involving the employment of labor shall, upon demand, be granted a trial by jury as in criminal cases.

Mr. PECK: I want to call attention to the fact at first that this proposal as amended involves two or three distinct propositions. There are reasons and necessity for these. The first five lines contain a separate provision from the one we have heard so ably discussed, and it reads:

Laws may be passed, prescribing rules and regulations for the conduct of cases and business in the supreme court and other courts of the state, and for the regulation of proceedings in contempt and limiting the power to punish persons adjudged guilty of contempt.

That may strike one as a little late, as the legislature has always been passing codes of civil and criminal procedure, and other rules and regulations governing the courts, but there are certain matters in which the supreme court has denied the general assembly the right to direct them, and have said that they are above the legislative department of the government and are exempt from operation of its laws. I am informed they have recently disregarded an act of the general assembly requiring them to report their decisions on the ground that they were not subject to regulations in that way, that it was within their discretion and could not be regulated by the general assembly; that as they were a court they had inherent power to regulate their own business. That seemed to be the theory on which they proceeded; and there is another case, a case in which Mr. Thatcher was restored to his position as a member of the bar by the vote of the general assembly; and I understand they have denied the right of the general assembly to pass such an act, and have refused to recognize his right to practice law, claiming that the question of admission in substance was their prerogative as a court. Again insisting that they were not subject to limitation by the general assembly, in the case of Hale, which is reported in 55 O. S., they clearly and emphatically asserted that they could not be limited by the general assembly in their power to punish for contempt, that that power was inherent in the court, to punish for contempt, and that the general assembly had no constitutional authority to interfere with them in those matters, and they sustained a very extreme punishment. The case is fully reported, and that is the ground upon which they placed it.

Now I myself do not believe that anybody or any institution or any official in the state of Ohio ought to be above the law. I do not believe that any set of men should have the right to say that everybody else in the state of Ohio must bow to the will of the general assembly, but we will not. We make laws for our own government in these matters. That matter of contempt is one that is particularly in need of regulation, and they drew the line. They admitted they were trying that case, proceeding in accordance with the regulations of the general assembly, but they said it was all right as long as the general assembly merely passed regulations, but the moment they put a limit on their power, the general assembly had no right. Now that is a power I want to confer on the general assembly under this proposal. When it comes on to its passage, I notified the chairman of the committee last week that I would demand a separation of the question embraced in the first five lines and the next part, relating to the matter of injunctions, which is a distinct and separate matter. I do not propose to have the first matter imperilled by the injunction matter.

Mr. HOSKINS: In the second clause it reads: "No order of injunction shall issue in any industrial controversy involving the employment of labor, except to preserve physical property," etc. Is the expression "industrial controversy" a definite, certain statement that would have certain boundaries?

Mr. PECK: It seems to me it is. I am not the author of this proposal as it stands. I had something to do with the first five lines, but not with this last part. You will find it is very difficult to frame that in words which will include what you want, but it seems to me, taking the two together, that it makes it definite.

Mr. HALFHILL: Admitting the force of your argument on the first five lines, could there be any reason in the world to say that the last part of it is not directly statutory and that abundant power exists now for the legislature to provide as to the latter portion?

Mr. PECK: I am not so sure of that.

Mr. HALFHILL: In other words, does not the constitution confer simply on the common pleas court such jurisdiction as provided by law—that is, the court that issues the injunction?

Mr. PECK: Yes; I think likely that the general assembly might pass something that would do a good deal of good in this line, but I am not sure the courts would not claim inherent jurisdiction in those cases and that they have a constitutional right to issue those injunctions.

At any rate, this is a matter of such great importance, and since we haven't heretofore stuck strictly to the line, we might do a little legislating here. We did something on the abolition of capital punishment, and that was purely statutory. But that was deemed of such importance that it should be passed upon in the constitution. So here are things in the bill of rights prohibiting cruel and inhuman punishment and exorbitant bail—those matters might be handled through statutory provisions, and yet they are in the bill of rights, and they are even in the constitution of the United States. It is important at times to protect fundamental rights by constitutional provision, though they might be protected by statutory provision also. It is unquestionably true that certain jurisdiction is created in the constitution for the supreme court and the circuit court, but does not the constitution itself provide that the common pleas court has no jurisdiction except as provided by law? It has jurisdiction, civil and criminal.

Contempt Proceedings and Injunctions.

Mr. HALFHILL: It is "as created by law," and is not that plainly statutory?

Mr. PECK: I am not sure it is not, but I think it is important enough to be passed upon by this body.

Mr. KING: If there is any doubt as to whether under the constitution as it now is the provision of this second paragraph might be adopted, would not that doubt be done away with if the provisions of the first part were written in the constitution, and would not the legislature have all the power?

Mr. PECK: I think the first clause would give the general assembly the power.

Mr. HALFHILL: I agree with that too.

Mr. PECK: I want to prevent those injunctions. I have not gotten through with this discussion on my part yet. I remember distinctly how these injunctions came to be used. It is a modern discovery entirely. The use of the writ of injunction to apply to a whole body of workmen in strikes was discovered by some bright lawyer in the early nineties and the scheme spread. I have never known much good to come of a writ of injunction. I have seen many issued and they invariably bring about strife, especially on the part of the men against whom they are directed. It calls out the militia and the police, and it does very little good, except sometimes it has intimidated the poor workmen. But it has really accomplished very little good and has done a great deal more harm by disturbing the peace of the community. Very often strikes have been presided over by the courts in their endeavors to enforce what they regard as the rights of the plaintiffs, which is shocking to one's sense of justice. There is no doubt that the workmen have just cause of complaint in many instances of the length to which the courts have gone in endeavoring to enforce alleged rights of employers.

Now the writ of injunction never was intended for any such purpose. That was an inheritance from the civil or ecclesiastical law of the middle ages. It is not a common law writ at all. It has crept into English jurisdiction from the continental courts, probably from the ecclesiastical courts, and it was always intended to apply to property rights, and it was never intended to apply to controversies, nor was it ever used in such controversies.

As I say, the application of it to controversies of this kind was never even discovered until the last ten or fifteen years and it has not been a beneficial or a useful discovery. It has not been one for the peace of a community. I think we had better go back to the old-time, common law practice in these matters and stop issuing injunctions, and that is the reason I am in favor of this and hope it will carry.

Mr. DWYER: Only a few years ago a United States judge in Minnesota issued an injunction restraining the men from quitting work.

Mr. PECK: Of course that would be simply allowing a judge to control everything to allow him to say that.

Now, Mr. Tetlow has a case that I would like to have him tell about, of abuse of a writ of injunction which seems to me to be dreadful, a case in West Virginia in which he was personally concerned, and it shows how far judges will go with this writ of injunction. You all remember those disgraceful proceedings where, by virtue of writs of injunction, men were in jail and behind high fences and kept in for months and not permitted to leave the premises. No such thing should be permitted in a free government. They are disgraceful and injurious. This is intended to stop it in the state of Ohio if we can.

Mr. MAUCK: Just a word about the propriety of embodying this provision in the constitution of the state. It is far from clear to me that the supreme court of this state would hold that the general assembly has the power suggested by the member from Allen. The provision of the Ohio constitution in regard to common pleas courts is substantially the same as that of the federal constitution in relation to the United States district and circuit courts.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you understand that I made the present constitution supplemented by the first five lines of this, say that the power exists?

Mr. MAUCK: But the first sentence of this proposal relates rather to the method of doing business than to the jurisdiction of the court itself. When the railroad rate bill was before the federal senate it was contended with great ability that the lower federal court having once received equity powers not conferred by the constitution, but conferred by statute, could not have that power limited by such statute because conferring equity powers carried with it certain inherent powers that must be exercised to carry into effect any of the equity powers so conferred. I have not followed that in the decisions of the federal court and do not know what has been held in that regard, but I do know that the supreme court of the state of Ohio has gone a great length in upholding what is claimed to have been and to be its inherent rights. For instance, the general assembly of Ohio has provided rules under which men may be admitted to the bar of the state. A few years ago the general assembly provided an educational qualification. It provided that any man might be eligible to an examination as provided by law if he held a teacher's certificate issued by the examiners of any county in the state. The supreme court, without any case pending before it, declared that statute unconstitutional because, it said, the general assembly had no power to infringe upon the inherent rights of the supreme court. If it would go that far to sustain what it claims to be the inherent powers of the court I think that we could not be satisfied that the ends sought to be accomplished by this proposal could be secured by any action of the general assembly. Therefore, those of us who believe that this ought to be part of the law of the state of Ohio feel that we must support it as a constitutional measure, otherwise we can have no assurance that it will ever become a part of the law of the state.

Mr. EBY: I move to amend Proposal No. 134 as follows:

Insert after the word "destruction" the following: "and to prevent the disturbance of the orderly operation of industrial pursuits."

Mr. DOTY: An inquiry please: Is this amendment as read an amendment to the original proposal? I do not think that is the way the member means it.

Mr. EBY: No.

Mr. DOTY: There is an amendment by substitute which strikes out all of the proposal and proposes to substitute this. If the amendment is adopted this is adopted.

Contempt Proceedings and Injunctions.

Mr. EBY: I was under a misapprehension. I withdraw the amendment and will offer a different one if the president will recognize me later.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the proposal.

Mr. PECK: I ask a separation.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. PECK] demands a separation and we will vote first on the first five lines.

A vote being taken that part was carried.

The PRESIDENT: Now we will vote on the remainder of it.

Mr. EBY: Now, I offer that amendment.

The amendment just offered by Mr. Eby was again read.

Mr. EBY: I notice that there has been added to this amended proposal "except to preserve physical property from injury or destruction". That contemplates those cases where laborers form themselves into menacing mobs. Now this perhaps is not what Mr. Halenkamp included, but it occurs to me if a man who is a scab wants to go to work he should be protected as well as any other person. Of course I have not introduced this at the behest of the laboring men.

Mr. ANDERSON: Aren't you getting mixed up the difference between a writ of injunction and a crime under a statute? Do you know what the difference is?

Mr. EBY: No. As I have observed it—

Mr. ANDERSON: Answer the question.

Mr. EBY: I think not. If you can enjoin men from destroying physical property you should be able to enjoin them from preventing orderly working men from working.

Mr. PECK: What are the police for?

Mr. ANDERSON: If they have a remedy below they cannot resort to the writ of injunction. Is not that where you make a mistake?

Mr. EBY: Is there any occasion where the writ of injunction has been issued against men who have prevented other men from pursuing their occupation?

Mr. ANDERSON: I have had considerable experience, but I could not answer the question, because from that experience I am not informed.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the second part.

A vote being taken the second part was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the passage of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 80, nays 13, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 134—Mr. Halenkamp. To submit an amendment to article I, of the constitution.—Relative to injunctions.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Laws may be passed, prescribing rules and regulations for the conduct of cases and business in the supreme court and other courts of the state, and for the regulation of proceedings in contempt and limiting the power to punish persons adjudged guilty of contempt.

No order of injunction shall issue in any industrial controversy involving the employment of labor, except to preserve physical property from injury or destruction, and all persons charged in contempt proceedings with the violation of an injunction issued in such industrial controversies involving the employment of labor, shall, upon demand, be granted a trial by jury as in criminal cases.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

On motion of Mr. Doty Proposal No. 134, as passed on second reading, was ordered printed.

On motion of Mr. Doty one thousand additional copies of Proposal No. 151, as passed on second reading, were ordered printed.

Mr. Doty moved that the Convention recess until 7:45 p. m.

Mr. Hoskins moved to amend the motion of recessing until 9 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The motion to amend was lost.

The original motion was carried.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess and was called to order by the president.

The PRESIDENT: The next thing in order is Proposal No. 227.

Legislative Apportionment.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The purpose of this proposal is clear to anyone who has given it any attention. I suppose some of you think this is one of the unimportant proposals, yet I have a sort of idea that it has been considered in some places from some information that has come to us. With your permission I would like to go over it a little by way of explanation and a little by way of comparison with the present constitution in regard to apportionment before the matter is opened for consideration.

The one point to which attention is given, and which is the only point in the proposal, is separate or distinct legislative districts, both as to members of the lower house or house of representatives and also as to the senate. As we now know, the constitution by amendment adopted in 1903, I believe, wipes out all of the provisions which previously applied in smaller counties by providing that each county in the state should have at least one representative. The previous ratio was wiped out. Then the ratio which is reached by dividing the whole number of people in the state as shown by the last preceding census by the number one hundred, provided the ratio for members in a county having more than one member. In other words, that determines the number to which each county should be entitled during the decennial period following that census. Ever since the adoption of the constitution of 1851 we have had a provision in the constitution for what might be called the cumulative practice in counties having a population greater than the ratio which existed during that decennial period with the provision that if that ratio multiplied by the number of terms of the general assembly, which was five—if that cumulative fraction multiplied by five would produce another full ratio, then at some time during the decennial period the county should be entitled to an additional representative, and the time was fixed in the constitution; and the constitution also provided that the governor, secretary of state and auditor of state should constitute a board of apportionment which should make the calculation following each decennial census and should assign to each county for the coming decennial period for each term the number of representatives it was entitled to and provide in which term the excess representative should be given to it. So it has come about that we have had a very indeterminate number of members, in the lower house particularly, and also a varying number in the senate. For instance, under the present constitution the apportionment for this decade has already been made up, and along the line of variations in number I call your attention to these figures very briefly. In the legislature the house will consist in the first period of a hundred and twenty-three members, in the second period of a hundred and twenty-three, in the third period of a hundred and twenty-eight, in the fourth period of a hundred and twenty-four and in the fifth period of a hundred and twenty-five.

The cumulative fraction multiplied by five produces such results as to justify an apportionment like that, and the various counties have this excess representative granted to them. This proposal proceeds upon the theory that that is not of itself very desirable; in other words, that the apportionment should be fixed by the decennial period, also that the representation in the senate should be fixed as well. Now, the purpose of this proposal is to divide the counties entitled under the census of 1910 into representative districts. That is, that each county shall be divided by a board, which is provided for in the proposal, into as many districts as it has representatives and providing the time when that apportionment is to be made. If this proposal should meet with your approval and the approval of the people of Ohio, and become a part of the constitution, a reapportionment would be necessary in accordance with this provision. That apportionment should be made in ample time so that notice could be given of it and preparations for election under the new provision could be made in each county and each senatorial district. It provides for the first apportionment during the month of March, 1913, and for another apportionment during the month of March, 1921. These distinct periods must be fixed in order to make it clear. The first apportionment begins after the apportionment for the decade has begun.

This proposal was amended to meet a certain situation. It first provided that during the month of February, 1921, this apportionment should be made. I was told that there was some uncertainty as to whether the census for 1920 could be given so as to make the apportionment before March, but there was no doubt that during March, 1921, such apportionment could be made in accordance with the provisions of this section.

Now as to the personnel of the board which is to make this bipartisan or nonpartisan apportionment of territory in the counties entitled to more than one. It provides that the members of the senate and the members of the house of representatives, who of course will be in session next winter, representing the two leading political parties respectively, shall meet separately and each of said bodies shall designate two electors, not members of the general assembly, who shall forthwith be appointed by the governor, and said four electors so designated and appointed shall constitute a commission who shall ascertain and determine the ratio of representation for members of the house of representatives and senators, the number of representatives to which each county is entitled, and the boundaries of each senatorial district. Then there is a provision for vacancies, in case one should occur, by choice of the senators, they being the smaller body and most easily convened in the event of there being a vacancy in the board.

The original proposal provided that the population of the state should be ascertained by the preceding federal census or by such other means as the legislature shall determine, but the proposal now requires that the population must be ascertained from the federal census, a correct and regular means of ascertaining and determining the population of a state, and which can safely be taken as a base of proceedings. There is no change of divisor from the provisions of the present constitution. Of course, under the present census, a greater ratio will follow than that of any previous decade owing to the growth of the population of the state. Each county shall be entitled to at least one representative as the people have provided by constitutional amendment regularly—and I want to call attention to the fact that no changes have been made in the constitution except such as were necessary to maintain and carry out the provisions of this proposal for separate legislative districts. Each county having a ratio of one and a half or over shall be entitled to two representatives. It is perfectly plain to anyone that the large counties will be the ones that will be benefited by this. The present constitution requires three-fourths; it is changed to one-half for a reason that is apparent to everyone. Then each county having two and a half times the ratio shall be entitled to three representatives and the same order continues, whatever number of ratios a county may have. Each county shall be divided by this commission, where they have more than one representative, into as many districts as there are representatives in said county, and one representative shall be chosen to each district.

The provision in the sixth section is that the territory fixed by this board shall be compact territory, that it shall be bounded by election precinct lines. I am not adopting this without some consultation with those who are familiar with the election laws and with election procedure. Necessarily the board which shall make this division, if it is provided that such division shall be made, will get in contact with the election officers regularly appointed. They must be guided by their advice in the matter of fixing these lines to conform to district boundaries.

Now, I want to make briefly a few comparisons between this and what we have already in the apportionment made for this decade, and it will be apparent at once that some counties will lose by having cut off a fraction of a representative, which when multiplied would give them an extra representative more during the decennial period. It is noticeably true of the county which I have the honor to represent in this Convention, Ashtabula. We have a population of 59,547. The ratio for representatives during this decade will be 47,671, with a fraction over, so that the fraction representing the difference between 47,000 and 59,000 for ten years will not be provided for.

Allen county, somewhat less in population, of course will lose in the same way, and these concessions must necessarily be made if this scheme is carried out. There is no getting away from it. There ought to be a rule, and that rule must hold throughout the state. On the other hand, some counties in the list entitled to more than one representative will have a continuous representation for ten years equal to the highest representation which they will have at any time during the decade under the cumulative fraction that I have spoken of. The county of Cuyahoga has thirteen representatives during the whole period. The county of Franklin has varying representatives, but is entitled to five for the whole period.

I do not want to make this tiresome by going into the details, but I will endeavor to answer any questions later that are asked me, and I will pass on to the consideration of the central part of the proposal. You are all aware that as the districts are fixed in the constitution of 1851, the cumulative fractions to which I have referred hold for senators just as with the members of the house of representatives. Consequently the number of senators will be variable. When the constitution of 1851 was adopted, the bulk of the population was differently located from the bulk of the population of today. That is readily observable, so that there will necessarily be a provision that those fixed districts as they are in the constitution would have to be changed, so that the joint senatorial district would not sometimes have one senator and sometimes have two and sometimes one senator for three or four terms of the decade. That is not a happy way of fixing senatorial representation in the constitution. Consequently, in this proposal we authorize and provide that this commission shall divide the population of the state by the number thirty-five, the same number in the constitution now, and then as nearly as possible they shall make the senatorial districts which shall form from the ratio 136,203.

There may be some question arising out of this as to the practicability of any board, however well disposed, making an apportionment in accordance with this provision. I have never believed that it was a wise policy in this Constitutional Convention or anywhere else to direct the legislature to do anything that you could not do yourself or that you did not have a definite idea could be done. Accordingly, I have taken the counties and gone over them in my own way and have attempted to ascertain whether this is a practical thing to do. I have made several typewritten copies of a tentative arrangement, and they are on my desk. I don't know whether you are interested in hearing them, but I will read a few of them. Beginning in the northwestern part of Ohio, on the senatorial ratio of 136,203, Williams, Fulton, Henry, Defiance and Wood would be combined for ten years, and they have 145,000; Ottawa, Sandusky, Erie, and Seneca, 138,000; Huron, Lorain and Medina, 133,841; Paulding, Van Wert, Putnam and Allen 130,000; Hancock, Hardin, Wyandot, Marion and Morrow, 139,000; Crawford, Richland, Ashland, and Knox, 134,000; Ashtabula, Trumbull, Lake and Geauga, 149,000; Mahoning and Portage, 146,000; Columbiana and Jefferson, 142,000; Stark and Carroll, 138,000; Summit and Wayne, 146,311; Holmes, Coshocton, Tuscarawas and Guernsey, 147,000; Harrison, Belmont, Monroe and Noble, 136,000; Licking, Muskingum and Perry, 138,000; Morgan, Athens, Washington and Meigs, 134,000; Lawrence, Gallia, Jackson and Scioto, 144,000; Ross, Pickaway, Vinton, Hocking and Fairfield, 142,000; Pike, Adams, Brown, Clermont, Clinton and Highland, 40,000; Warren, Butler and Preble, 118,000; Auglaize, Mercer, Shelby and Darke, 126,000; Miami, Clark and Greene, 141,000; Logan, Champaign, Madison, Union, Delaware and Fayette, 147,000; Cuyahoga, with a population of 637,000, has five senators; Hamilton three senators for the entire decade; Franklin, two senators; Lucas, one senator with a large fraction. The compensation there is that Lucas, which now has one senator for every term, will in the next decade certainly have two senators the whole time. Montgomery will have one senator, with such a large fraction over that probably Montgomery will have two if this arrangement should be undertaken in the next decade.

I suggested that we would make some comparison with the present senatorial districts. I have indicated the number in this tentative arrangement. Now let us see how they compare with some of the present senatorial districts.

For instance, the eighth senatorial district as at present situated is composed of Lawrence, Gallia, Meigs and Vinton with a population of 103,000. They have a senator all of the time during the entire decade. Clark, Champaign and Madison, the eleventh senatorial district, 112,000, which is 6,000 less than the one under the tentative arrangement that I have prepared, and they have one senator for the entire period. Miami, Darke and Shelby, the twelfth senatorial district with a population of 112,000, will have a senator for the entire time. The seventeenth and twenty-eighth joint senatorial district under present arrangement, Morrow, Knox, Wayne and Holmes, has 102,000 people and yet has a senator for the entire decade. I only make these comparisons to show you that as far as fairness is concerned the tentative arrangement that I have prepared is vastly more representative and fairer than the present apportionment.

Legislative Apportionment.

Mr. RILEY: How many would you have?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Thirty-four. Under the apportionment of this decade the senate will be varying in number. For instance, in 1880 it was 33; in 1881, 33; in 1882, 36; in 1883, 33; in 1884, 37.

Mr. RILEY: Your scheme contemplates the change from year to year during the decade?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It absolutely retains the same number for the decade.

Mr. RILEY: What would be the size of the house the next term?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: A hundred and twenty-five members for the entire decade.

Mr. McCLELLAND: Some advantages will accrue to some political parties and some disadvantages to others by this apportionment?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Yes, sir; almost inevitably.

Mr. McCLELLAND: Is it not hopeless that the board elected by a partisan caucus will ever agree without an umpire upon that redistricting?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I have not the slightest doubt of it. I should think and I should expect that four gentlemen would be chosen. I have provided here that they shall not be members of the legislature, and I would expect they would agree upon men of character who had reputations that they would not want to lose and men who could meet and discharge an important work like this on grounds above party.

Mr. MAUCK: The gentleman from Ashtabula is aware of the advantage that is always taken by political parties for congressional purposes. What warrant has he to believe that the general assembly will select any other but their own kind?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: There will be two democrats and two republicans on the commission.

Mr. MAUCK: I understand that, and I think it will be a deadlock unless you make a fifth member of the commission.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I do not assume all wisdom and I do not know that I object to an amendment of that kind, yet I cannot conceive that four gentlemen could meet disposed to reach an honest, fair conclusion and have any serious difficulty in reaching it.

Mr. MAUCK: Does the member mean to suggest that his associates, not himself, at the various legislatures in which he has sat have lacked that quality which makes them willing to do what is called gerrymandering?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I never have assisted but once in gerrymandering the state. I thought it was a pretty piece of work, as far as I was concerned, but, understand, the two parties didn't do it.

Mr. DOTY: Just one party did it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: And the minority didn't have any say so in the proposition whatever. The two parties never did it at all.

Mr. DOTY: Only one party did it and the minority didn't have anything to do with it. Was the member from Defiance or your colleague present on those occasions?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: No; I never got anything from him. I am always doing for him, and I never ask anything from him.

Mr. HOSKINS: How would you provide for this contingency? Suppose there would be some one nominated for president that everybody was for, and the entire senate would be elected from one political party?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I remember one time when we had only three democratic senators down in the South Carolina corner.

Mr. HOSKINS: But suppose those districts had gone the same way, how would the minority party be represented in this districting?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I would think if the state ever becomes so nearly of one political faith that it cannot have any senators of the other party the party in power ought to have everything.

Mr. HOSKINS: You provide that the democratic members of the house and senate may meet in one body and the republicans meet in one body?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: That constitutes two separate boards made up of the men of both houses?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Yes.

Mr. MAUCK: By that you confer upon them in their political capacity power to disfranchise everybody else?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is going all the way through the election machinery.

Mr. HOSKINS: What do you think are the necessities for this Constitutional Convention providing an apportionment method of any sort? Is not the present one good enough?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I think I have already indicated, so far as being representative is concerned, that the apportionment that I have provided here is a great deal fairer than the one that now exists. If you have heard my comparisons of the various tentative arrangements as compared with the present arrangement you will certainly say that.

Mr. PECK: What is your senatorial ratio?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It is 136,203. The division of 4,767,121 by 35 produced that ratio.

Mr. THOMAS: Was it not agreed in the committee that there might be a socialist and it might be a leading party?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It doesn't make any difference what the names of the two leading parties are, the two leading parties are the ones who will elect the board. There is nothing concealed about this. The figures are there to speak to everybody, and I simply present this to you compiled as it is to have it in convenient shape. Now if any further explanation is needed I shall be pleased to give it.

Mr. FACKLER: What objection could there be to creating an assembly of districts throughout the state on a basis of population?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You try it in a proposal and see. That is all the answer I can make to that. I have from the beginning up to this time stated, which I shall continue to hold, that this proposition is drawn along the line of securing at least one representative from each county to the house and at least one senator from each senatorial district, and any changes made in the old constitution have been made to conform to that.

Legislative Apportionment.

Mr. KING: What argument would you advance why a county having sixteen thousand population should have one representative and one with seventy thousand only one representative in the lower house?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I shall answer that as I answered Mr. Fackler. We had a provision, as you know, in the constitution for combining counties, and a great many were combined to make up the ratio, and then we didn't reach it. We also had a provision that a county with half a ratio should have one representative, and then a resolution was submitted to the people providing for a constitutional amendment guaranteeing to each county one representative. Do you want me to answer why a county should have a representative?

Mr. KING: If it is desirable, and I am inclined to think it is, why should not the ratio of the smallest county be the ratio of the larger?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Because of the impossibility of the case. If you make your ratio small enough to provide for the small counties you would have in your house two hundred men.

Mr. KING: New Hampshire has over two hundred and is one-third as large as Ohio.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Well, it is not the ideal legislature.

Mr. KING: Vermont has about two hundred.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It is not an ideal legislature. The new constitution of Michigan provides for having the largest body in the assembly eighty, and never to exceed one hundred. It is fixed within those limits. New York has separate and distinct assembly districts and has had since 1873.

Mr. KING: Why should not the legislature be permitted to change it every ten years?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The matter of having it fixed within limitations is to conform to the idea that the legislature must not be too numerous in order to accomplish work successfully and to accomplish it rapidly, and to do this a smaller number is more desirable.

Mr. HURSH: I offer a substitute for Proposal No. 227.

The substitute was read as follows:

Strike out everything after section 2 of amended Proposal No. 227 and insert the following:

SECTION 3. The population of the state shall be divided by the number seventy-five and the quotient shall be the ratio of representation in the house of representatives. The population wherever mentioned in this article shall be ascertained by the preceding federal census.

SECTION 4. Each county having a population of more than one-half such ratio shall be a representative district, and shall be entitled to at least one representative; counties having a population equal to one and one-half such ratios shall be entitled to two representatives; counties having a population equal to two and one-half such ratio shall be entitled to three representatives, and so on.

SECTION 5: The counties having a population of less than one-half such ratio, shall be formed into representative districts as follows: the county having the smallest population in the state shall first be attached to the county adjacent thereto having the largest population and less than one-half such ratio; then the county next smallest in population, not already paired shall be attached to the county adjacent thereto having the largest population and less than one-half such ratio, and so on until all the counties having a population less than one-half such ratio that can be, are thus paired. Should any county with a population less than one-half such ratio be unpaired, it shall then be attached to the legislative district adjacent thereto thus formed, having the least population.

SECTION 6. The ratio for a senator shall be ascertained by dividing the population of the state by the number "thirty."

SECTION 7. The state shall be divided into senatorial districts, as herein provided, and each district shall choose at least one senator, each district containing such ratio and three-fourths over shall be entitled to two senators and each district containing twice such ratio and three-fourths over shall be entitled to three senators and so on.

SECTION 8. Each senatorial district shall be composed of compact territory, as nearly equal in population as practicable, and shall be bounded by county lines.

SECTION 9. The apportionment so made for members of the general assembly shall be reported to the governor, by such commission, within two months after their appointment, and the general assembly shall provide by law for publishing said appointments and otherwise carrying into effect the foregoing provisions of this article.

Mr. HURSH: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: As to the advisability of the consideration of this proposal I wish to say that is a matter over which I have not much control. Proposal No. 227 has been introduced here for the purpose of providing legislative apportionment in the state of Ohio. Now, friends, we have succeeded in this Convention in getting along pretty well in regard to party matters. We have never been compelled, and I am very glad of it, to consider any partisan measures up to this time, but I want to ask you if there ever was in the history of the American government anything of the nature of a gerrymander or of an apportionment entered into that did not have more, or less of a partisan tinge. When I first came to this Convention last winter I realized that the lines of cleavage were on entirely different lines than those of party politics, and until this time we have not had the necessity of considering anything of a partisan nature. When this question of apportionment comes up we will become more or less wary in referring to it. We can see how we could be affected politically, but there are other reasons for the introduction of this substitute proposal. The Legislative and Executive committee has considered

Legislative Apportionment.

Proposal No. 227 a good deal and we could not agree upon its contents. So by common consent we reported it back to the Convention without recommendation. Then it devolved upon some of us who could not agree upon the proposal to evolve something that came nearer to our ideas of what the apportionment should be and this question occurred to us: Is it the intention or the desire of this Convention or the people of Ohio to make smaller the representation in the legislature? Another thing to be considered was, is it necessary to regard the fact of population in this apportionment? In the studying of that matter we came as it were to the parting of the ways as to what should be the ratio that would serve best and give nearest equal representation to the different political subdivisions as provided by the proposal. Then the question occurred, shall the apportionment be smaller or larger? I want to say in regard to making the apportionment larger that the great fault I have with Proposal No. 227 is the fact that the ratio is not right, considering the fact that each county shall have at least one representative. To be absolutely fair, giving each county one representative, we would have to divide the population of the state by the number 13,096, the population of the smallest county, and that would give us three hundred and sixty-four representatives, which would be impossible. But let us not assume anything quite that large. Let us assume that we will take a number of small counties of practically twenty thousand population and make that a divisor and we find that that would give us two hundred and thirty-eight in the house. Then the question occurred, how can we make a larger ratio and give the people practically the same fairness in representation? Now, friends, in making this apportionment we should at least be somewhat fair. I know that there may be some prejudice against the idea of combining counties, but we must remember at all times we cannot afford to be anything less than is fair in this apportionment, and if we are going to be fair we must have a ratio that will at least assure the larger counties of the state something near equal representation according to their population. We have hit upon the divisor of seventy-five, which gives 63,588 as the ratio of the representative districts, and we have provided that every county having one-half of a ratio or 31,794, shall be entitled to a representative. If the county has not a half ratio then we commence, not exactly by arbitrary rule, but by an automatic rule, to combine the smallest county of the state with the largest county adjoining that county having less than half the ratio, and so on until the whole state is apportioned. That appeals to me as being somewhat fair. It gives this apportioning board very little discretion, just the same as our present constitution, and we got by that a representative body of eighty-four or eighty-five members. As the member from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] has informed you, it is not desirable in these days to have your legislative bodies too large. And assuming that as a fact, we have gone upon this theory by which we can cut down the representation in the house of representatives to eighty-four or eighty-five as apportioned under the census of 1910.

There is one serious objection that we have to the proposition of the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS]. The people become habituated to certain usages and one of those usages in the state of Ohio is the political subdivision of the state, the county being the local unit. Now we do object to the idea of dividing the counties up into these legislative districts. We feel that if an apportionment is submitted in the manner provided by Proposal No. 227 and this bipartisan board goes to work to divide the larger counties, then trouble will begin, for this proposal provides that you need not divide those counties by townships or ward lines, but by precinct lines. Then there will come trading and jockeying for advantage, and every ten years no citizen in any large county in this state will have any assurance as to what district or what kind of a district he is going to be put in. The fact that this does give an opportunity for a practical gerrymander is objectionable. I maintain that the ratio, whatever it may be, should always apply to the county as a whole. Now, this is a nonpartisan convention and I suppose this is a nonpartisan proposal and something may just have happened, but in the evolution of this proposal something did happen. As originally introduced section 4 provided that each county should be entitled to at least one representative; each county containing such ratio and three-fourths should be entitled to two representatives and so on. Later on it was changed so that a county with one and a half ratio should be entitled to two representatives and so forth. I find in looking over the census of the different counties that the county of Butler has 70,271 population, that that county just falls below the one and a half ratio, which gives it one representative; but I find that Belmont county has just a little over one and a half ratio, that Columbiana county is just a little over one and a half ratio and that Lorain county is just a little over one and a half ratio, and of course any of you who are familiar with the political complexion of these counties in a normal year can understand what advantage that is. But there is another thing I wish to call attention to, and I will take the county of Butler to illustrate. The county of Butler has 70,271 population; by the apportionment according to Proposal No. 227 it will have for the remainder of the present decade one representative.

The time of the gentleman here expired and on motion of Mr. Roehm was extended five minutes.

Mr. HURSH: The county of Butler has 70,000 population in round figures. Five smaller counties of Ohio have 75,000 in round figures. Therefore Butler county will get one representative and five other counties of the state of Ohio will get one each, and they have only five thousand more people than Butler.

But I find something else. I find in the last decade that Butler county has increased 13,401 and the other counties have decreased their population 7,615. So at that ratio we have a right to assume that Butler county is bigger than the other five counties just now, and yet it will only have one representative and they will have five.

Now I want to call your attention to another fact, that thirty of the smaller counties of the state have a population of 637,439. The county of Cuyahoga has 637,825. Increasing in population as it is and the other smaller counties decreasing in population, Cuyahoga county undoubtedly now has more population than those thirty smaller counties. Under the proposed apportionment of my substitute to Proposal No. 227 Cuyahoga would have ten representatives and under the same arrangement the smaller counties would have about fifteen representatives, so that you see that the smaller counties would have the advantage. I know you say that it is discriminating against the country, but I want to call your attention to the fact that we have got to do one of three things. We have either got to admittedly give many country districts three or four times as much representation according to population as the larger districts have, we have to combine the smaller districts or have to make the representation larger. I have chosen the course of making the representation smaller and combining the counties.

I wish to say that this is not a selfish motive with me, because my county is not benefited, but we must come to some conclusion whereby we can give at least a partially fair representation. All the larger centers of population in the large counties, when we go to making these apportionments, must necessarily have more than one representative and consequently that is one reason why the large counties should be prevented from being divided into districts from the fact that they are entitled to some compensation. Take the county of Montgomery, with a population of 162,000, and it will have three representatives and there are eight or nine or ten counties in this state that will have nine or ten representatives and have no more votes than Montgomery county.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understand you to say that county lines would be destroyed in your county.

Mr. HURSH: If I said that I misstated it. I wish to say that my county falls under the ratio and will have to be joined to some other county under this arrangement.

Mr. ANDERSON: Are the people of your county favoring this proposition?

Mr. HURSH: I don't know whether they are or not, but I want this thing to the apportioned fairly.

Mr. ANDERSON: Could you think of anything that would cause people to vote against our constitution more than your proposal wiping out county lines?

Mr. HURSH: We do not propose to wipe out county lines. We propose to join one county with another. The point we make is this: The fact that we have got to come to some definite arrangement by which we can give at least fair representation makes it necessary to provide a smaller or a larger representation.

Mr. WINN: Are you in favor of the adoption by this Convention of the substitute offered by you?

Mr. HURSH: I am.

Mr. WINN: Will you support it?

Mr. HURSH: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: Really, does representation depend so much on numbers, that is, the number of one's constituents, as it does upon the community of interest? In other words, may not a representative represent fifty thousand people quite as well as twenty-five thousand if the fifty thousand people have a community of interest?

Mr. HURSH: That may be true, as regards the community of interest, but I think you will have to admit that it is not fair to give one community twice the representation that you give another.

Mr. LAMPSON: Take a population of fifty thousand in a compact mass, living in a small area. Take another population of fifty thousand widely scattered, covering a very much larger area. Do you think that they should have the same representation?

Mr. HURSH: I will answer that by saying I cannot see where we can get away from the logic of the proposition that the population, wherever it occurs, should be represented; and I will remind you of another fact, that in all the areas of large population in the large counties of the state, no injustice is done by the apportionment arrangement that I have proposed. The smaller counties of the state, even by that arrangement, are going to get a larger representation than the larger population of Cuyahoga and Hamilton counties.

Mr. LAMPSON: Has it ever occurred to the gentleman that there was an injustice in allowing one citizen of Ohio living in one county to vote for ten or a dozen representatives, whereas a citizen living in another county can only vote for one representative?

Mr. HURSH: Did it ever occur to you—to give you a concrete example—that the citizens living in Montgomery county, being permitted to vote for three representatives, are only being represented by three men, whereas in nine smaller counties with no more population than Montgomery county they have nine representatives? Is it not unjust to the citizens of Montgomery county when it only gets one-third of the representation that the smaller counties get?

Mr. LAMPSON: I hardly think so. I think those three might give better representation if Montgomery county were divided into three districts arranged with some reference to the interest of each district. Let the agricultural district be represented and the manufacturing interest and the commercial interest. Take Cuyahoga county with all the mass of industrial, commercial and other conditions that go to make it up. If that were divided into districts so that they could have more representative representation of the population than they possibly can as it now is, it would be a great improvement.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you not think in a large county like Cuyahoga you will get better representatives of its various interests by the selection of men rather than by dividing the territory?

Mr. LAMPSON: I think the dominating political interest will dominate the whole business whatever that dominating interest is. East Cleveland is a residence district and they might have a representative, and then each of several interests might have a representative, and that would give a very much stronger representation.

Mr. HOSKINS: The representative would be there to represent that particular interest rather than the interest of Cuyahoga county.

Mr. ROEHM: I am against Proposal No. 227 by Mr. Harris, of Ashtabula. I was against it in committee and I spoke against it and am still against it for two reasons: First that I am from Montgomery county and second that I happen to be a democrat. As it happens Montgomery county at present is represented by democrats elected by something like 2,500 plurality. If this proposal goes through, on account of the city of Dayton lying away to the east end of the county, we will have sliced off the heavy democratic district by a north and south line and the remainder will be cut by an east and west line, and the republicans would get two representatives whereas the democrats would get only one. There is no question in the world but that this matter is loaded with politics. I do not say that Mr. Harris has any designs in offering Proposal No. 227, but the matter is full of politics. The proposition of Mr. Hursh is much fairer. It does give a democrat a chance once in a life time at least, but a fair proposal would be to have a representation by population. If each county has to have a representative let it have it. Let it have one-fifth of a vote if real small and let the others vote in proportion. I therefore move that the proposal and amendment be indefinitely postponed.

Legislative Apportionment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I want to ask Mr. Hursh a question. Have you made any combination of the counties on your proposal?

Mr. HURSH: I have to some extent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: How many do you combine?

Mr. HURSH: Forty-eight.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Then you drop off twenty-four representative districts as not represented and combine?

Mr. HURSH: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You have been over it and made an estimate so that you can say that those will fairly combine in that way?

Mr. HURSH: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I wish you would show it to me. I would like to see it.

Mr. HURSH: I am sure it can be done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The members of the Legislative committee treated me with the greatest kindness and I was not aware that Mr. Hursh's proposal went to the extent that it does. I deny any idea of loading this proposition in any way. If it is true, as these gentlemen assert, that the democrats would suffer by this, I am sorry and it was inadvertent, but I cannot help it. I don't know how anybody can help it. As to the matter of communities and counties having thirteen representatives and being allowed the same number as thirteen counties having so much less population, that simply cannot be helped.

Mr. PETTIT: Suppose some district now has a certain number of representatives and is left the same. Does not that in fact become less of representation from the fact that other districts have an increased representation given them?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Giving or taking away representation was not considered by me. I was simply trying to get something absolutely fair.

Mr. PETTIT: You have not answered my question. I asked you if thirteen members in a certain district remained the same now as before, and if you raise the voting power of the smaller counties don't you lower the voting power of those thirteen that remain the same?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Not at all. What difference does it make to the people of Cuyahoga county?

Mr. PETTIT: If you let the thirteen remain the same and increase some of the others, don't the thirteen necessarily lessen in value?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Not at all, relatively it is not much.

Mr. PETTIT: Don't those smaller counties that are increased have a greater voting power than under the old rule?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: No, your county has just the same. If a county has the same number of representatives all of the time there is no difference.

Mr. PETTIT: You say everybody has the same representation and yet some increases are made some places. Now wherever those increases are made and the other counties remain with the same number of representatives the power—the voting power of the representatives of those other counties is decreased.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You can figure it out that way. As a matter of fact it will not work that way.

Mr. DWYER: I came to this Convention as a free lance, pledged to nothing but to do the best for the interest of the state of Ohio. Up to this time we have avoided politics. Our relations have been of the most pleasant character. There has not been even a tinge of politics. We have met and discussed all questions before us entirely independent of politics, all looking to the welfare of the state. I would be sorry to have any politics injected into this discussion and therefore, Mr. President, I believe we should continue as we have in the past, to elect our representatives by counties. I am opposed to these changes suggested.

Mr. DOTY: I had expected to vote for this proposition and my expectations were based entirely on a casual conversation I had with the author. While talking with him he asked me if I was in favor of dividing my county up into legislative and senatorial districts and I said, "Yes, I am in favor of that." A few years ago when we had local legislation I was not in favor of it. That is all the information I got about this proposition. It is not his fault that he didn't give me more, so I came to this meeting tonight and for the first time to hear a full explanation and a very excellent explanation on the part of the member from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS], and I find many changes that prevent me from voting for this proposal. The objections I have are numerous and I do not know that I can remember them all. A bipartisan board would not work. The member from Gallia [Mr. MAUCK] has pointed that out. Any man who has ever had much to do with that kind of work knows that this scheme without an umpire will not work. The present constitution does not allow the legislature to elect one public official except its own officials. The general assembly of Ohio has not the power to elect any other living official, and now we are proposing that the legislature shall elect four.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: We don't do any such a thing. This designates to the governor certain persons that he shall appoint.

Mr. DOTY: That is a distinction without a difference. I stand corrected on a technicality, but the practical result is that the legislature is going to be ripped up the back every ten years in electing these boards, and when you get the boards you are deadlocked; you would get a condition that would be simply indescribable. You may think it is a small thing to divide up legislative districts by classes when you have power, two to two, but you just try it once.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You don't think the decision could be made by anybody?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; one man could do it, or three men could do it, or five men could do it, but four men, equally divided in their political minds, in my judgment, as I have observed political workings in twenty years, will not do it.

Legislative Apportionment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Your opinion differs from those of men who have had considerable experience along the same line.

Mr. DOTY: Well, really, I think that is the first time in my life that anybody ever disagreed with me.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Very likely.

Mr. DOTY: I am giving my opinion for what it is worth. There are plenty of men who agree with me too on that.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I move that this proposal and amendment be laid on the table.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded, taken, and resulted—yeas 57, nays 35, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Beatty, Morrow,	Dunlap,	Harter, Stark,
Beyer,	Dwyer,	Henderson,
Bowdle,	Earnhart,	Hoffman,
Brown, Highland,	Fackler,	Hoskins,
Brown, Lucas,	Farrell,	Jones,

So the motion to table was carried.

Mr. OKEY: I move that we adjourn until nine o'clock tomorrow morning.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Tallman.

Leave of absence for Wednesday was granted to Mr. Johnson, of Madison.

The Convention then adjourned until tomorrow at nine o'clock, a. m.

SEVENTY-FIRST DAY

MORNING SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, May 8, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the vice president and was opened with prayer by Rev. A. M. Leyden, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the employes of the Convention be required to go to Chillicothe tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. KNIGHT: I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 121:

Resolved, That this Convention when it adjourns on Thursday, May 9, 1912, shall adjourn to Wednesday, May 22, 1912, at two o'clock p. m., at which time the standing committees on Schedule, Submission and Address to the People, and Arrangement and Phraseology shall report upon such matters as shall have been referred to said committees.

Resolved, That the calendar of business for May 22, 1912, and thereafter, shall consist only of proposals for third reading and questions appertaining thereto, and no other business shall be considered except that which shall have reference to the concluding work of the Convention.

Resolved, That Resolution No. 114 is hereby rescinded.

By unanimous consent the rules were suspended and the resolution was considered at once.

Mr. KNIGHT: My reason for introducing this resolution is sufficiently apparent. Our work on second readings will be practically, if not completely, concluded today or tonight. The committee on Schedule and the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, and especially the committee on Schedule, cannot do any of its work to completion until it knows what the Convention is adopting on second reading, and that committee has had but a preliminary meeting. The committee on Arrangement and Phraseology would like to work twenty-four hours a day if it could. It has been doing pretty near that since last Friday, and down to the present time, so far as my information now goes, has approved one-half of the proposals, and in that half are the short ones. There are still many proposals any one of which has more subject matter than all the matter that has been handled by the committee on Arrangement. If it is desired that the work of the committee shall be in the best form possible, there should certainly be more time given than until next Tuesday to accomplish the work. A third reason perhaps makes it more appropriate for me to introduce a resolution than some others on the floor; we would like to consult the convenience of a majority of this Convention who have special business between now and the twenty-first of May. Personally I do not believe there will be more than a beggarly quorum after tomorrow night whatever day we fix for the next meeting. I believe as citizens of the state of Ohio some of us who are and hope to remain citizens of the state are and ought to be interested sufficiently to allow the last ten days before the primaries to be devoted to the citizenship of the state. May 22 is the day immediately following the primary, and the intent of the resolution is that when the Convention reassembles May 22 it will work Fridays and Saturdays until we get through. I ask that the rules be suspended and that this be put on its passage.

The president here assumed the chair.

Mr. FESS: Is it the purport of your resolution that we must finish all second readings tomorrow night?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. FESS: Don't you think that is unwise?

Mr. KNIGHT: If we haven't finished then we can modify it.

Mr. FESS: Will you agree to it?

Mr. KNIGHT: When the times arrives I will. We might finish today.

Mr. FESS: Suppose we cannot do it?

Mr. KNIGHT: We can control that when we come to it.

Mr. FESS: But if we cannot?

Mr. KNIGHT: We will modify it.

The rules were suspended.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will call the roll on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 83, nays 15, as follows:

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is Proposal No. 16, Mr. Elson. The president would like to say we hope that during the last day's work endeavors will be made to facilitate the work. The roll call should not be idly demanded. It takes ten or fifteen minutes to call a roll. When a roll call is being had members should be in their seats to answer to their names and not lounging in the smoking room. We ought not to have any long speeches made or papers read. The author should explain directly his proposal, exactly what it is and what it is aimed to do.

Mr. ELSON: I expressed myself a few weeks ago on this subject. The proposal was sidetracked and now it comes up again. I hope that those who were in opposition to it at that time have since reconsidered and have looked upon the thing in its true light.

There are said to be two classes of delegates opposed to the short ballot. One is the class of politicians who are looking for political preferment. I can readily see how such might be the case. I think that we have met that condition in making this proposal go into operation not before the first of January, 1914, so that whatever the present applicants and aspirants for office may aspire to, they will not be interfered with on account of the adoption of this proposal. I hope that they will look at it in that light. As I said I do not blame anyone for aspiring to certain offices or for taking that view of the matter. However, I hope we have met that objection and will secure their support.

The other class are men who have not studied the subject and do not clearly understand what it means. If there were any of that class before I hope there are none now. There has been literature sent to members on the subject and I believe all of us are posted on what the short ballot really is and really means. The great objection of that class of men arises from the fact that they fear that it has a tendency away from instead of toward greater democracy. Such is positively not the case. It is a giving of more power into the hands of the people than the people had before.

Evidence is one of the things by which we decide cases, whether they are before a court or anywhere else. We need evidence in order to convince ourselves and if we will take a general view of the conditions of the short ballot in the United States today, we shall find all of the evidence that anyone could possibly need to convince him of the probable effect of the short ballot. For instance, Governor Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, is president of the national association advocating the short ballot. We know Governor Wilson is a progressive in a genuine and real sense of the word. Second, ex-President Roosevelt spoke on that subject before this Convention a few weeks ago. In clear language he said, "I am in favor of the short ballot." Why would he say such a thing if the short ballot were a tendency away from democratic government instead of toward it? What he said on that subject has been published broadcast all over the United States.

Now I want to restate what I said before, that there are two great objects in the short ballot. One is actually to shorten the ballot so that the common voter may vote intelligently, and the other is that it concentrates power in the hands of a man whom the people can watch, and takes the power out of the hands of a political boss.

As to the first or the shortening of the ballot, let me show you a ballot voted upon by the people of Nebraska a few weeks ago in their state primary. It is nine feet long. They voted one in New York fourteen feet long. Just imagine such a thing! So that the actual shortening of the ballot is one of the objects to be obtained in passing this short-ballot measure. All over the United States there is a general comment on this subject, and men who are at the head of this movement are patriotic men, men who are not working for selfish motives. I have here hundreds of editorials from the leading newspapers of the country, all favoring the short ballot. I shall read you three or four excerpts. Here is one from a Michigan paper:

It has been well said that the stronghold of the machine politician is the long ballot. He trades on the fact that while wide publicity is given the leaders of the ticket the minor officeholders escape almost unnoticed. What we need is a short ballot, a ballot confined to the offices that really count. The man elected should be entrusted with the power to make appointments to the minor offices and could be held responsible for the selections made.

Here is one from an Iowa paper:

The long tickets of the present day will some time be looked upon as an unbelievable farce.

One from a Tennessee paper:

It is a reform that the professional politicians will fight as they fought the adoption of a classified civil-service system in the federal government, but it must come if public offices are to be filled with capable business men and not with professional politicians.

Here is one from the New York Evening Sun:

The proposal to cut down the number of our elective officers is plain common sense.

From the Chicago Record-Herald:

Friends of the short ballot are congratulating themselves with ample reason on the progress of their movement. The notion that the short ballot is "undemocratic" or incompatible with popular control of government is fading in the light of reason.

Here is one from Collier's Weekly:

No political device is gaining ground faster than the short ballot. It is perhaps the most important of the changes of government machinery now under consideration.

No other governmental device threatens the system of machine boss and corporation rule which has grown up in our cities as seriously as the short ballot threatens it.

The Short Ballot.

From the Minneapolis Tribune:

Probably it would go far alone to cure many of the evils that are attacked by more clumsy and elaborate machinery of reform.

The essence of the short ballot is confidence in the people. Its fundamental assumption is that the majority of the people will go right, if you permit them to see where the right lies.

Now, I do not want to weary you with reading all of these clippings. One of the great objects to be secured by the short ballot is just what the name signifies, shortening the ballot; because now when we go to the polls our ballots are so long and we have so many people to vote for that we really do not know anything about the candidates and we have no opportunity to learn who they are or what their fitness for the office is. We must either vote blank or blindly. We find out who the leading candidates are and as to their fitness because the newspapers will be holding them up, but the minor officers are comparatively little known. All we know about them is from a few circulars, and so we have to vote blindly or blank. You can go on the streets of Columbus or any other city in the state and ask the average voter as you meet him to name over the state officials below the governor and there is not one man in fifty who can do it, and yet he voted for or against them. He does not even know who they are.

Now the second point, the concentration of power in the hands of one man, not because we wish to give that man the power at the expense of others, but because if we so concentrate the power in the hands of one man we will keep our eyes on that man. He will be in the lime-light all the time, and if anything goes wrong with his administration he will be held responsible by the people. If a state treasurer were to go wrong now, the governor might snap his finger and say, "I didn't have anything to do with putting him there." He may even be of a different political party from the governor. But suppose the governor appointed that state treasurer. Then the people would place their finger upon the governor himself and say he was responsible.

Mr. FACKLER: This proposal says "The governor and lieutenant governor shall hold their offices for two years and the auditor for four years." What is the reason for lengthening that term of office?

Mr. ELSON: As we have it arranged here you will completely divorce the state from national politics. For a long time the agitation went on to divorce municipal from state and national politics, and this has been accomplished by reason of the fact that the municipal elections are in the odd-numbered years. We all admit that greater efficiency has taken place by reason of this change. Those who believe in the short ballot believe that if city, national and state elections were divorced we would have still a better grade of men running for office. Then the voter in making his choice, instead of running down a long list of names, many of whom he never heard of before, because their positions are relatively inconspicuous, will have comparatively few names to select from. He will not be tempted to mark his cross in the circle above the name of the president he favors and you will not have the state government dominated by national politics. This we want to get away from forever, and by the provisions in this proposal we do it.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: How much will such a ballot as you exhibit there be shortened—how much would the New York ballot be shortened?

Mr. FACKLER: We are not proposing the New York ballot for—

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: You have used that as a demonstration.

Mr. FACKLER: Yes.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Show us how much shorter the ballot would be.

Mr. FACKLER: The ballot would be shorter in Ohio.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is not that all made up of county committees?

Mr. FACKLER: This is for full elections.

Mr. HOSKINS: How much shorter would it be? Show us. Is not four-fifths of that ticket made up by the county ballot and are you not attempting to deceive the Convention?

Mr. FACKLER: No, sir; that is an actual ballot. I am giving you an illustration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Well, another way to get at it—how many names would be stricken from that New York ballot by this proposal?

Mr. FACKLER: Six.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Then the entire shortening of the ballot would be the elimination of six names?

Mr. FACKLER: That is true. We have to start some place. We cannot shorten everywhere at one time. The legislature can then take steps to shorten it as to the minor offices.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You voted for the primary proposal—

Mr. FACKLER: I did.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Providing that all candidates shall be voted for at primaries?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes, sir. These men will not be candidates for state offices.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: They will be on the county ticket?

Mr. FACKLER: The county ticket will be nominated by direct primary, and for the purpose of getting efficiency in that primary we want to have few men to be voted for. It has been always a game of special privilege to get a large number of officials running for office at the same time in order that the people might be confused as to the men upon whom responsibility is placed. Professor Knight, in his proposal, was aiming at that very thing. The American Book Company has always fought for large school boards because they could handle them better.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You are not going to shorten your primary ticket very much.

Mr. FACKLER: If we shorten the number of officials nominated at the primary, do we not shorten our primary ballot?

Mr. HALFHILL: If you have one elective official and elect delegates to a convention, it takes the same number of delegates to the convention.

Mr. FACKLER: Yes, but the convention will be a thing of the past very soon and we desire to get our government in such form that it can work efficiently.

The Short Ballot.

Now the question has been raised here about this taking power away from the people. Why, this proposition puts back into the hands of the people power instead of taking it away. The most progressive men in the United States who have been fighting for popular rights are fighting for the short ballot so that the machinery can be placed in hands that can be watched and controlled. We believe that the people with the initiative and referendum can express themselves on measures, and we believe that shortening the ballot will tend to make that expression just and right.

Mr. RILEY: As a matter of fact did not the first constitution provide for the election of only one state officer and that continued until 1851?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes.

Mr. RILEY: And the people were tired of it?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes, but how were the rest elected? By the general assembly, not by the voters.

Mr. RILEY: Why don't you provide that the senate or some one shall confirm the appointments of the governor as is done in the United States Senate when the president appoints?

Mr. FACKLER: We do not do that because we believe the people will watch their governor on appointments and it will be the aim of the governor to appoint the very best men.

Mr. HOSKINS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I think of all the propositions that have been presented to the Convention that are undemocratic, unrepugnant and smacking of czarism and Russia, this is the worst. I cannot conceive of anything as monstrous as this proposition ever having been introduced in a legislative body or a constitutional convention in modern times. It beats anything I ever heard of.

Mr. DOTY: Is not that the same remark you made on Judge Peck's judicial reform proposal?

Mr. HOSKINS: It is not. Now you keep your seat and don't ask any more questions. I don't want you to take up my time. This is a democratic-republican form of government. The governors elected in the state of Ohio are no better than other citizens and no less affected by politics than other men are affected by politics. You have talked about the short ballot, and this short ballot meant only that you would eliminate certain elective state officers and make them appointive. That is not the idea of the men who have been advocating the short ballot at all. Why, you men who have been voting to make the primary system general and universal are voting in direct opposition here to what you advocated there. Look at the functions performed by the different state departments. Almost every legislature adds some administrative board, or board of some sort, that carries with it a vast number of employees. Now you make all the state offices appointive and you have simply added to the appointing power of the governor of the state. You have added to his power to build up a machine that it will be almost impossible to eliminate. There is no single state in the Union that provides for a four-year term of the governor that does not make that governor ineligible for re-election, and yet, if I have read this correctly, the governor may perpetuate himself in office term after term, there being no limit as to the number of times that he can be elected, and he can be elected as many times as his machine can control the state. You know what the main thing is when it comes to fixing up election machinery out in wards. You know four-fifths of it is political machine power simply. I do not care where it comes from, it is part of that human nature that we discussed so much in the tax proposition, and you cannot tax human nature.

Now take the attorney general's department. The attorney general of the state is a member of eight different boards outside of his official duties, and he must pass upon different subjects in conjunction with the governor, secretary of state and possibly auditor of state and others. I cannot go into the details of that, but if you make the attorney general, the secretary of state and the others that are now elected by the people dependent upon the governor for their tenure of office, you will abolish every one of the boards on which these men act, because there would not be any use to have anybody on the boards except the governor, if he is to be associated only with his own appointees on these boards. Just turn the whole matter over to the governor and let him handle it all. Then you are not shortening your ballot enough to talk about. The author of the proposal said that the people of Ohio didn't know who their state officials were. If I had that opinion of the people I would not have voted for a primary. I would vote for a czar, a boss, and let him run the whole job and let the people go about their business. Do you mean to say the people of Ohio don't know who Tim Hogan is, or who Grant Denman is, or who Charlie Graves is, or who S. E. Strode is, he who is enforcing the pure food laws, or who the commissioner of common schools is?

Mr. DOTY: You cannot name him; what is his name?

Mr. HOSKINS: Mr. President, have I the floor?

Mr. DOTY: You can't name the commissioner of the common schools.

Mr. HOSKINS: I hate to apply "the short ugly word" to you. Do you know?

Mr. DOTY: I do not know.

Mr. HOSKINS: If Brother Doty doesn't know the name of the school commissioner he is not fit to move an adjournment in this Convention and he has been pretty generally usurping that privilege.

Mr. ANDERSON: What greater fame would that gentleman have if he were appointive?

Mr. KNIGHT: Is it not a fact that a majority of the Convention did not know the name of the present school commissioner until he attacked one of the very best proposals that has been offered here?

Mr. HOSKINS: That may be the case. He was against Professor Knight's proposal and I voted for it on the second reading, but I may vote against it on the third reading if you ask me many more questions like that.

It was said that the temptation of the voter was to vote a straight ticket. The best answer to that would be to ask the question whether or not the voters of the state of Ohio have been voting a straight ticket. You know the history of the last ten or fifteen years shows that the people know how to scratch a ticket and they know how to vote for the men they want in a particular office. All the voting we have had in the last fifteen years shows that the people have arrived at the point where they know how to discriminate.

The Short Ballot.

Now with reference to this long ballot. I don't desire to mislead the Convention and I know my friend from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] would not do that, but he at least overstepped the bounds of reasonable argument when he exhibited that great long ticket, all of which refers to committeemen, except the top four names, and you would be shortening that ballot just by four or five names by this proposal, and you destroy the most important functions of state government. I want to say to you you are attempting something very revolutionary.

Mr. STALTER: If the governor has the appointing power are you not forced to vote a straight ticket?

Mr. HOSKINS: Practically, yes. There is one thing certain, so far as I am concerned, I am against this entire proposal unless the proponents put in a prohibition of the re-election of the governor. That might make it a little better, but with that I would be against it. It seems strange to me that if anybody desires to pass such a proposal as this he does not prohibit the governor from being re-elected, for if he is allowed to be re-elected he can perpetuate himself in office term after term.

Now this is not a matter of present politics, or present administration, or future administration, but a question of principle. Will we undertake to put in the hands of the governor of the state of Ohio a more autocratic power than ever was conferred on any official in the state of Ohio, and, as far as I know, in the United States? The question was very pertinently asked of the proponent of this proposal why he did not put some of the safeguards in the proposal that are in our present constitution, for instance, when the governor makes these appointments that they be confirmed by the senate. That might be a safeguard, but even with that I would be opposed to it, because you take power out of the hands of the people when the intent of this Convention has been to confer upon the people of the state a greater share in their own government. I am in sympathy with every proposition we have had along that line. I am surprised that men in this Convention like the gentlemen from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER and Mr. DOTY], who have voted persistently to put in the hands of the people power, are today found attempting to throttle the people, take away from them the power they have enjoyed and confer it upon the appointing power and thereby enable the appointing power to perpetuate himself in office. I appeal to all of you to be true to the four months' history you have made. Gentlemen, turn your backs on this revolutionary measure and let us unanimously put it where it belongs, let it sleep on the table.

Mr. READ: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I admit that there is a certain convenience and some virtue in the short ballot and I also concede that there is some merit in the arguments of those delegates who have advocated that method of selecting our officials, but, while I agree with much that has been said this morning, I still contend that their remarks are far from justifying affirmative action on this proposal, which aims to have all the elective officials of the state, except the governor and lieutenant governor, appointed by the governor. That looks to me, as the gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] says, like taking the power out of the hands of the people instead of conferring more direct power upon them and bringing the people and the government closer together.

Even should this short-ballot scheme prevail, it would not relieve the people of any grievous burden. I know of no demand from electors asking that they be denied the privilege of selecting their own state officials. On the other hand, I believe the citizens of Ohio generally want to continue electing their officials and are not demanding any radical reduction of their state ballot. I will agree that it is desirable and would be a genuine reform for the cities, like Cleveland, Cincinnati and Columbus, to materially shorten their municipal tickets. There is a real necessity in big cities for a shorter ballot where a great many candidates of each party, unknown to the electors, are to be selected. If these municipalities want to cut their elective officers down to two or three, let them do it and have the short ballot. But if you apply the same rule to cities and state in this respect, you may benefit the former and work harm to the latter.

The clerk of the supreme court should be appointed by the judges of that body. The board of public works will no doubt be eliminated. There is a proposal in to have the governor appoint the superintendent of public instruction. I believe that is right. After these changes we will only have to elect the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, auditor of state, treasurer, attorney general and dairy and food commissioner. I have too much faith in the average intelligence of the Ohio voter to believe that he cannot exercise the discrimination and judgment necessary to make a wise selection of this number of state officials. I am in favor of reducing the frequency of the ballot one-half by electing state officials for four-year terms and have such election come midway between the presidential elections. It would be a great improvement over our present method to elect the governor for four years and have it arranged so that he would be ineligible to succeed himself. I will submit an amendment to that effect at the proper time. I do not know that I would be in favor of having all the officers ineligible to succeed themselves. The auditor of the state is already elected for four years. I do not consider it a mere bookkeeping position, as has been said, but an office that not only requires expert accounting but also a knowledge of public business and of state finance. The auditor should have talent for systematizing details and the gift, or acquired ability, for accuracy in the compilation and preservation of records. I believe it is a wise provision to have him elected for four years as he now is. That the governor should be elected for four years and be ineligible to succeed himself must be evident to all. When elected for two years much of his time and attention is too often given to scheming and planning for re-election, and at the end of two years, if he is re-elected and, perchance, becomes a candidate for the presidency, then his mind is diverted from the gubernatorial duties by the attractions of the White House. Therefore I would advise that the governor be elected for four years and be ineligible to succeed himself that he might give his whole attention to his official duties. I do not suppose any of the candidates in this Convention would be guilty of such dereliction of duty, but notwithstanding the fact that several distinguished delegates are casting wistful glances toward the governorship, the temptation to shirk present duty while aspiring for future honors should be reduced to the minimum.

Were we to make this change, it could be arranged so that officials elected the coming fall would be eligible for re-election in 1914, and that would give them six years to serve, but after that the length of service at one time would be limited to four years. Following the interim of four or eight years a former official could be elected again. That has been done in Pennsylvania and other states. There are about twenty-nine states to-day that elect their governor for four years. Most of them are ineligible to succeed themselves and the experience of these states with the four-year term furnishes all the substantial reasons we need for adopting the same in Ohio.

The Short Ballot.

In regard to clothing the governor with more appointive power, I would like to call attention to what the governor has already in the way of responsibility and the power and opportunity he has to build a political machine: One of these appointees is the adjutant general, and he has fifty-two attaches; the department of banking, fifteen; the department of insurance, thirty-three; the railroad commission, seventeen; the department of public printing, four; labor and statistics, twenty-two; chief mining inspector, sixteen; workshops and factories, forty; state fire marshal, thirty-four; department of state board of agriculture, twenty-eight. This makes ten heads of departments intimately connected with state government and constituting the governor's cabinet. Under these ten departments there are two hundred and eighty-three employees and in addition to those there are other departments under the control of the governor, the penal and charitable institutions, the Ohio board of health department, commissioners of the sinking fund department, state board of pharmacy, board of arbitration, geological survey, highway commissioner and numerous other departments that are all under the direct control of the governor, and in addition to that you would have him to appoint the secretary of state, auditor of state, treasurer of state, attorney general, and you add about one hundred and ninety more employees, making in all over seven hundred employees under the direct control of the governor. Do you want to make him a monarch? What would we gain by giving the governor any more power than that he already has?

Mr. RILEY: Is it not a fact that all the election machinery of the state is in the hands of those employees?

Mr. READ: Well, there is much truth implied in your question and that condition too often leads to the subordination of state service to political work.

Mr. DOTY: You were there and you ought to know.

Mr. READ: But I am speaking from observation and not from personal experience. I hope the delegates will consider this carefully. I am not opposed to a shorter ballot, but this proposal does not shorten the ballot where it needs shortening, but aims rather at centralization of power, and all remarks made this morning favoring a short ballot have been irrelevant to this proposal. It proposes to take away from the people their right and opportunity to select, control and advise their own officers. Let them be appointed by the governor and they will no longer be responsive to the desires and will of the people.

Mr. PIERCE: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In section 2, in line 10, strike out the period and insert a comma, and add: "all such officers shall be ineligible to a successive election."

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I move that the proposal and the pending amendment be laid on the table.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 57, nays 47, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Fess,	Matthews,

So the motion to table prevailed.

Mr. ELSON: I just wish to say as a matter of personal privilege, that when a question of such great importance is before the Convention and there is no intention of consuming any more time than we have today, and it is being managed as best it can be by those interested in it, for any one to get up and make a motion of this sort and force it to a vote is a contemptible, mean trick, and I want everybody to know it.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the language of the member be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT: The language is improper.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I had a splendid speech that I did not get to deliver, but it is ready anyway.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I want to justify myself in making this motion: There are twelve proposals on the calendar to be disposed of today, under a resolution of the delegate from Franklin, and I opposed that resolution because I thought it was not possible to do that. The gentleman from Athens [Mr. ELSON], the author of this proposal, voted for that resolution. How are we going to dispose of the eleven other propositions if we do not cut off debate?

The PRESIDENT: The member's conduct [Mr. MILLER, of Crawford] is perfectly proper and needs no defense. The next matter is Proposal No. 15.

Mr. FESS: I want to raise my voice in protest against this manner of proceeding, which you can evidently see the end of. You propose to deal with the next twelve proposals in order to get rid of them, and I want to say it is absolutely out of order and most reprehensible for us to end this Convention like a legislative body, the errors of which may be corrected in two years, while our errors cannot be corrected except by the people. It is an outrage upon this body of men for you to undertake to call off debate upon important measures and thwart the will of the people by this sort of procedure. It is going to be done on every proposal and there seems to be only one thing sought and that is to get rid of this business now. I am going to stay right here and fight for the rights of these people as long as I have breath, and I am going to see that they get them.

Deposition by State, Etc., in Criminal Cases.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to —

Mr. FESS: You have had your say twice upon this measure and I was not allowed to speak.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to ask you a question.

Mr. FESS: What do you want to ask?

Mr. HOSKINS: Now smile.

Mr. FESS: No, I will not smile.

Mr. HOSKINS: Let me remind you that you had me hot the other day and not smiling, and now you are the same way.

Mr. MAUCK: I rise to a point of order. There is nothing before the Convention to justify this colloquy and I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken and the next matter before the Convention is Proposal No. 15 by Mr. Riley. The proposal has been read a second time and the question is on the adoption of the proposal.

Mr. RILEY: Some of the members who remained here last Friday heard some discussion of this question. A good many were not here and some explanation of the proposal should be made to them. The proposal is No. 15. The amended proposal is in front of the original proposal. This is a proposal to amend the bill of rights, article I, section 10. One of the provisions of the bill of rights is that a criminal accused of crime shall be confronted by his witnesses. The language of some constitutions is "brought face to face with the witnesses." Now for a long time, perhaps ever since the criminal was permitted to testify, he has been permitted to take depositions, but there has been no provision for taking depositions on behalf of the state. That never appealed to any one, certainly, as a square deal or as a fair thing. If it is proper to prosecute crime at all it is proper to give society and the state some chance as well as the defendant. This proposal provides that the legislature may provide for taking depositions of witnesses on behalf of the state when the presence of the defendant can be secured at the place with his counsel. Now it seems to me that no argument ought to be necessary to show that that is reasonable and just and is not needlessly expensive, because the state would probably pay the expenses as it does for the witnesses in general.

Now another change in this section of the bill of rights was introduced by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. BOWDLE] and incorporated in this proposal by the Judiciary committee. I should say that this proposal has the indorsement of the Judiciary committee—whether all of them or not, I am not advised.

Mr. TAGGART: Would not your proposal be strengthened in line 21 by inserting before the word "opportunity" the words "means and," so that it would read "always securing to the accused the means and opportunity to be present in person," etc.?

Mr. RILEY: If the gentleman prepares that amendment I shall be glad to accept it. There will be no sort of objection to it. The "opportunity" carries with it that idea. If he didn't have the means he couldn't have the opportunity. However, if he is under arrest the state will be compelled to defray the expenses.

Mr. TAGGART: But if he were on bond he could have an opportunity and not have the means?

Mr. RILEY: There may be an objection there. I shall have no objection to your amendment. Now as to the other matter introduced on the suggestion of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. BOWDLE].

The present constitution says that no prisoner shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself. To this language is added "but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel." The rule has been ever since defendants were permitted to testify in a felony case that if he fails to testify no reference to his failure to do so shall be commented upon by counsel or referred to in any manner, and if it is, the verdict is set aside.

Realizing that you are anxious to get along today, I shall content myself with what I have just said and what I said last week.

Mr. KERR: I want to ask the gentleman, if this is put in wouldn't it require a man to prove himself innocent?

Mr. RILEY: No, sir; there is nothing of that sort. It seems to me that is not a fair way of putting it.

Mr. KERR: It amounts to that.

Mr. RILEY: I do not think so. I leave that to the Convention.

Mr. TAGGART: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 21 before the word "opportunity" insert the words "means and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PECK: This proposal was recommended by the Judiciary committee and it has been discussed to a considerable extent in this Convention, though a good many members were absent at the time of the discussion. I only rise to say that it has received a lengthy and careful consideration in the Judiciary committee. We put our best efforts on it and at one time nearly everybody in the committee took a hand in the discussion. Finally it comes here with pretty near the unanimous support of that committee. I hope it will be adopted. I think it is to the public interest and I think something should be done to strengthen the hands of those who are attempting to punish the criminals of the state. The prosecution of criminals is in a deplorable condition in the state of Ohio. There is nothing that needs righting worse than that.

Mr. HALFHILL: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 12, strike out "the general assembly" and insert "law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT: It seems to me that this is one of the proposals which ought, after the careful study the members of the committee have given to it, to commend itself without any need of argument. The people at large have, ever since the state of Ohio has been in existence, been at a disadvantage in ascertaining the facts in the case of a person charged with an offense against all of them. All that the major part of the proposal undertakes is to say that all of the people in our collective capacity, society as a whole, shall have an equal chance with the accused person in getting at the facts.

Deposition by State, Etc., in Criminal Cases.

It is well known that for illness or for other reasons, or through the spiriting away of witnesses, it is difficult often to obtain the needed testimony to set forth the facts in order to convict a man when there is no way by which, in the absence of witnesses outside of the state, it is possible for us as a community or as society to get at the facts in the case charged against one of us or having committed an offense against the rest of us, and this undertakes to provide against that, with proper precautions, and to allow the taking of testimony outside of the state which may bear against the testimony of the accused, just as he has an opportunity now to get that testimony in his own behalf against the rest of us.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like to ask how the indigent defendant who is charged with crime could afford or what means will be provided for him to face the witnesses?

Mr. KNIGHT: The gentleman from Auglaize has at times lapses or he would know that within five minutes an amendment has been put in providing that he shall have the means and the opportunity.

Mr. ANDERSON: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In lines 18 and 19 strike out the general assembly may provide" and insert "provision may be made."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOTY: This proposal has been debated in this Convention more than three hours and as there seems to be no well-defined opposition to the proposal—

Mr. HOSKINS: You say this has been debated three hours?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, sir; last Friday, when the member was not here.

Mr. HALFHILL: There is an amendment injected that has not been considered by the Convention to any extent. While I am in favor of the proposal in general terms as reported by the committee I want to be heard on it.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the vote be taken finally on the passage of this proposal at eleven o'clock.

The motion was carried.

Mr. HALFHILL: In lines 24, 25 and 26 there are amendments offered now which will make that part read as follows: "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel."

Mr. PECK: That was discussed for about an hour by you and me and others.

Mr. HALFHILL: This last part of it, I think, was not part of the original proposal.

Mr. PECK: Yes; here it is in the report of the committee. That amendment was offered by Mr. Woods.

Mr. RILEY: That was incorporated in the proposal in the Judiciary committee and it has been printed three weeks and it was debated by yourself and Judge Peck thoroughly last Thursday.

Mr. HALFHILL: The whole question was debated in a general way.

Mr. PECK: The whole thing, and you debated that. You can refer to your argument and you are simply repeating that all the time now.

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; I am not. I have not yet said anything. I haven't got started and therefore I have not repeated anything.

Mr. PECK: Well, go ahead.

Mr. HALFHILL: We had a short talk by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary committee in support of that portion of the amendment, and I have here now a letter just received from a very eminent judge in our portion of the state that was written to me without any solicitation. Judge J. J. Moore of Ottawa, Ohio, has had as many years' experience on the bench as probably any judge in Ohio, and he has also been a practitioner at the bar both before and since his judicial career, and I desire to give the Convention the benefit of his observation because I consider him to be a man wise in the administration of justice. Judge Moore says:

Mr. Matthews has handed me a proposition reported by the Judiciary and Bill of Rights committee in which, if upon trial of an accused person the defendant fails to go upon the witness stand, his failure may be considered by the court and jury and made the subject of comment by counsel. I had always supposed that a party accused of crime was to be convicted by the evidence adduced by the state, and not by the comment of unscrupulous prosecuting attorneys on what might be done. You can convict an accused without sufficient evidence by loud and long appeals because the defendant did not testify. I have in my general practice both prosecuted and defended accused persons and fail to see any merit or justice in the proposition. Many defendants in criminal cases are uneducated and ignorant, and, although innocent, their counsel feel it is not safe for them to be placed upon the witness stand to be annoyed and badgered by unscrupulous prosecuting attorneys seeking to establish popularity by securing convictions.

I regard the opinion of Judge Moore, as expressed in that letter, as being of very great weight and importance.

Mr. PETTIT: Is he not a little bit partisan in his views, don't you think?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not know. He is a good Jacksonian democrat.

Mr. PECK: The letter reads as if he had in mind a case where he didn't want his client to testify.

Mr. HALFHILL: I submit that is an unjust observation, because this gentleman is not taking any active interest in the prosecution or the defense of criminals. He is an old man, but in the full possession of his intellectual powers.

Mr. PECK: He has evidently become fossilized.

Mr. HALFHILL: I am opposed to that method of injecting observations into debate, for it is not argument. In the discussion of this proposal I stated in effect that where you can strengthen the criminal procedure so that it reaches to those that belong to the criminal class, without taking away safeguards of innocent men that they ought to have and ought to be entitled to in any civilized community, I am for it.

Deposition by State, Etc., in Criminal Cases.

Mr. PECK: How can you make a law that doesn't apply to all alike?

Mr. HALFHILL: You cannot make a law that will not apply to all alike, and therefore the wise and humane declaration of the law is that it is better that ninety-nine criminals escape rather than that one innocent man be punished, and that maxim is just as true now as when it was first uttered.

Mr. MAUCK: Judge Moore's proposition seems to be that all testimony should be affirmative against the accused. Is it not true that under the present rule we have a vast amount of negative testimony used against the accused, that the man was arrested under suspicious circumstances, which should be explained?

Mr. HALFHILL: Does not that now have to appear to the jury as testimony?

Mr. MAUCK: No, not clearly, as you put it, not as a club in the hands of the state to badger an innocent person. I am just referring to Judge Moore's letter wherein he says that the testimony is affirmative and I point out that under existing rules of evidence all testimony is not affirmative and so far as that is concerned this is not an innovation.

Mr. HALFHILL: A great body of proof is not affirmative. The court instructs the jury that they can observe the witnesses, and the defendant and his demeanor and various things that go to make up a conclusion in weighing evidence. It is part of the proof but it is not testimony. Testimony, ordinarily considered, refers merely to the oral and written evidence.

Mr. WINN: What would you think of the proposition that after one has been indicted for a crime he is taken away from his family, his wife and children needing his attention, carried to California and kept for several weeks, may be for a month, against his will, in order that he might be present at the taking of the depositions?

Mr. HALFHILL: That is opening up a question we debated last week. I expressed my view at that time.

Mr. RILEY: Do you see anything of that sort in this proposal.

Mr. WINN: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not know that I can see that exactly, but I see nothing in the proposal that guards against that.

Mr. ANDERSON: The fact that the person would not come back from the foreign jurisdiction guards against it.

Mr. WINN: Did you hear the very able argument of the member of Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] insisting that this amendment is asked for in order that the prisoner may be taken out of the state?

Mr. HALFHILL: That has been part of the argument urged in favor of it. I submit that it is not because I have defended more criminals than I have prosecuted that I am opposed to this change, for, as I stated last week, I have by appointment of the court assisted the prosecuting attorney in important cases, and I try to look at the rights of the prisoner and I try to look at the rights of the state, and I want to consider the rights of all the people. I am in favor of law enforcement, but there are certain rights of the individual that must not be overridden by the state under general law.

Mr. RILEY: A point of order; the gentleman has spoken ten minutes.

Mr. PECK: The trouble is there is nobody to answer him. He is consuming all the time.

Mr. HALFHILL: That is unfortunate. But I have been shouldered into so many pockets in this Convention by other gentlemen that I just exercised my rights on this occasion.

Mr. HOSKINS: I move that the time for voting be fixed at 11:15 o'clock.

The motion was lost.

Mr. BOWDLE: Give me two minutes of your time. I want to speak a minute or so.

Mr. HALFHILL: I am not intending to occupy the time just to occupy it, but I am glad to allow other gentlemen to get in a little argument.

Mr. BOWDLE: I feel a peculiar interest in this proposal because I introduced the two lines under discussion by the member from Allen, my desire being in this Convention to help the administration of criminal justice to get ahead a little. The legal profession is very curious in this, that whenever you meet lawyers in a legal convention all weep over the archaic conditions of the criminal law and deplore tremendously the failure to convict, but when they get to a constitutional convention there is a peculiar metamorphosis. We are always met with a cry and a sob on behalf of the "weak-eyed, weak-kneed" criminal as described by the gentleman from Defiance—"taken away from his wife and his home" and who sits in a court room with a face like a cherub or a madonna—which finishes its description. Why, if you want to start a sob just commence talking where lawyers are present about the criminal.

The best argument that can be adduced for this proposal is that the whole Judiciary committee agreed that the time had come to get rid of this condition. The legal profession is in a curious position. Lawyers want to get ahead, but when you suggest something progressive their attitude reminds you of the admonition of the mother to the child: "Mother can I go out to swim?" etc. They want to get ahead, but when you suggest something tending ahead the water becomes dangerous. Here is a proposition, attacked by the gentleman from Allen, for whose opinion I have great respect, a proposition which is an effort to get rid of the old ox-cart in our criminal jurisprudence and substitute something that has rubber tires and ball-bearings to help us move down the pike towards something respectably progressive in the administration of justice. But he says let us wait, wait, and "it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape than one innocent man should be punished." I want to say, it would be a good deal better that ninety-nine criminals be convicted, and occasionally an innocent man sent up too, for it might be a good thing for a penitentiary to have a real innocent man once in a while. I want to see a system of justice that will get the ninety-nine even though in the process it occasionally convicts an innocent man. Why, his reward in heaven will be immeasurably greater.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you mean what you say?

Mr. BOWDLE: Precisely.

Deposition by the State, Etc., in Criminal Cases—Jurisdiction of Probate Court.

Mr. LAMPSON: How would you like to be that innocent man?

Mr. BOWDLE: Of course, I would not, but I tell you, gentlemen, if you are going to have a system of criminal jurisprudence that allows ninety-nine guilty men to escape you are going to have a situation that borders on anarchy.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 66, nays 33, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Henderson,	Peck,
Antrim,	Hoffman,	Peters,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 15—Mr. Riley. To submit an amendment to article I, section 10, of the constitution.—Relative to bill of rights.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 10. Except in cases of impeachment, and cases arising in the army and navy, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger, and in all offenses for which a punishment less than imprisonment in the penitentiary is provided, no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury and the number of persons to constitute such grand jury and the concurrence of what number thereof shall be necessary to find such indictment shall be determined by law.

In any trial, in any court, the party accused shall be allowed to appear and defend in person and with counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and to have a copy thereof; to meet the witnesses face to face, and to have compulsory process to procure the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed; but provision may be made by law for the taking of the deposition by the accused or by the state, to be used for or against the accused, of any witness whose attendance cannot be had at the trial, always securing to the accused the means and the opportunity to be present in person and with counsel at the taking of such deposition, and to examine the witness face to face as fully and in the same manner as if in court.

No person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel.

No person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next order of business is Proposal No. 315—Mr. Smith, of Geauga, for second reading.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. SMITH, of Geauga: In some of the counties there is a juvenile court that takes charge of all of the dependent and helpless people, old or young. In our state our constitution only provides for the probate judge's appointing guardians over minor children, etc. As has been shown from my experience, jurisdiction should be conferred in all such cases in the probate court where they have no juvenile court. In Geauga county they have such a juvenile court. I thought it was better that the probate court should be charged with the special duty of enforcing these laws, because the poor and dependent have no way of protecting themselves.

Mr. MAUCK: I do not like to be opposed to anything that the venerable member from Geauga proposes, but in lines 8 and 9 of the proposal, which repeat the language of the constitution as it now stands, you will read, in addition to the enumerated powers, "such other jurisdiction in any county, or counties, as may be provided by law." These words expressly give to the general assembly the power of increasing or altering the jurisdiction of courts. It is manifestly statutory, because expressly made so by the constitution, and it seems to me a constitutional amendment that is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. PECK: It is so manifestly useful that I think it should go everywhere and that all over the state there should be some court charged with the duty of caring for and taking charge of destitute children. I think the proposal ought to pass.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I suggest that in my opinion the general assembly has already passed a law that authorizes this?

Mr. PECK: I never heard of it.

Mr. KNIGHT: That is the present law for the entire state.

Jurisdiction of Probate Court—Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

Mr. PECK: Somebody refer me to it. If it has been passed this won't hurt.

Mr. SMITH, of Geauga: There is no such law at present.

Mr. PECK: Mr. Smith says there is no such law at present, and he is good authority on probate matters. I want to fix it that these children may be taken care of in the smaller counties as well as in the larger counties. We want it all over the state. That is a good thing.

Mr. WINN: I think the suggestion of one of the speakers was not wholly understood, so I want just a minute to comment on that. The present constitution provides, as was suggested by the member from Gallia [Mr. MAUCK], that the probate courts shall have such jurisdiction as the legislature shall provide. My county has jurisdiction in foreclosure cases, partition cases, divorce suits and other jurisdiction that does not prevail in all the counties. That is because the general assembly may confer upon any probate court just such jurisdiction as it sees fit. The supreme court held this law to which I refer to be constitutional. So, under the present provisions of the statute, the general assembly has power to do all that is sought to be done by the italicized lines in this proposal, and the italicized lines contain the new matter. The general assembly has not only authority to do it, but the general assembly has proceeded and it is the law. The probate court of Defiance county is the juvenile court; so the probate court in every county which has not a juvenile court is the juvenile court by statute. The juvenile court has authority to do everything authorized by those italicized words. It is statutory and there is no occasion for this provision.

Mr. SMITH, of Geauga: The court should be charged with the responsibility and duty of enforcing these laws with regard to these minor dependent children.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the member from Geauga [Mr. SMITH] state what is his understanding of this expression in the proposal: "Such probate court shall have jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to minors, orphan children, and all dependent persons?" Does that mean in any matter pertaining to that class? Has the court civil and criminal jurisdiction in every matter pertaining to minors, orphan children and dependent persons?

Mr. SMITH, of Geauga: In matters pertaining to those helpless people who have no one to look after them I would give the probate court jurisdiction just as in the juvenile court.

Mr. CAMPBELL: But how broad does the gentleman understand his proposal to be in that regard? What kind of matters will the court have jurisdiction of?

Mr. PECK: The last two lines explain what kind of matters. In construction you must take the whole thing together.

Mr. WATSON: I move that the proposal be tabled. The motion was carried.

Mt. STILWELL: Some two weeks ago a matter under consideration in the Convention was referred back to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. The committee was given leave to report the matter out at any time. I desire to make the report at this time.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Labor, to which was referred Substitute Proposal No. 34—Mr. Thomas, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all after the word "Proposal" and insert the following: To submit an amendment to the constitution relating to prison labor and the sale of prison made goods:

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Laws shall be passed providing for the occupation and employment of prisoners sentenced to the several penal institutions and reformatories in the state; and no person in any such penal institution or reformatory shall be required or allowed to work while under sentence thereto at any trade, industry or occupation, wherein or whereby his work, or the product or profit of his work, shall be sold, farmed out, contracted or given away; and goods made by persons under sentence to any penal institution or reformatory either within or without the state of Ohio shall not be sold within this state unless the same are conspicuously marked "Prison made". Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the general assembly from providing that convicts may work for and that the products of their labor may be disposed of to the state or any political division thereof, or for or to any public institution owned or managed and controlled by the state or any political division thereof.

Mr. THOMAS: In my former remarks, when this proposal was before the Convention, I tried to make my remarks very brief, with the idea that the membership understood this question. But I have come to the conclusion that a number of the members do not understand very much about the question. I want to be as brief as possible on the subject today, but I want to explain the provisions so that the members can understand.

Organized labor for thirty years has been trying to abolish contract prison labor in Ohio. It is not abolished yet, despite the fact that in 1892 a bill passed the legislature providing for its abolition. In 1906 a similar bill was passed and we are still fighting, trying to get contract prison labor abolished. Before I say anything on the subject I want to read a letter from the National Free Labor Association, with its headquarters at New York, composed entirely of manufacturers in New York in business competition with prison labor, and I point out to you that in New York they had the same difficulty in abolishing contract prison labor as we have had in this state:

In view of the progressive character of the majority of the delegates to the Constitutional Convention, why not make a strong fight for the passage of a constitutional amendment prohibiting contracts for convict labor or sale of convict-made goods on open market, some such provision as we have had in our state constitution since 1894?

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

And this provision which we are offering you is a copy of the New York provision except the clause about exposing prison-made goods for sale. The letter continues:

Conditions are far more favorable in Ohio for this than they were then in New York. We had legislation almost every year for years over the contract system, but it was really not killed till this constitutional provision put it out of the power of the legislature to revive the abuse. We earnestly hope you will give this suggestion your consideration.

Now on the matter of competition I want to call the attention of the members of the Convention to the fact that in the year 1910, the latest reports that we have on the contract prison labor in Ohio, there were manufactured $1,878,029.58 of goods in Ohio. The wages paid for making these goods was $262,104.62. You can look over the census report, or the reports of any manufacturing industry in Ohio or any other part of the country, and you will not find any such proportion that is paid for the value of the product of labor. The census report shows about one-tenth—one-fourth to one-tenth—and it is no wonder that the contract system is opposed by both labor and capital.

A question has been raised that this is purely a legislative matter. I want to call your attention to the fact that if congress acts on the matter it is still necessary that our constitution should retain some provision, so as to conform to the bill that has passed the house of representatives and will pass the senate at this session. This bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all goods, wares and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part by convict labor, or in any prison or reformatory, transported into any state or territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival and delivery in such state or territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares and merchandise had been manufactured in such state and territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in original packages or otherwise.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is, Shall the proposal pass?

Mr. DOTY: I offer an amendment correcting some words:

In line ten strike out "the general assembly from" and insert "the passage of laws to".

In line 11 strike out "providing" and insert "provide".

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I ventured a few remarks on this proposal on this original presentation. It was referred back to the committee with the privilege to report when they secured recognition, and the substitute is before us now.

The member from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] has called attention to the fact that a bill is being attempted in congress that is expected to break down the barrier which is supposed to be interposed by that provision of the constitution which prohibits interference with interstate commerce as I understand it. Now I am wholly of the opinion, as I was two weeks ago, that this is a legislative matter. I think it would be ample time for the legislature of Ohio to deal with it when the federal congress has provided in fact, and not in anticipation, for our handling the convict labor goods of other states. The question in its essence is not changed in any degree by the alteration of the wording. All of the original clause still remains. I always did object a little to gentlemen who represented organized labor posing as leaders in this particular movement, because I do not think they represent all the labor there is in the country. I have never heard of any of them objecting to the use of prison labor in agriculture. They suggested the other day that that could be done without interfering with anybody. There are probably other things, but any of them will interfere with some man's work, because no work can be found that honest men cannot do and will not do. I do not want to curtail the debate and I don't want to move to lay on the table because I presume there are others who want to speak.

Mr. McCLELLAND: I spoke two weeks ago against this proposal and I don't see how anybody can speak in favor of it now. Look at that provision preceding the first semicolon. As it appeared in the proposal book it was a prohibition of contract labor. Now there are some things that I oppose. I do not oppose the prohibition of convict labor, but unless we are more cruel than even capital punishment we must give them something to do. The first part of the sentence provides that the legislature shall furnish something for them to do, but after the first semicolon it provides that "no person in any such penal institution or reformatory shall be required or allowed to work while under sentence thereto at any trade, industry or occupation wherein or whereby his work, or the product or profit of his work, shall be sold." Now if he can't do any of those things—

Mr. THOMAS: Read the rest.

Mr. McCLELLAND: It is not necessary to read the rest.

Mr. THOMAS: Yes; it is.

Mr. McCLELLAND: It provides it shall not be sold, farmed out, contracted or given away. Now if you cannot part with the product by selling it, what is the use? The next part of it, "And goods made by persons under sentence to any penal institution or reformatory either within or without the state of Ohio shall not be sold within this state unless the same are conspicuously marked 'prison made'." You have already provided that you can't sell the product of the labor. What is the need of marking it "prison made" if you prohibit the selling of it? If you cannot sell the product of his labor, why are you going to mark it prison made? It seems to me that the two parts of the proposal are contradictory.

Mr. HARTE, of Stark: Could we not use those prisoners out of doors in agricultural pursuits, and couldn't we have state farms?

Mr. McCLELLAND: No doubt.

Mr. HARTE, of Stark: There is on doubt that they interfere with the product of legitimate manufactures?

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

Mr. McCLELLAND: There is no doubt of that, but any labor interferes with competition. We farmers are willing to bear our share if the penitentiary can be moved outside of the city and produce vegetables and farm products, but so long as that is not possible we see no objection to their coming in competition with some other trade-union besides the farmers.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: Do you think penitentiary labor would interfere with agriculture if a good portion of it were used in that line?

Mr. McCLELLAND: Just to the extent it was used. Just whatever of the labor of the convict is used on the farm—whatever he produces—that doesn't have to be bought from outside people.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: Is there any competition there? Don't we come in competition with the great West?

Mr. McCLELLAND: Yes; we cannot eliminate competition.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: This is not a question that I expect to demonstrate or anything of that kind, but I am going to ask you whether the employment of all of our prisoners, say 5,000 prisoners in the state of Ohio, would make any particular difference to the farmers of Ohio—whether we don't have to contend with the great West and other parts of the country in competition with free labor, not prison labor—whether that doesn't injure the farming interests of the state of Ohio much more than the employment of part of our prisoners would?

Mr. McCLELLAND: As I understand the gentleman from Stark, he objects to competition in manufacturing industry by our convicts and yet thinks it does not affect at all the competition of the farmer. I don't know how much it would; I can't tell how much it would, but it would come in competition and there is no doubt about that.

Mr. THOMAS: Does not the member understand that this section applies to goods manufactured outside of the state and sold in Ohio? The proposal provides that there can be no goods manufactured for sale on the open market in Ohio, so that there is no competition so far as that is concerned. It is all manufactured for state use. The other provision is against the sale of prison-made goods unless marked "prison made," and there are more goods sold from outside the state of Ohio, convict made, than are manufactured in Ohio, because manufacturers make it their business to sell in other states than in their own states.

Mr. McCLELLAND: I am sorry, but I don't think that explanation explains. Then after the second semicolon the design is to prevent the importation of prison-made goods from outside of the state unless distinctly marked so that objection to the other provision does not entirely obtain as to this. It seems to me that that thing should be straightened out and made plain.

Mr. TALLMAN: I will offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out of line 6 the word "sold".

Mr. TALLMAN: The idea is not to prevent the sale of goods made in the penitentiary, but to prevent the selling or farming out of the labor of the convicts.

Mr. THOMAS: I move that that amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. KRAMER: I would rather like to vote for a proposition like this, but I do not want to put any provision into this constitution that is so absolutely uncertain as to its meaning. If this provision is adopted I doubt whether either the products of prison labor or the prisoners themselves can be employed on the roads, and if there is anything that I think prison labor should be used at it is on the roads. "And no person in any such penal institution or reformatory shall be required or allowed to work while under sentence thereto at any trade, industry or occupation, wherein or whereby his work, or the product or profit of his work, shall be sold, farmed out, contracted or given away." Suppose we were to employ the labor of a particular penal institution in manufacturing the products for our roads; suppose the state wanted to give the product of those prisoners to a contractor or it was to be sold to a contractor to be used upon the roads, how could we do it with that provision in our constitution?

Mr. THOMAS: Back of the insane asylum in the quarries the state at present is quarrying material for good roads under the Wertz law and Franklin county is buying that.

Mr. KRAMER: Suppose you put this in the constitution and the question is brought before the court as to whether they can manufacture that, and the Wertz law is before the court, what will the court say?

Mr. THOMAS: This enforces the provision and makes it continuous. Read the last clause.

Mr. KRAMER: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the passage of laws to provide that convicts may work for and that the product of their labor may be disposed of to the state or any political division thereof, or for or to any public institution owned or managed and controlled by the state or any political division thereof." It is the state. The state has the convict, and suppose the state desires to get that material into the hands of some contractor. The state cannot build the roads. It must build the roads through a contractor. The state is manufacturing material by prison labor. Now if the state manufactures the material and cannot give the material away or sell the material to any contractor, pray tell me how that material is going to get on the roads.

Mr. THOMAS: Every county will buy material direct from the state and the contractor will contract for the labor.

Mr. KRAMER: The only way that this can be done at all is either to make the state or county go into the business of building roads. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred neither the state nor the county can go into the business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Could not the state itself build a road in this way: The state asks for bids on five miles of state roads and says that the bids must exclude the stone. Would not that be a simple proposition?

Mr. KRAMER: What does the state do? The state gives the contractor the stone?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I think this clause would not prevent that.

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor—Buying and Selling of Farm Products.

Mr. KRAMER: If we could see that the product of prison labor could be used on such roads—I don't see how it is.

Mr. DUNN: I have been highly honored by the president by being made a member of the Labor committee although I am a farmer and a preacher. The laboring men have no better friend in the state of Ohio than myself. I know what it is to labor and this Convention wants, I am sure, to be a reform convention, and we should be anxious to do any thing we can in a just way to help labor. I do not need to argue that the contract system in the prisons of this country has been degrading to a great degree in some states and it ought to be abolished. We ought to find some way by which the laboring men of this state must not be in any way degraded by being compelled to work against the contract system in the penitentiary or against convict labor. It seems to me there is a very plain road out of this trouble. I heard it said that it is impossible to have these convicts work without coming in competition with some form of labor. Suppose that under our present plan of building roads in Ohio we go forward under a bond issue and build the roads in the regular way, will there not be a great many roads in the state of Ohio that cannot be built in this way and that will not be built? Why not employ the convicts of the state of Ohio in building those roads that cannot be built in any other way? How can there be any competition in such a case? The farmers need the roads, the whole state of Ohio will be greatly blessed if you will put the convicts on the roads, and I am sure that the legislature can find some plan to set the convicts at work.

Mr. ULMER: I move the previous question. The main question was ordered.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 34—Mr. Thomas. To submit an amendment to the constitution, relating to prison labor and the sale of prison-made goods.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Laws shall be passed providing for the occupation and employment of prisoners sentenced to the several penal institutions and reformatories of the state; and no person in any such penal institution or reformatory shall be required or allowed to work while under sentence thereto at any trade, industry or occupation, wherein or whereby his work, or the product or profit of his work, shall be sold, farmed out, contracted or given away; and goods made by persons under sentence to any penal institution or reformatory, either within or without the state of Ohio, shall not be sold within this state unless the same are conspicuously marked "Prison made". Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the passage of laws to provide that convicts may work for and that the products of their labor may be disposed of to the state or any political division thereof, or for or to any public institution owned or managed and controlled by the state or any political division thereof.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next proposal in order is Proposal No. 152—Mr. Brown, of Highland. The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: This proposal is in the interest of cheaper living to the people of the cities. Legislatures and presidents and governors and kings all over the world are now instituting investigations as to the reason for the increased cost of living and the general consensus of opinion is that the price of things to eat depends upon the expensiveness of distribution. Investigating upon my own part the elements of the high price of distribution, I have discovered that every city in Ohio almost, and every town of any respectable size, has passed an ordinance in the interest of organized dealers in the villages prohibiting in effect anything like free trade in the products of the table. When I went to see the solicitor in Columbus and asked him for the ordinance he said, "If you cut that out you will do more to cheapen the price of the table than anything that has been done in this state." The solicitor told me that a few weeks ago, and I also learned at the same time that there was so much money made in the distribution of farm products to the housewives of this city that the persons who have the right under the authority of the city to occupy the stalls in the markets have sublet those stalls, in some instances, at a premium of $3,000 annually. The price at which they distribute it is absolutely exorbitant contrasted with the price to the producer.

Buying and Selling of Farm Products.

Mr. MAUCK: Does this proposal prohibit the municipalities from charging for the stalls?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No, sir. It permits people to distribute articles of food without having to pay for the privilege to do it. In our town we have three meat dealers and forty-eight hundred consumers. We have an ordinance that will prevent a farmer coming in with meat to sell unless he has raised it himself, and the prohibition consists in an ordinance charging him $15 per day.

Mr. MAUCK: Why does not Hillsboro repeal its ordinance, if it does not want it?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Because it is controlled by persons who are not interested in the welfare of the general consumer.

Mr. MAUCK: Do you seriously contend that a constitutional convention of the state of Ohio ought to do what you think might be done and ought to be done by the village council of Hillsboro?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I think if all the village councils in the state of Ohio refused to do it some constitutional convention or some central power, in the interest of the consumer and in the interest of bringing down the high price of living, should force them to do it.

Mr. KING: Will not this proposal prevent the passage of such an ordinance as requiring inspection of butter and eggs and milk and other food products?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No, sir. Now I want to read something from a publication in Baltimore. It is headed "Public Ownership of Public Markets:"

A week after the appearance in this journal of a comprehensive article describing the profits of direct selling certain persons made an offer to the city of Baltimore for its market houses. The article described these particular markets because Baltimore is the only city that has an exclusively municipal system by which the farmers may drive into market and sell their own produce. A thousand of them do it every week. There were a few mild criticisms, mainly about the lax management, the need of more cleanliness, and the evils of private control of stalls. The persons mentioned offered a large sum and pledged the building of new market houses of the finest type.

If, however, they regarded themselves as philanthropists they were soon undeceived. The people rose in protest. The market men and those who dealt with the market men, the farmers and the customers of the farmers, declared in no uncertain language that they objected. The feeling was so strong that no public official or politician dared to give the offer serious consideration. At the very time when the need of public markets is being so strenuously urged it is gratifying to know that those who enjoy the advantages of such markets are willing to fight for them.

A farmer will come to Columbus to distribute his goods for fifteen per cent profit. The organized dealers make from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five per cent profit for the distribution to the consumer. Now I leave this matter with you. I do not care personally whether you pass it or not. It is in the interest of cheaper living for the people and that was my object. So far as I am concerned I am a grocer in addition to some other things. I have a half interest in a house that is a member of an organized society of dealers in my town and when we pass this proposal my house will suffer, but I am doing this in the interest of the consumer, because I am thoroughly convinced of the necessity and good of it. I have watched it for years and I have concluded that the real trouble is in the distribution. I have been a distributor and I know what it costs to distribute.

Mr. ELSON: Will not this be a great advantage to farmers who wish to market their products?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: It certainly will be, because when the farmer has his own market, he can deliver the goods at any time he pleases. Otherwise he must sell to an organized dealer whenever the organized dealer pleases. The consumer here has the opportunity to buy direct from the farmer without the added cost of organized distribution.

Mr. DOTY: I live in a city where we do not have any trouble in running our own affairs.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Cleveland, I want to say, is the only city in Ohio that does not prohibit by ordinance the free distribution of her food products.

Mr. DOTY: We must draw a line somewhere. We have been doing almost everything and now we are asked to be a city council. The city council of Hillsboro could attend to this matter if they wanted to. I therefore move that the proposal be tabled.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: How is that in order? I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT: The president understood that the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. DOTY: He had and I was recognized. But it makes no difference.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I don't care whether this passes or not, but I know it is in the interest of the people and I know that a man who votes against it votes against a very worthy measure. I move the previous question and demand the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has not the floor to make the motion.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is out of order.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Why is the motion out of order?

The PRESIDENT: The motion to table had been made.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: But he hadn't the floor to make that motion. I think the president inadvertently recognized him by nodding at him.

The PRESIDENT: The president will say that the motion was made to table and we will now take the vote on it.

The yeas and nays were demanded, but the president took a vote on a division and the motion to table was lost by 38 yeas and 41 nays.

The PRESIDENT: That illustrates how the time of this Convention will be saved if members will not needlessly demand the roll call.

Buying and Selling of Farm Products.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I see. Now I demand the previous question.

The PRESIDENT: The president would like to recognize the member from Williams before that motion is put.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Mr. President: I hope this amended proposal, No. 152, will not pass. The proposal was first referred to the committee on Agriculture, and after thorough consideration by the committee its indefinite postponement was unanimously recommended, but before the report could be presented to the Convention the author of the proposal, who had been given every opportunity to be heard and who was heard by the committee, asked to have the committee discharged from its further consideration. The proposal was again referred to the committee on Agriculture with the understanding that it would be amended by the author and then considered by the committee and reported back to the Convention. No such proceeding took place, but instead the author of the proposal asked the committee to report it back to the Convention with the recommendation that it be referred to the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights. The argument was made before the committee on Agriculture that the adoption of this proposal would reduce the cost of living and that it would be in the interest of both the farmer and the consumer. In my opinion it would be detrimental to both these classes, but before I enter into a discussion along that line I wish to say that there is absolutely no necessity for this amendment to the constitution. Everyone in this Convention knows that the legislature has full authority to pass such a law, not only in regard to the sale of foodstuffs, but also in regard to the sale of all other products of commerce. There is now a first-class law on the statute books in regard to this subject. Why should this proposal, both in its original as well as in its amended form, refer only to the products of the farm? It looks as if the author wishes to curry favor with the farmers. Let us examine the language of the proposal: "The business of buying, selling or handling foodstuffs shall not be subjected to any license or other charge by any municipality." Why not strike out "foodstuffs" and insert "any article of merchandise?" Notice the clause, "Shall not be subjected to any license or other charge by any municipality." That means that there shall absolutely be no inspection or regulation whatever in regard to the sale of foodstuffs, but the sale of other products might be regulated. Why hold out this pretended sop to the farmers of Ohio? Why attempt to curry favor with them by means of an absurdity like this? There is an excellent law in regard to this subject at present. I refer to section 3672 of the General Code, which, among other things, provides for licensing hawkers, peddlers, auctioneers of horses and other stock, and which reads in part as follows: "But no municipal corporation may require of the owner of any products of his own raising or the manufacture of any article manufactured by him, license to vend or sell in any way by himself or agent any such article or product."

There is no demand for this proposed amendment to the constitution and if it is made a part of the constitution it can do no good, but on the other hand it will have a tendency to weaken or destroy the pure-food laws of the state. The farmer can now sell the products of his farm in any market in Ohio without a license or any other restriction whatever, and in that respect he is placed alongside of the manufacturer, who has the same privilege. This gives the farmer an opportunity to sell direct to the consumer if he desires to do so, and this enables him to get the best market price and at the same time furnish the consumer with fresh products direct from the farm. But why should farm products—foodstuffs, if you please—many of which deteriorate rapidly, be sold by the farmer to an irresponsible stranger and that buyer be permitted to sell them in any village or city in this state without any restrictions whatever, simply because such articles are "foodstuffs?" Such a result would be absolutely preposterous. It would be worse than that, it would be a crime, and I for one shall not be a party to it. A person does not need a very active imagination to suppose a case like this: I am very busy on my farm; along comes a stranger and I sell my first-class butter, eggs and vegetables. He gathers more of this class of goods together and in a day or two takes them to the village or city and sells them without any restrictions whatever, simply because they are products of the farm. That is absolutely wrong and I think that every member of this Convention knows it to be so.

But suppose that my conclusions are wrong and that such things should be permitted. Even then this proposed amendment should not pass, as it is not needed. All of this can be done under the present constitution. Why cripple the efficiency of the dairy and food department of the state, which has done the producer and the consumer more good than any other department of the state government? The legislature has full authority at present to make all necessary provisions for the buying and selling, not only of farm products, but of all other articles of merchandise. Good and wholesome laws have been passed and will be passed in the future for the protection of the farmer and the consumer. Every voter is a consumer of farm products and it is his desire to have these products clean and fresh and as cheap as he can get them, so far as is consistent with the public good. The farmer does not come to this Convention asking for special favors; all he wants is justice. This proposal will not give him even that. The legislature of Ohio passed a law protecting the farmer and the manufacturer against the irresponsible dealer and now it is proposed by this amendment to deprive the farmer of that protection under the guise that it will be a benefit to him. If this amendment prevails the farmer personally, or through his responsible agent, will be compelled to compete with the irresponsible, unknown huckster, who can sell in competition with him without any restriction whatever. I hope that this proposal will not pass.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?" The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 28, nays 68, as follows:

So the proposal was lost.

The Convention then recessed on motion of Mr. Doty until 1:30 o'clock this afternoon.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess and was called to order by the president.

The PRESIDENT: Proposal No. 240 has been read and the question is, "Shall the proposal pass?"

Mr. Anderson was recognized.

Mr. DOTY: What are the rights of the gentleman in the debate? He has spoken once on the measure and time is very precious.

The PRESIDENT: He has fifteen minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: This matter was before you once a few days ago, but at that time in the hurry of trying to get everything off the calendar this was put upon the table and it was afterwards taken from the table. It is Substitute Proposal No. 240. It reads as follows:

The right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall not be abrogated and such damages shall not be subjected to any statutory limitation as to amount, but the recovery must be for the full amount of all damages so sustained.

The committee recommends its passage and it is signed by Judge Peck, Mr. Stilwell, Judge Winn, Mr. Leete, Mr. Cassidy, Mr. Brown, Judge Smith, Mr. Tetlow, Judge King and Mr. Kilpatrick.

Mr. TAGGART: What is the force and effect of the words "shall not be abrogated"? Would that affect the employers' compensation law?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir. I am glad you asked the question. New York put into her constitution in 1894, article I, section 18, those exact words. The general assembly passed what was a workmen's compensation law. That was then taken to the court of last resort and there declared unconstitutional, but the question that you have raised was entirely disregarded by everyone connected with the case. In other words, no one believed that this provision in the New York constitution in any way prevented a workmen's compensation law, but the workmen's compensation law was declared unconstitutional by reason of the federal constitution. However, I am perfectly willing that any amendment should be made if there is any question about it.

Mr. TAGGART: Would it not be sufficient and better if the words "shall not be abrogated" were stricken out? Would not that permit compensation to employees?

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to suggest that there is more constitutional authority for Proposal No. 240 than for any other proposal that has come before the Convention. State after state has since that put this proposal in their constitutions and besides those states there are others that have similar laws. Pennsylvania since 1873 has had this provision. New York since 1894.

Now I do not care to answer any more questions. I want to cover this matter in the time I have to do it in.

In the first place, the right to recover for wrongful death does not exist in common law. It is entirely created by statute. Consequently, I presume that was in the minds of the constitution makers when they placed these words preventing the abrogation of the rights of recovery for wrongful death in the constitution.

Now, in reference to the limitation clause. In 1851 the legislature of Ohio provided that the limit for recovery for wrongful death should be $5,000. That remained the same until 1872, when the legislature increased it to $10,000. You must remember that it does not mean so many dollars shall be given to the widow and the children for a husband or father wrongfully killed, but it means that they shall receive a certain number of bushels of potatoes, barrels of flour, stuff to live on. It means schooling for the children.

As the purchasing power of a dollar decreased, the amount, although it may remain the same, decreases, because it means fewer bushels of potatoes, fewer barrels of flour, fewer school books and not such a good place to live in, and the object of this statute is to prevent the children of men wrongfully killed from becoming public charges. After all, it falls back on society. The question comes up, What protection would they have? It would be the same protection as in the other states where they have like provisions. They have found not a detriment a like provision in the constitution of New York, where they have a great many more men employed and consequently more deaths happen, and if it is not a hardship there, there would not come any hardship in Ohio.

Mr. WATSON: Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: Not now. I did not get through the other day because I yielded to so many questions.

The point I want to demonstrate under the laws of Ohio is that no hardship can arrive; I mean with the limitation being taken off. You try your case before the jury. We will assume that the jury cannot be trusted. We will assume that the jury by reason of sympathy and prejudice will not be fair and they will return an excess-

Damage for Wrongful Death.

sive amount. Under our statutes it is provided that if an amount indicates passion or prejudice the judge must give a new trial, and if the common pleas judge fails to do his duty it goes to three learned gentlemen who constitute the circuit court now, or, under Judge Peck's proposal, the court of appeals. Those three cannot be influenced by any passion or prejudice. They have a right to give a new trial and the common pleas judge has a right, if he thinks the amount is too large and that it indicates prejudice—he is supposed to deal justly with both sides, and he can cut down the amount to any figure he pleases. Then it can go to the court of appeals where the three judges are sitting. Two of them may cut down the verdict of the jury that is influenced by passion or prejudice if they conclude that it is too large, and they can cut it down to any figure they want. I maintain that is all the protection the individual gets and it is all the protection any corporation ought to have. No harm can come under the many safeguards—and I ask pardon of a certain gentleman for using the word—under certain safeguards now always present without any limitation being fixed. Now let me give you what the jury must take into consideration: "In arriving at the total amount of damage in such cases, the jury should consider the pecuniary injury to each separate beneficiary, not found guilty of contributory negligence, but the verdict should be for a gross sum, not exceeding ten thousand dollars."

In other words, the jury must take into consideration, where the husband or father has been killed, the loss to the widow, and in determining that they consider the amount of money he was making, etc. Then the jury, under the authority I have read, must take into consideration the loss in money to each one of his children. Say there were eight children; that would make nine people who have lost by reason of the wrongful killing of the father, and under the authority of 55 O. S. the jury takes all of them into consideration and must return a verdict for a gross amount. I insist, under that authority, if you please, the amount of $12,000, as the law is today, when you take into consideration the high cost of living, is ridiculously small.

Mr. WATSON: You said something about the loss going back upon society. Is not that the right place for the loss to fall?

Mr. ANDERSON: On society?

Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: The reason I am in favor of workmen's compensation laws is this: If the husband or father is killed and if the widow is strong enough to make a living at the washtub for her family and herself, then the whole burden of the loss falls upon the family. If, on the other hand, she cannot make a living for herself and children, the widow and the children become public charges and all burden falls upon the innocent public. Under workmen's compensation laws and proper liability laws the burden falls upon the corporation, and if it does not fall upon the corporation, if they choose to put it back on the consumer, it falls upon those who purchase from the corporation. The burden must fall somewhere. It falls on the family, the community, the corporation or upon those who buy the products of the corporation.

Mr. WATSON: The gentleman misunderstood the point of the question. I was looking toward the latter end—that is, the expense of running the manufacturing establishment, including the loss of life, goes out on society as a whole.

Mr. ANDERSON: It goes out on the consumer.

Mr. KERR: I understand you to say this proposal permits the court to set aside a verdict?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; they have that authority now. I will read it to you.

Mr. KERR: I would suggest that that be added at the end.

Mr. ANDERSON: It wouldn't interfere with any of the rights of the jury or judge now, and they have ample power to protect everybody.

Mr. CRITES: Mr. Anderson seems always to be calling attention to corporations. We are not all corporations doing business in this state and they are not all big corporations who are doing business. This Proposal No. 240 has in it no limitation. It says that the amount of recovery shall not be subject to statutory limitations. Take some small manufacturing concern, organized by a man of small means. Say a man has been working twenty or thirty years and he has made $5,000 or $10,000. He goes into a manufacturing business and after running a few weeks he may have an accident, not from his own negligence, but still the case may be decided against the manufacturer, and it will take every dollar that man has earned for twenty or thirty years. It would bankrupt him. I don't think that we should put everything through that comes up here against the manufacturers. The manufacturers have not come in here and asked a single thing up to this time, and there have been labor proposals put through entirely against the manufacturer. The manufacturer said nothing. I think this is a wrong proposal to be put in the constitution and I hope the delegates will help out the manufacturers by tabling this proposal. I move that this proposal be laid on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

So the motion to table was lost.

Mr. WINN: Gentlemen of the Convention: I, along with ten or eleven other members of the Judiciary committee, after a thorough consideration of this question recommended the passage of this proposal. I heard some little discussion of the proposition on the floor of this Convention since then and I have heard some discussion elsewhere. So far nothing has been said that causes me to change the opinion I entertained at that time, and I shall briefly state my reasons for favoring the proposal. I do not regard the provisions of this proposal that have attracted the closest attention as of much importance. The proposal is that the general assembly may not limit by statutory provisions the amount of recovery. I believe that the statutory limit is now $10,000 in case of death. I do not regard the constitutional provision against such limitation as of such great importance, but the statute also provides that one suing in case of death may recover for the actual pecuniary loss and nothing more.

A case was lately decided in the common pleas court growing out of the wrongful death of a young man who was nineteen years of age. Under the rule that obtains, the amount of recovery to the father suing on behalf of himself and of the brothers and sisters of the deceased was $200. That was the amount of the actual pecuniary loss they were able to show. Just a few days afterwards I tried a case growing out of an assault. One man struck another and knocked a tooth out and precisely the same amount was given.

A DELEGATE: Your client had the best lawyer.

Mr. WINN: No, it was not that. I brought an action against a railroad company for wrongful death of a young girl of Putnam county. She was eighteen or nineteen years old and attending the high school in the village of Continental, living a few miles out in the country. The death was wrongful and the alleged negligence was on the part of the Clover Leaf Railroad in backing a train, which resulted in her death. The case was moved to the federal court and knowing what I would be against, in the face of the rule that my client could recover for the next of kin the actual pecuniary damage and no more, I was obliged to take $300 in settlement. I was glad to forego charging the usual fee in the case.

I am here to say it is wrong for the legislature to pass any statute saying that in case of wrongful death the party suing for the beneficiaries can recover only actual pecuniary loss; and for that reason this proposal becomes a proper subject of organic law. It is a province of the Constitutional Convention to put into the organic law those things which it believes the legislature should not do. Therefore I hope that this proposal will be adopted.

Mr. JONES: What is there about this proposal that abrogates this rule about which you have been speaking, limiting the recovery to actual pecuniary loss?

Mr. WINN: I say the legislature should not be able to enact a law limiting the amount of recovery.

Mr. JONES: Is it limited now?

Mr. WINN: Yes; it is confined to actual pecuniary loss.

Mr. JONES: Has not that always been the law?

The vice president here assumed the chair.

Mr. WINN: No, sir; it has not. It is a statutory provision and it should be actual damage, not measured in dollars and cents only. Let me give you another concrete case. Today Judge Roehm told me of an instance where he brought a suit growing out of the killing of a little child eight or nine years old, and the only ground upon which that mother could recover anything at all was that she was able to prove at the trial that her little child each morning carried a pail of milk to a customer, thus earning two or three cents. Had it not been for that little service she would not have recovered anything.

Mr. HALFHILL: There is a number of things that happen in society for which there is not and cannot be any redress. There can be no redress for the bereavement following the loss of a relative. It is mere sentimentalism to argue on that point.

This is so plainly statutory that I do not think it should pass. The legislature now has fixed the amount at $10,000. It is perfectly competent for the legislature to fix the amount of $20,000 or $30,000, in which event a good portion of the argument about decreasing the purchasing power of a dollar would vanish by action of the legislature. This is so plainly a statutory right, fully existing and provided for under the present constitution, that I can see no reason whatever, and I have not been furnished with any valid reason, why it should be put into the constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you permit me a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: Not until I get through. I have not the time. When you start into a manufacturing business, whether you are an individual or a big corporation, one of the fixed expenses incident to that business is the carrying of all kinds of insurance that you can get. One of this kind frequently carried is casualty insurance. What insurance company can write casualty insurance except at an exorbitant premium, where there is no limit to the possible liability? It is argued there is a limit against excessive liability because of the power of the court to cut down verdicts.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you permit a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: Not until I get through with my argument, for the time is limited. What court would have the courage to cut down verdicts to a point where they correspond with the actual damages incurred? Now the situation is this, that under the existing statute that rule of law permitting a court to reduce the verdict, quoted by the gentleman on the other side, plainly does obtain; but I should like to know what court there is in the state of Ohio that would have courage enough to cut down a verdict that was rendered in a case of wrongful death, when there was not any statute in the state of Ohio that fixed any limitation, and when the fundamental law said there should not be any? What court would have the courage to do that; and furthermore, what court would have any right to do it when you change the fundamental law upon which those rules rest which say that the court can cut down the verdict? Then you take out the foundation of the rule and another rule obtains. Now I think there is no question that my interpretation is correct of what the rights of the courts under such a new rule would be, and that the old rule immediately vanishes and would be supplanted by the constitutional inhibition.

Damage for Wrongful Death.

Another thing: This question of workmen's compensation laws is a new thing in this country. It was met and settled twenty-five years ago in Continental Europe, and there is not a state in this Union up to this time that has passed a full, free, comprehensive workmen's compensation law which is on the line of what they have done in Continental Europe, save and except perhaps the state of Washington. All the rest are experiments. The whole theory and basis of workmen's compensation laws are that there is a fund created which shall be administered as an insurance fund, and it is intended that the injured workmen or bereaved family shall be able to apply to the commissioners of that fund direct and be paid direct according to a fixed, ascertained and definite schedule, so as to obviate all civil court procedure. That is the correct theory of an approved workmen's compensation law. Now in the state of New York the workmen's compensation law passed there conflicted with the constitution and it was declared void by the courts, not however by reason of a conflict with the original of this proposal, which the author of the proposal says is practically taken from the constitution of New York. But I call your attention to the fact that under workmen's compensation laws the commissioners that control that fund have to be governed by the same theory that casualty insurance companies are governed by, and they have premiums of a certain amount in certain kinds of factories, according to the class of the risk. Where the risk is great, the premium would be higher; where the risk was less, the premium would be less, so that you absolutely throw down the bars so far as safeguards are concerned and take away the foundation rule which permits the court at the present to cut down verdicts if excessive, and you have established a rule whereby the commissioners of the workmen's compensation fund are not able to figure and to make a right premium. I don't know whether or not that objection has occurred to any of those gentlemen advocating this proposal, but I submit it now for the careful consideration of all of you. I contend that you are so arranging the constitution that there cannot be a perfect workmen's compensation law passed.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not know that the more corporations go into the workmen's fund or under workmen's compensation laws the more drastic the liability laws are, and consequently every act of this kind is a benefit to workmen's compensation laws instead of a detriment?

Mr. HALFHILL: I expect and hope that we shall live to see the time when there will be the most thorough and approved kind of a workmen's compensation law in effect in the state of Ohio, and that it will be so thorough that every corporation and every body employing workmen will have to come under the operation of that law. That is a thing that I am in favor of unreservedly. I hope the time will come when it will be impossible for any casualty insurance to be written on any factory in Ohio, and that the law of the land will be broad enough so that all casualties will be taken care of under that law.

Mr. ANDERSON: You stated a while ago that the rate in industrial casualty insurance would go up to such an extent that it couldn't be taken. Don't you know that in Pennsylvania and New York the rates are not way up?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not know that and I don't care.

Mr. ANDERSON: Why did you argue it?

Mr. HALFHILL: I argued it for this, if anybody has wit enough to follow it: I took the insurance law as the premise upon which to base the argument for the workmen's compensation law.

Mr. ANDERSON: "Another question.

Mr. HALFHILL: Not until I finish this — because that is necessary. You have to observe the very same rule in administering the workmen's compensation law as a casualty company uses now in fixing its casualty rate, and we haven't got that kind of workmen's compensation law now in Ohio; and what I am arguing or intending to argue is that this in my judgment conflicts with the workings of an approved workmen's compensation law. Now if the worthy proponent cannot in some way amend it to meet that objection, I cannot bring myself to think that it should pass.

Mr. ANDERSON: Here is an amendment that will meet that objection. Now just one other question: You stated if this became part of the constitution of the state of Ohio then the common pleas judge or the higher court would not cut down the amount. Do you not know that in Pennsylvania and New York and in every other state, and there are many that have similar provisions in the constitution, the judges there just as freely cut down a verdict rendered by a jury as in any other state?

Mr. HALFHILL: You cite no authorities, but are stating matters that I do not know anything about.

Mr. ANDERSON: I thought you did not.

Mr. HALFHILL: And it is easy to deal in general principles and make general statements, but I do say that the authorities in Ohio which you have cited and to which I am directing attention, will vanish, because the foundation for these authorities will be removed, and they will be supplanted by the direct inhibition of the fundamental law.

Mr. BOWDLE: I expect to assist this provision with my vote. I should like to see a man made more valuable in human society than mere property. Today in the state of Ohio it is far more profitable for a negligent corporation to kill a man outright than to injure him. It is said by the distinguished member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] that damages cannot be given for sentiment. That is not in my judgment technically true. The law is a very curious science. Occasionally you see it and occasionally you do not. If there is anybody here who does not believe that the law does not give damages based on sentiment let him, if he be unmarried, engage himself to a young woman and then proceed to break the engagement. He will find a heavy charge given to the jury that this young woman is to be compensated for her trousseau and for her lacerated affection and for her outraged feelings. She must be compensated for the damage to her prospects in life, and Damage for Wrongful Death.

I can assure that young man that a huge section of his fortune will be transferred from him.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not know that that rule does not apply in personal injury cases?

Mr. BOWDLE: When you come to a personal injury case involving death sentiment counts for nothing. The loss to society is counted for naught. Only pecuniary loss counts. I have a little girl at home, ten years old. If the traction company were to kill her I could not recover anything. Sentiment goes for nothing except in a breach of promise case. I should like to see some kind of rule of reason adopted in cases of personal injury causing death; but if my little girl were killed I couldn't recover one cent. I could not ask the court to charge the jury that the jury should take into consideration the fact that I have cared for that daughter from infancy and for ten years, and that the average cost would be $200 a year.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not know that the circuit court of Lucas county held that a judgment for $1,000 for a girl nine years old was not excessive and sustained the verdict?

Mr. BOWDLE: I never heard of it, but I take your word for it. I think we should see to it that this proposal is incorporated in the constitution so that those who are left may in some fair way be compensated for those who have been taken away. Under the present condition it would be very much more profitable for a motorman busily engaged in serving his employers, whenever he saw there was no reasonable chance for one imperilled to escape, to turn on power and kill the person rather than injure him. I do not believe that the present law is what it ought to be, and I feel that everyone who is in favor of justice ought to support this proposal.

Mr. KING: I cannot support the proposal in the form in which it now stands. My objections to it are several. In the first place, there is nothing in it that is not purely statutory and which the legislature can not take care of.

In the second place, resorting, as we naturally do, to our experiences, I say that so far as my personal experience reaches, which is only thirty-nine years in the practice of the law, I have prosecuted innumerable cases of personal injury and defended almost as many more; I have listened to the hearing and reading of records in almost as many more, and I never have known a case in which the jury went to the present statutory limit in case of a death. I have heard of a great many cases in the larger cities, and usually damages given by the jury are higher there than those given in the country. So I say there is no necessity for it.

In the third place, I say that this provision, as written by the proposer, will interfere with workmen's compensation laws in another manner than that stated by the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALPHILL]. It provides that the right to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall not be subject to any statutory limitation as to the amount of recovery. The workmen's compensation law is an act of the legislature, designed to permit the injured party to secure damages for injury or death resulting therefrom, and the authority is given in the act to the commission created by it to fix the amount of damages that shall be payable either in injury not resulting in death or in one resulting in death. This proposal interferes with the right of the legislature to provide for workmen's compensation laws and to provide a fund out of which to compensate the injured person.

Mr. PECK: Does not the act fix a limit to the amount that can be recovered?

Mr. KING: Very likely.

Mr. PECK: Of $3,500?

Mr. KING: I do not remember, but if it does this constitutional provision repeals it.

Mr. PECK: It ought to be repealed. That is what we are after.

Mr. KING: It gives the legislature the power to do that or to delegate that power to a commission, so that you strike a blow at the very heart of workmen's compensation acts by a constitutional provision.

Mr. WINN: Then if the section of the statutes fixes a limitation and the constitution says there shall be no limitation, the compensation laws would drop?

Mr. KING: Yes.

Mr. WINN: Do the compensation laws depend for their existence on the fact that the statute contains a limitation of the amount of recovery?

Mr. KING: No, sir; the law will fix the compensation or delegate the power to fix it.

Mr. WINN: Do you not know that the amount recovered under compensation laws is purely a matter of contract and not of statute at all?

Mr. KING: It is not an involuntary but a voluntary law, where the employer and the employe must enter into it, but there are those cases where it is absolutely involuntary.

Mr. WINN: But the amount recovered under the workmen's compensation act is a matter of contract.

Mr. KING: In a way.

Mr. WINN: Do you tell this Convention that if there should be written into the constitution this provision a person cannot thereafter contract to receive $3,500?

Mr. KING: Yes; because the legislatures of some states have taken away entirely the contract feature and it may be found before we get very far that it ought to be eliminated.

Mr. ANDERSON: What difference is there between the liability laws and rules—do you not know that this in no way can interfere?

Mr. KING: I would not have said so if I had known it. I said I thought it did and that it might receive that construction.

Mr. ANDERSON: You had the same opinion in the committee?

Mr. KING: No, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON: You signed this out and recommended its passage.

Mr. KING: If I did I announced at the time that I would not support the measure, except to report it in. Now I am going to offer an amendment.

Mr. PECK: Will the gentleman explain the difference?

Mr. KING: It takes away entirely any question of compensation under the compensation laws.

Damage for Wrongful Death.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out lines 4, 5, 6 and 7 and insert the following:

"No limitation shall ever be imposed by statute on the amount of damages recoverable by civil action in the courts of this state for an injury resulting in death caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of another."

Mr. ANDERSON: I accept that amendment.

Mr. PECK: One of the pleasures of this Convention to me has been the ability to get back and consider things worthy to essential justice. Every lawyer knows that in court whenever we try a case, or anywhere that we consider a case, we discuss it or try it in a court of review or in the court having the final passage on questions of law; we find it is all controlled by prejudice and we hardly ever get really to consider a thing simply in the light of its natural justice. Now I want to try this section that way. We are here making a foundation law upon which this people shall proceed, and I for one want to base our fundamental laws upon the eternal precepts of justice, without regard to any judge's decision or precedents established by any court. We can draw light from those things, but we are establishing a foundation and we are not bound by them.

This right to recover for wrongful death is a matter of modern legislation. There came a time when the sentimental human race had advanced in its progress to that point where it said to any one who had wrongfully caused the death of another, "You shall compensate the people who are dependent upon him and who are closely related to him for that death." The common law of England gave no such action. If you go back to Anglo-Saxon times you will find it was fundamental to them. When you come down to the books, you will find there was no such action until about 1850 when the parliament of England, under the lead of Lord Campbell, then lord chancellor, passed an act providing that anyone who caused the wrongful death of another should be liable in damages not to exceed five thousand pounds. In transferring that law over here the five thousand pounds was transferred as $5,000. There is a tremendous difference there. Five thousand pounds means $25,000. So it was first introduced in the state of Ohio as statutory law that anyone who wrongfully caused the death of another should be liable to the next of kin to the sum of $5,000, and that was afterwards raised to $10,000. I believe it is now $12,000. It never reached the level of natural justice. Would not natural justice say that whoever causes the wrongful death of another shall compensate those who have lost by his wrongful act? What does compensation mean? It means pay, and that would be the amount lost. Now we know there are some deaths for which there cannot be any compensation, but there are many others in which there can be compensation, and the question is how shall it be fixed. No statutory limitation can be fixed which will authorize persons bringing that kind of an action to recover the amount they ought to recover—in other words, enough to repay them for what they have lost by the death of that relative.

Now it may be that the law compensation sometimes will be very small and the courts have been inclined to consider the loss only temporary, but there are phases of the situation in which the sentimental aspect of which Mr. Bowdle speaks has come in and could not be kept out, when a man is injured and sues for compensation and he recovers compensation* for his suffering. It is a suggestive matter. His feelings, his sufferings, his pain, his internal injuries—for those there would be no recovery. There should be a recovery which would fully compensate for every sort of injury, for the loss of companionship, the loss of good advice, the loss of friendly assistance and a thousand and one things that an affectionate relative can render to another. These are things that the jury can estimate, and to say that the damage should be limited to only the pecuniary loss is to say that full compensation is not to be made.

I want to say in the light of natural justice whoever has deprived one of a relative should give full and complete compensation. That is all we want. I am not bothering about the statutes. They will be fixed. Let us fix the foundation and fix it good and strong in natural justice. I tried the case of a little girl twelve years old and I tried the case of a young boy sixteen years old, a young man killed by a railway engine, and in both cases very low verdicts were rendered. In the little girl's case the court sustained a verdict of $1,200. They said there could only be compensation granted and I thought the verdict might not be sustained, but the court did not set it aside. They showed the feeling there is in these matters. There is no use in talking about confining the matter simply to pecuniary injury. The law of justice requires full and complete compensation for the loss of that person, including all of those innumerable things that are implied in it. Let us fix the fundamental law firmly on the foundation of justice, and the legislature can do the rest about the workmen's compensation law.

Mr. TALLMAN: I am opposed to the amendment of the delegate of the member from Erie. It is really a substitute amendment for the one that we have been discussing. My objection to that is that it takes away any limitation. I do not regard the matter of limitation as being very important, especially relative to death, but I do regard this one thing of importance, and that is the power of the legislature to take away from the next of kin the right of action in case of the death of a child or of an unmarried man. You take the law as it now exists with reference to a man who works in a mine, and he may be under age or he may be an adult and in neither case does his next of kin, father, mother, brothers or sisters, have a right of action, and the amendment of the gentleman from Erie leaves to the legislature the power to pass a law of that kind. I want to say that the legislature has passed that law, and I want to say further that the court of common pleas and the circuit court have held that law to mean just what I say, that is, that an unmarried man, adult or minor, working in a mine and who is injured by the wilful violation of the mining act—if he is killed his mother, his father, his sisters or his brothers have no right of action. His mother may have to pay the expenses of his funeral and of a long siege of confinement after his injury before his resulting death; she may have to buy his coffin and shroud, but not one cent can she recover from that mining corporation. That is already the law of the state of Ohio as passed in the mining act, and it has been so construed by the court of common pleas and the circuit court of Belmont county. Four judges have decided it that way. That was one reason why I wanted the supreme court to have jurisdiction in cases where the construction of a statute was brought in question. But my friend from Hamilton county, of whom I think so much, the chairman of the Judiciary committee, would not have it that way. It was Judge Worthington's amendment. The case to which I call attention is now in the supreme court to construe that statute, the two of them linked together, and the construction of one involves the construction of both. It is in the supreme court and if the supreme court follows the decision of the courts below and the legislature is content to let it remain that way, then there is nothing on earth that can give a right of recovery in a case such as I have mentioned where death results and no wife or children survive. I object to the King amendment because it leaves the legislature the power to do that.

Mr. DUNN: Just a word on this subject. It seems that this proposal is another one in the direction of genuine reform. It is a proposition somewhat in favor of the individual and of the rights of the common people in opposition to the advantages of the corporations as heretofore exercised. It is a fact that some of the railroads would rather kill a person than wound that person because the damages would be far less. This proposal it seems to me is rising above the mere question of money, the mere question of the advantage of a person killed to his relatives, to the question of affection and love. I had a friend who in the exercise of his duty, was cut in two by a railroad train. Three friends went to the company and asked for damages for his wife and infant daughter and they were told, "If we paid for every man we killed we would break up the company." That daughter is now a young lady who has lost for all of her young life the affections of a father, and her whole character has in a great measure been changed from the lack of influence of that father and the lack of a home. The mother worked with her for years and finally it resulted in her own death. The railroad company would not pay one cent. I am strongly in favor of anything that is in the direction of reform and in favor of the individual.

Mr. REDINGTON: I desire to go on record as against the proposal and this amendment. I do not understand that master and servant are the only persons who are interested in this question. Wrongful death often results where neither of the parties, the master or the servant, has anything to do with it. There may be a third person.

Now I think it is all wrong, this setting aside the rules of evidence and allowing the jury or the court to speculate upon what was the actual damage in any particular case. For at least twenty-five years I have been interested on both sides of personal injury cases. In our county we have a great many of them, and I know from observation and experience that nine out of ten of wrongful-death cases are settled and do not get into the court. First we bluff settlements in a good many of the cases. We try to get by the court. We nearly always trust the jury if we have the other side and we try to block everything so as to let it get by the court. The purpose of this whole proceeding is for some attorney who has the side against the corporation or persons blamed. This is wanted to make a bluff for a great big settlement so that a small corporation or an individual who has been sued would rather pay a larger amount of money than to take the chances of a jury trial. Besides, since being a member of this Convention I have settled three cases and I have bluffed everyone of them through, and if you give me that law I will go out and bluff every corporation. They dare not take a chance of getting before a jury. They dare not take a chance of my getting by the court, for if I do I will skin them every time.

Do you want to wipe out corporations? No one wants to kill people. I never knew an official of a corporation wanting to kill any employe. If you put this thing in you will break up a good many institutions attempting to do a legitimate business. Today we have certain definite rules to follow in determining the damages in any particular case. Under these rules the employer can get insurance and, as well stated, no insurance company would dare to take the hazard under this provision that is now offered, or if they did take it they would want to raise the rates.

Mr. ANDERSON: A question please.

Mr. REDINGTON: Just a moment. I know if you will give us this provision you and I can go out and do a lot of bluffing. I think it is wrong. I believe in receiving fair compensation where there is a wrongful death, but the moment you go beyond the actual damages sustained and attempt to show loss of affection and love and all that kind of sentimental stuff in fixing value you reach the point where danger begins. No one will know what the damage would be, and such fellows as Redington and Anderson would go out and make barrels of money by it, but I say it is not right. That is all.

Mr. MAUCK: This question has been very thoroughly debated on two different occasions and I feel justified in demanding the previous question upon both the original proposal and the amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The vote will be upon the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being, "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 68, nays 30, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 240—Mr. Anderson. To submit an amendment to article I, of the constitution.—In relation to damages for wrongful death.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

No limitations shall ever be imposed by statute on the amount of damages recoverable by civil action in the courts of this state for an injury, resulting in death caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of another.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 331—Mr. Walker, which the secretary will read. The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. WALKER: I think the simple reading of this proposal will inform every delegate as to its object and we can dispose of it in a very little time. The constitution as now provides for the creation of a board of public works, to have supervision of the public works of the state. The only public works the state has are the canals. Large parts of them have fallen into disuse, and of the canals we still have two which reach across the eastern and the western parts of the state and the state has vested rights to the extent of $15,000,000. It is too valuable an asset to permit to be passed by and leave to the disposition of future members of the general assembly to do as they see fit. The proposal provides for caring for any situation as it may arise. If you are in favor of shortening the ballot this is one method of doing it, by cutting out all of these super-numerary officers.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Is there any provision to do away with the board of public works?

Mr. WALKER: This drops section 12 and 13 of article VIII.

Mr. KING: Those sections provide for the election of the board of public works and in your proposal you do not say whether the officers shall be elected or appointed.

Mr. WALKER: I purposely put it in this brief way so that it can be left to the wisdom of the Convention.

Mr. PECK: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 331 by inserting in line 8 thereof after the word "public works" the words "appointed by the governor for one year."

Mr. WALKER: I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the passage of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 97, nays 1, as follows:

Mr. Winn voted in the negative.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 331—Mr. Walker. To submit an amendment to article VIII sections 12 and 13, of the constitution—Relating to the board of public works.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE VIII, SECTIONS 12 AND 13.

Strike out sections 12 and 13 of article VIII, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

So long as this state shall have public works which requires superintendence, there shall be a superintendent of public works appointed by the governor for one year whose duties and powers shall be defined by law.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. ANDERSON: I move that the usual number of copies of Proposals No. 240 and No. 331 be printed.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is, Shall the motion by which Proposal No. 25 was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was carried.

Outdoor Advertising—Registering and Warranting Land Titles.

The PRESIDENT: Proposal No. 333—Mr. Peck. The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. PECK: I hope you will not put the skids under this. I do not think any proposition has come before the Convention which is so completely the work of myself as this. On Proposal No. 184, which you kindly passed, I had the assistance of a great many able men, but this is the work of my own unbridled genius, though it was instigated by a great many people in Cincinnati. I was continually asked by social and business clubs, women and men both, why we didn't do something to stop the billboard nuisance. I had investigated a little and they explained to me a little, and I understood why they thought it was up to us to do something about it. They said every time they tried to enforce any regulation or do away with the billboard evil before the police court or in various courts to stop their operations of defacing the landscape of the state, the offenders had always taken refuge in their claim of the constitutional right of property. I have a right to put as many billboards on my property as I please. I have a constitutional right. Therefore nothing could be done. So here is the only place that we can correct it. This nuisance is a great one. It is being talked about all over the United States. Everywhere they are seeking to remedy it. I have seen a large convention, much greater than this Convention, debating on that one subject, and as this is the only place where it can be corrected in Ohio I am earnestly in favor of this proposal and hope it will be adopted.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 333—Mr. Peck. To submit an amendment to article XV, section 10, of the constitution.—Relative to the use of property for display advertising.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Laws may be adopted regulating and limiting the use of property on or near public ways and grounds for the public display of posters, bill boards, pictures and other forms of advertising.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next order of business is the reading of Proposal No. 334—Mr. Jones.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. JONES: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I endeavored to make this proposal one without any legislative features whatever. Its purpose is simply to clear the way for the adoption in Ohio of what is known as the Torrens system of land titles. I want to be as brief as I can on this matter and I promise not to occupy more than ten minutes. I want to explain to those who have not given any thought to this matter the salient features of it. This system involves the registering of titles and in order that they may be registered the titles must be passed upon by a court of competent jurisdiction and only titles that are found to be good can be registered. A title, so registered, imparts absolute indefeasibility; in other words, a title registered can never be attacked for any cause. It is absolutely good for all purposes in law. The transfer of title thereafter is made as simple as the transfer of a certificate of stock in a corporation or a bond or a note or a horse or any other article of personal property. After your title is registered and a certificate put in the proper place in the record you are given a duplicate certificate and if there are any encumbrances they are noted on your certificate. If you want to transfer the property you can either execute an ordinary deed or enter on the back of your certificate an assignment, or if you want to borrow money on it you can transfer the certificate of title for that purpose. If you want to borrow money and give a formal mortgage, you can have the mortgage executed and all the party desiring to lend the money needs is to be shown your certificate. If the certificate is brought down to date, he has the whole thing before him. Your loan could be closed as quickly as if collateral were put up. A sale of a piece of land could be closed about as quickly as you could close up a sale of a horse or a block of stock. In other words the purpose of the whole system is first, to settle titles so that there will be no question as to the validity of a title, and second, to so facilitate the transfer of real estate that it can be made just as simple and just as effective, so far as passing the title is concerned, as the sale of personal property. In short, as Judge Peck suggests, it makes real estate a quick asset, absolutely so. New certificates are issued on each sale and transfer.

Now there is one other feature to which I want to call your attention and which has created a stumbling block against this system in Ohio. It is against our notions of justice that anybody should be cut out of his rights in property by mistake or otherwise without being made whole; so that wherever this system has been adopted, while it requires that the application shall be made to a court and the court shall examine the title and determine whether it is good, yet if it should turn out that the court had made a mistake in the adjudication and somebody would afterwards come up that had a valid and just claim, the sense of justice is so keen that there has always been a provision for a small fee of about one-tenth of one per cent upon the value of the property which shall go into a fund that is held to meet the cases where the parties have been deprived wrongfully of their property by the certifying of the title in some one else. There are a number of minor features, but those are the main ones. The system was first adopted fifty odd years ago in Australia in seven or eight provinces, and then in all the British provinces of the far East, including New Zealand and Tasmania, then in Scotland, Ireland and in England herself and in every one of the Canadian provinces, and it was in force in Prussia in a modified form for fifty years before it was adopted in Australia. Switzerland and many of the other European countries and six or seven states of this country, including Massachusetts, have adopted it. It was once adopted in Ohio and declared unconstitutional. It is in effective operation in Massachusetts and I have in my desk for inspection of any member who wants to see it, a letter from the secretary of state of Massachusetts in which he says that they cannot take care of the applications as rapidly as they come in for registration in their land courts.

Registering and Warranting Land Titles.

Mr. KNIGHT: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out of lines 5 and 6 the words "political subdivisions thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the word "counties".

Mr. KNIGHT: I think the counties should do that. I do not think that other political subdivisions should.

Mr. JONES: It should be left to the legislature as to what should be done.

Mr. KNIGHT: Would it not be needless to allow the smaller subdivisions to do it?

Mr. JONES: I wanted to make this matter purely a constitutional provision and let the legislature provide the details.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think we should not regard anything less than a county in this matter.

Mr. JONES: In 1893 the general assembly passed an act providing for the appointment of a commission of three by the governor to draft a bill for the purpose of making this system applicable in Ohio. That commission spent three years in the study of the question and an examination of the system as it prevailed in the various jurisdictions in Australia and elsewhere and finally reported to the legislature in 1896 a bill which it thought would overcome the constitutional objections which had been urged to the adoption of the system in Ohio. That bill was enacted into law by the legislature and went into effect. Its constitutionality was sought to be established by the auditor of state in a suit which he brought in the supreme court for that purpose, and the supreme court, under the view of the law it then entertained, was compelled to hold the act unconstitutional,

Mr. PECK: And that is why we are here now and that is particularly why we are here with this proposal.

Mr. JONES: One of the grounds upon which the supreme court held it to be unconstitutional was that it would violate the constitutional provision with reference to due process of law. That objection could be remedied without this proposed constitutional provision in the same way they have avoided it in Massachusetts and other places, but our supreme court said it was unconstitutional also in that it engaged the state in a private business, that it was not a function of government to do anything except to perform those acts which were for the general public good, and that insuring titles was essentially not different from the business of insuring property against loss by fire or insuring life.

Now the supreme court of Massachusetts and the supreme court of Illinois and the supreme courts of some of the other states differed from our supreme court on that proposition. Our supreme court argued that these provisions after all were merely for the benefit of persons who registered their titles under the system. The supreme court of the other states took the view that while there was a direct benefit to those who registered under the system, yet it was also a public benefit and that every body was indirectly interested in having real estate in such shape that the titles would be absolutely good and that it could be readily handled, and on that ground they differed from our supreme court. I provide here for meeting that objection of the supreme court upon the theory that it is not likely to reverse itself, although the supreme courts of other states have held differently.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: What would be the probable expense to have titles registered under the system?

Mr. JONES: It was provided in the act of 1896 that there should be deposited twenty-five dollars upon filing the application, the excess to be returned.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Would that be the average expense?

Mr. JONES: It would depend on circumstances, the size of the property and the complexity of the title and all that. I think in a letter that I have from the secretary of state of Massachusetts they estimate that the average expense has been about twenty-five dollars.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: What is the expense of a transfer?

Mr. JONES: All told I think on an average about two dollars. It is a very inexpensive operation.

Mr. KRAMER: I am not acquainted with that system. Do you have to have a complete abstract?

Mr. JONES: You go in with an application to register your title. The court of course requires you at the start to furnish the evidences of your title.

Mr. KRAMER: How do you do that?

Mr. JONES: You bring the original instruments, if you can get them, and they may ask you also to bring evidence in the form of an abstract showing that you are the owner of the property and giving an exact description of it. If your abstract shows there are any persons with adverse claims, those persons are made parties to the proceeding and they are notified and given an opportunity to be heard. The court determines, with all the parties before it just as in an ordinary action, whether your title is good.

Registering and Warranting Land Titles.

Mr. KRAMER: Then you proceed to advertise and it would be virtually bringing a suit.

Mr. JONES: It is.

Mr. KRAMER: What is the advantage of it?

Mr. JONES: After this is once done your title is registered and thereafter every time there is any transaction concerning it you don't have to go to a lawyer to get him to make an examination of the title.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Would not every owner of property have to employ a lawyer?

Mr. JONES: If he wanted to register his title it might in some cases be desirable, but where the system has been adopted it has never been made compulsory. Registering is entirely voluntary, but the advantages are so great, as the letter from Massachusetts indicates, that they come in fast.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Does not every owner have to employ a lawyer to trace his title when he wants to sell or borrow money?

Mr. JONES: Yes, generally.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Does he not have to employ a lawyer when he buys land?

Mr. JONES: Yes, generally he does.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Would he not have to do the same in this kind of a proceeding?

Mr. JONES: He could employ a lawyer if he wanted to.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Do you think the ordinary citizen is able to do it?

Mr. JONES: They do do it. There is a regular referee who takes charge of the matter and he examines your evidences of titles and reports to the court what defects if any he finds. Of course the services of an attorney would not be objectionable. The details in some cases would be complicated, but the experience in nineteen out of twenty real estate titles is that there is no serious question about the title.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Would not the court have to appoint that referee and the parties would have to pay him a fee?

Mr. JONES: He is a regular officer of the court.

Mr. BROWN, of Pike: Who pays that officer?

Mr. JONES: Provided for by law. In many places he is a salaried officer of the court. The fees charged go into a fund out of which that salary is paid, with other expenses.

Mr. DOTY: In those places where this system is optional, as against the old system, do you not find that this system is increasing in use?

Mr. JONES: Yes. It has increased and increased until it is overwhelming the courts administering it.

Mr. DOTY: You cannot create a cloud on the title except in the recorder's office?

Mr. JONES: No, sir.

Mr. DOTY: It must all be on one record?

Mr. JONES: That is one of the features. Everything that affects the title is right there on one page of a record in the recorder's office. Mortgages would be entered there, judgments, mechanics' liens, executions, suits, tax sales and everything that could be an encumbrance.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Ninety-eight per cent of the titles are good merchantable titles and probably not to exceed two per cent are found to be so defective as to be rejected. Under the Torrens system the farmer or owner of property in a city would bring the deed and all his evidences of ownership to the court. He would not have to employ any lawyer at all until the court's officer, this referee, came to him and said: "Mr. Farmer or Mr. Cityman, we find a defect in this title," and they would require that defect to be cleared up before the title was found good. And upon paying this one-tenth of one per cent, which on a hundred-acre farm would amount to about ten dollars, he would be given a certificate that the title was absolutely clear, and that farmer can then go to the bank and borrow money quickly and probably one per cent lower because the lender of the money knows the title is absolutely perfect and he does not have to depend on any lawyer. The farmer borrows the money and will be able to get his money so much cheaper. He would not have to be put to the expense of an examination, which must be paid by the borrower. Is not all that true?

Mr. JONES: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: And only when the title is found defective would he have to employ a lawyer for the purpose of making the title good, and then the further great advantage would be that these titles would pass and money could be borrowed quickly and immediately as on bonds or the very best security.

Mr. JONES: That is all true; and there is one other thing that I want to state. When a party once gets one of these certificates his title is good and he knows his title is good, but he does not always know his title is good when he gets an opinion from a lawyer. I have just within the past three weeks had a case determined by the supreme court of Ohio where a lawyer declared a title good in which the purchaser lost the land. I was defending for the man and he had to pay for the land over again more than the first cost and in addition will have to pay for nine years' use of the land.

Mr. HOSKINS: I wish you would explain. You may have done it, but I didn't get it. After the owner has perfected his title and receives a certificate how is that title transferred?

Mr. JONES: Just as if you had a time certificate in a bank. You sign your name on the back of it and you go to the bank and say give me a new certificate and you surrender the old one.

Mr. HOSKINS: The officer who transfers the title must examine each certificate and assignment and be responsible?

Mr. JONES: That is the reason for incorporating in this proposal the conferring of judicial powers on the recorder. There is to that extent an exercise of judicial power by the recorder.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Were there an appeal to a court would not that weaken it?

Mr. JONES: No, sir; that was one of the grounds upon which the supreme court held the act of 1896 unconstitutional, that it was conferring judicial power on the recorder and allowing an appeal, when under the constitution a recorder could not exercise judicial powers.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Would not that appeal have to be made in every case?

Mr. JONES: No, sir; it would be like an appeal in any other case. The time for taking the appeal would be fixed. For instance, a mortgage is paid off and brought in to be released. The recorder must determine the validity of the release. This is in a sense a judicial act. If he makes an error the party prejudiced is given a right of appeal.

Mr. KRAMER: If these titles are so much better under these foreign systems than any other method, would not every piece of property in the state of Ohio be compelled to go into court and have its title put in the shape of a certificate because no purchaser would be satisfied with anything but the best?

Mr. JONES: He would not be compelled. It would be optional. But as a matter of fact a majority of men would prefer that kind of a title and it would be done.

Mr. KRAMER: Would not the purchaser compel him to do it?

Mr. JONES: It takes two to make a contract. He could not compel him if he didn't want to.

Mr. HOSKINS: You say that our supreme court prevented this being put into effect here. How was it put in effect in the other states?

Mr. JONES: They found a way in Illinois, Massachusetts, and in a number of other states by their supreme courts taking a different view of the similar constitutional provisions from those entertained by the supreme court of Ohio.

Mr. HOSKINS: Has the language used in this proposal been adopted in any other state?

Mr. JONES: No, sir.

Mr. HOSKINS: It is an entirely new proposition?

Mr. JONES: This proposal seeks to remove what was pointed out in Guilbert vs. State, 56 O. S. 626, as constitutional objections to the adoption of the Torrens system in Ohio.

Mr. TALLMAN: Suppose any large tract of land is partitioned and it is divided into a number of tracts among the supposed living heirs and one of those heirs that is supposed to be dead comes to life again, or there is a posthumous child not in existence at the time of the partition; how would that affect the registered title?

Mr. JONES: Whenever the title is registered it is good in the person in whose name it is registered. A fund is provided for just such a case as you mention, and the interest of that person would be made good out of the fund that is provided by the small guaranty fee. Experience has shown that not one-tenth part of the fund is used.

Mr. KNIGHT: It seems to me there is no occasion for departing from the historic practice in this state, so I have moved to amend the Proposal No. 334 as follows:

Strike out in lines 5 and 6 the words "political subdivisions thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the word "counties."

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I wish simply to say a few words on this subject. In my judgment it is one of the wisest and most beneficial proposals that has ever come before the Convention, and if adopted we cannot compute in money the benefit to the people of the state of Ohio if they wish to avail themselves of it. In the discussion that has occurred there is only one other point that I would like to make clear to you and that is this: If the court should err and declare a title good that later investigation finds not to be good, the person in whom the title actually rests would suffer no injury. The court would allow that person the full value of his property at the time he proved his claim, and that would be taken out of the guaranty fund, so that it works absolute justice to all. Any of us who are at all conversant with economic laws knows that the easier you make your collateral the more readily you can obtain a loan and the lower rate you can get. It does not work an injustice to anybody. As the member from Fayette has shown you, it has been adopted by many of the civilized countries of the world and among these are half a dozen of the most progressive states in the Union.

Mr. HAHN: The great merit of the Torrens law is claimed to be that it makes the transfer of real estate as easy as the assignment of checks and notes is at present in the commercial intercourse of the world. I think the Torrens law makes the transfer of realty altogether too easy. The Torrens law is revolutionary in its character. It is unjust. As soon as the title is registered it is good against every unregistered claim against the property. From the time application is made to the county recorder to the moment that it is registered it leaves a wide scope for injustice and violence. I do not know under what circumstances it was introduced in Massachusetts or any of the other states. Why was this Torrens law proposal not introduced here earlier so that we could have had more time to give to its study?

Gentlemen of the Convention, the Torrens law is unconstitutional not merely under the federal constitution, not merely under our present constitution, but it will remain so also under the new constitution we are making, if adopted by the people. It is unconstitutional to take by force any private property and the new constitution will also demand that before a man can take private property even for public purposes the appraised value has to be first deposited in money.

The Torrens law demands no deposit of money, but merely refers the man who had to part with his interest to an uncertain insurance fund to be created by fees. You may pass the Torrens law, but any private corporation or individual that will ever bring it before the United States supreme court will surely succeed in having it declared invalid.

Mr. JONES: May I ask a question?

Mr. HAHN: When I am through I am willing to answer your question.

The federal constitution, article I, section 10, reads, "No state shall have the right to impair the obligation of a contract." Chief Justice Marshall in 1810 in the case of Fletcher vs. Peck, decided that the term "obligation of a contract" covers not merely contracts in general, but also conveyances of realty. The fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States says that no state shall have the right to deprive anybody of liberty, life or property without due process of law. What is the process of law in the Torrens law? None whatsoever! You have a claim against a piece of realty and you are not even notified about the suit against you; all that is necessary is to give a vague notice in a newspaper addressed to whomsoever it may concern, and then mention in it the name of the adjoining property owner and if the parties interested do not within a few weeks file their claim they are forever barred from doing so. Do you consider such a proceeding right in the state of Ohio? Is it just and fair that a man's interest in realty be taken away from him without any chance of defense? Such a law is nothing else but legalized robbery.

Registering and Warranting Land Titles.

Mr. DOTY: I dislike very much to disagree with my colleague, and I also dislike to break up the extreme harmony that has been existing between the delegates from Cuyahoga, but I am compelled to do it. I desire to inform my colleague and the Convention that the supreme court of the United States has already passed favorably upon the Massachusetts Torrens system law, so that my colleague was mistaken in one part and being mistaken in one part it is barely possible that he was mistaken in some others.

Mr. HAHN: I am not mistaken in that. Even Mr. Jones says that on the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States the supreme court did not come out directly in the syllabus. It is merely an opinion and we have no higher authority than Chief Justice Marshall, and in the work of Cooley on "Constitutional Limitations" you can find it.

Mr. DOTY: I want to say to the gentlemen that they don't get very far in their legal opinions before they are over my head, and I want to say that between the member from Cuyahoga, my colleague, and the gentleman from Fayette I would certainly decide with my colleague against the member from Fayette, but I am informed by the member from Fayette that such is the fact. Whether it is so or not I don't know. You remember my limited legal education, but in the past two or three years it has been my business to visit many places where the Torrens system has been in use on an optional basis—that is, they may or may not use it—and I have observed that anywhere I have found it the people, as they learn the usefulness of this new scientific way of doing the work, invariably use it in increasing numbers. In the city of Chicago they have the optional system. The system had small quarters in the recorder's office, but it has grown until now it is one of the largest departments. There are thousands of people in Chicago using the Torrens system. When I was in Minneapolis a few years ago I found this situation, that real estate agents who had property to sell published in their advertisements that one of the reasons it was a good piece of property was because it was a Torrens system piece of property. The people had learned the advantageous side of the Torrens system and therefore the people were advertising the fact that they used the Torrens system in connection with their land. If it were a detriment the real estate men would know of the fact and would keep the matter from being known. But that is not the tendency. The use of it in most places is optional, but the more the people use it the more they want it, and there is a continual growth in the number of people who desire to use the Torrens system. It is the scientific way of transferring property. If you buy a little piece of property in Cleveland worth only $500 and go back to the time when Christopher Columbus discovered America and bring it on down to the present, with its five hundred grantors, it is perfectly absurd. It is antiquated. It is out of date. This is so much better that we should be able to use it if we want to.

Mr. STOKES: I move the previous question.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment offered by the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 84, nays 14, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 334—Mr. Jones. To submit an amendment to article II, of the constitution. —Relative to the creation of a system for the registration and guaranteeing of land titles and to simplify and facilitate the transfer of real estate.—Legislative.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 33. Laws may be passed providing for a system of registering, transferring, insuring and guaranteeing land titles by the state or counties, and for the settling and determination of adverse or other claims and interests in and to the lands the titles to which are so registered, insured, or guaranteed, and for the creation and collection of guaranty funds by fees to be assessed against lands, the titles to which are registered; and to effect and carry out said purposes, judicial powers, with right of appeal to the common pleas court, may by law be conferred upon county recorders or other officers in respect to matters arising under the operation of such system.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

By unanimous consent Mr. Doty offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 122:

Resolved, That the president is hereby authorized to appoint an additional member upon the standing committee on Submission and Address to the People.

By unanimous consent the rules were suspended and the resolution was considered at once.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. Lampson was appointed as the additional member of the committee on Submission and Address to the People.

By unanimous consent Mr. Donahey offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 123:

Resolved, That the foregoing amendments to the constitution shall be submitted to the electors of the state at an election to be held on the _____ day of _____, one thousand nine hundred and twelve, in the several election districts of this state. The polls at said election shall be open at five thirty o'clock a. m. of said day, and remain open until five thirty o'clock p. m. of said day; the said election shall be conducted and the returns thereof made and certified to the secretary of state, as provided by law for annual elections of state and county officers. Within twenty days after such election, the secretary of state shall open the returns thereof, in the presence of the governor; and, if it shall appear that a majority of the votes cast on any of said amendments are in favor of such amendment or amendments, then the governor shall issue his proclamation, stating that fact, and said amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution of the state of Ohio, and not otherwise. That said amendments submitted shall be numbered in the order in which the proposals were adopted by the Convention on second reading, and each amendment shall be designated by such number and a title which shall suggest its subject matter. Said proposals with the number of the amendments corresponding thereto are as follows, to-wit: 54 (1); 118 (2); 100 (3); 2 (4); 184 (5); 236 (6); 93 (7); 212 (8); 163 (9); 5 (10); 249 (11); 62 (12); 64 (13); 242 (14); 122 (15); 209 (16); 24 (17); 7 (18); 261 (19); 309 (20); 169 (21); 72 (22); 304 (23); 241 (24); 166 (25); 322 (26); 252 (27); 272 (28). The ballots except as to proposals Nos. 151 and 91 at such election shall be printed in the following form, with each amendment designated by number and title thereon; those voters in favor of all said amendments may vote for all of said amendments by placing an X in the circle at the top of the column on said ballot, or by placing an X in the space before the word "For" in each and every title; those voters opposed to all of said amendments may vote against all said amendments by placing an X in the space before the word "Against" in each and every title; those voters who desire to vote for certain amendments only may place an X before the word "For" in the title of such amendment or amendments; those voters who desire to vote against certain amendments and not against other amendments may place an X in the space before the word "Against" in the title to such amendment or amendments. Ballots marked with an X within the circle at the top on said ballots shall be counted for all of said amendments, except such amendments as are erased or marked within the space before the word "Against". Ballots not marked shall not be counted for or against any amendment. Ballots so marked as to clearly indicate the intention of the voter shall be counted.

The following is the form of ballot with the designations and titles to amendments thereon:

The PRESIDENT: The next business in order is Proposal No. 51. The committee on Corporations other than Municipal recommends passage as amended. The minority recommends passage of substitute. The question is on the substitution of the minority for the majority report.

The minority report was read as follows:

Strike out all after the title and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE VIII.

SECTION 6. The general assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town or township, by vote of its citizens, or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint stock company, corporation, or association whatever; or to raise money for, or to loan its credit to, or in aid of any such company, corporation, or association.

The general assembly may provide by law for the regulation of all rates charged or to be charged by any insurance company, corporation or association organized under the laws of the state or doing any insurance business in this state for profit.

Provided, however, that the general assembly may establish and maintain a bureau of insurance for the purpose of furnishing fire, life, accident or other insurance to the citizens of the state, and provided further, that nothing in this section shall prevent public buildings or property being insured in mutual fire insurance associations or companies.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I shall attempt to explain briefly what the difference is between the original proposal and the report of the majority and minority. The purpose of this proposal was to cure what seemed to our mutual people a discrimination against the mutual interests of the state through an opinion rendered by the attorney general, and the matter was taken up with the hope of remedying it. I will read just briefly from the second opinion of the attorney general:

I dislike very much to be constrained to hold against the practice of insurance companies doing an honorable business, as I am sure has been done by the federation of mutual insurance associations of Ohio, and I regret exceedingly to feel compelled to adhere to my former opinion.

In addition to that we have had the opinion of the lower court of Darke county which sustains the opinion of the attorney general, so that if we are to have any relief at all it will only come through this Convention. The amendment offered by Mr. Woods at the time the proposal was up before, and which is now a part of the majority report, permits the state to control the rates of insurance companies. The minority report contains that provision and also permits the state to go into the insurance business. So far as the mutual insurance interests are concerned, we are not fearful of either one, because the cost of mutual insurance in the state is lower than it could be even under the operation of the state. The last report shows that the average rate of mutual insurance companies in the state is only $1.98 per $1,000, while the rate for cash companies is $3.33. We claim that mutual insurance does not only benefit its members, but every purchaser of insurance in the state of Ohio. Do you know that while the rates of insurance have gone up in practically every city in Ohio, they have not gone up in the country for twenty years? And why? Because the mutual insurance companies have been in operation there.

Now just for a moment I will do what I did not intend to do, refer to the work of some mutual insurance companies. Eleven years ago the home owners in three cities, Bucyrus, Galion and Crestline, concluded that they were paying too much insurance on residence property. We organized a mutual insurance company and we have been in operation eleven years. Our rate has been 5.3 cents on $100.00. The general agents of cash companies came into our city about five years ago with the expectation of raising the rates of the cash companies on that kind of insurance. Our local agents said to them, "This business is all going to mutual insurance companies now and you will ruin our business if you do that." They prevented a raise and they are now issuing five-year policies at the same price they formerly charged for a three-year policy. They issue five-year policies to the home-owners of Bucyrus for the same price that you people in Columbus are paying for three-year policies. So here is an opportunity for the state to recognize the merit of mutual insurance and do the very thing that is sought to be done by this amendment.

Mr. KRAMER: Is the only thing you are asking for on behalf of the interests you represent that the mutual insurance companies may insure public property?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: That is all we want.

Mr. STEVENS: At the risk of repetition I want to say that the difference between the minority report and the majority report in this case is simply the amendment submitted by myself. The original proposal introduced by the member who has just spoken was amended by a provision which provided that the legislature of the state should have the power to regulate insurance rates. An additional amendment was offered by me providing that the state should have the right to establish a bureau of insurance for the purpose of furnishing fire, life and accident insurance for the citizens of the state. The question is squarely on that issue. As stated by the president, the question is Shall the minority report be substituted for the majority report? The majority report does not contain the bureau of insurance amendment. The minority report does contain that. So that those of you who are in favor of establishing a bureau of insurance should vote to substitute the minority report for the majority report. Now I think that matter is clear.

Mr. HALFHILL: May I ask you a question?

Mr. STEVENS: You have occupied hours of time where I have only occupied minutes and I now refuse to yield to you out of my meager time. Besides, I asked the privilege of putting a question to you the other day and you flatly turned me down. I know the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] will vote fairly and squarely against me. He is absolutely beyond redemption. He sinned away his day of grace a thousand years ago and there is no use in trying to reform him.

For a few minutes I want your attention to some figures that are absolutely startling. Now the good roads proposal that we introduced several weeks ago contemplates the bonding of the state to the amount of $50,000,000 in the next ten years. I am going to show you by the figures that the state of Ohio is throwing away every year in clear, clean profit more money than it will take to build the good roads at $5,000,000 a year. It is costing us more than $5,000,000 a year in profits that go out of the state and never return. On page 18 of the 1911 report of the commissioner of insurance of the state of Ohio I find these figures, and I would like your closest attention.

In 1901 the total amount of premiums received by the fire insurance companies in Ohio was substantially $10,000,000. The amount of losses which the company paid that year were substantially $5,000,000. The people in 1901 paid in for insurance $10,000,000 and got back in the way of loss payments $5,000,000. Pretty good, two to one.

Now come down to the year 1910. The people of Ohio in the year 1910 paid out for insurance $15,000,000. They got back in losses $5,000,000. The amount of premiums of all the people of Ohio has increased in ten years from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, while the fire losses in Ohio have not increased at all. Is not that absolutely conclusive that that $5,000,000 went out of the state of Ohio to New York insurance companies?

Very little of this insurance is carried by Ohio companies, and if the insurance companies can do business for ten years, starting out by keeping one dollar out of every two paid to them, and afterwards two dollars out of every three paid to them, certainly that is a mathematical demonstration that the extra profit would be saved to the state of Ohio and you would have no trouble about your $5,000,000 per year on the good roads proposition. You are giving that away and there is no doubt about it. It is an absolute demonstration by figures.

That is only the matter of fire insurance. Look where it is going to. Suppose the same ratio continues. In ten more years we will be paying out $25,000,000 a year and our losses will be $5,000,000. They are not increasing. Now what are you people who do not think the state should undertake something in this line going to do? Are you going to continue to allow the millions to flow out of the state?

Now, as to the method: It has been suggested that the state should take control of the insurance rates and should say what the insurance companies of Ohio may charge. That in itself will doubtless do some good in the way of regulation, but I want to say to you it is not enough. Why, over in New York they had an insurance investigation a few years ago and the stench of it spread all over the United States. It was something terrible. The Armstrong bill was passed and that was the first real regulation of the insurance business in New York. Now there is no use to tell me it regulated it because I know better. The information that I have is in the possession of nearly every delegate in this Convention. Before that investigation I was carrying an insurance policy in the John Hancock, one of the old reliable companies, for $5,000. I am carrying that policy yet. Notwithstanding before that investigation the whole business was reeking with corruption, and notwithstanding that since the Armstrong bill they claim to have thoroughly regulated the insurance business, I am paying the same premium on that old-line insurance now that I did previously. All there was in it was a nine days' wonder and all there ever will be in any attempt to regulate the insurance business by supervising its rates will result as did the Armstrong bill. It won't hurt the insurance companies a bit. It won't help the people a bit. The only way to do anything with them is to put competition up against them.

The first member who spoke has told you about the history of his town, showing where the mutual companies came into competition with the cash companies and down came the rates pell mell. That will be the story all over the state of Ohio just as soon as you put the state in competition with the insurance companies, and this will be another case of coming events casting their shadows before, because just as soon as the legislature is given the power to establish a bureau of insurance just that soon will the insurance companies doing business in Ohio proceed to get together and insurance will come down and down and we will save $5,000,000.

You may say you don't want to put the state into the insurance business. Since when was it a crime for the state of Ohio to go into business? The last ten days have been spent solidly in putting the state of Ohio in one kind of business or another. First came home rule for cities. That gave the cities and villages of Ohio rights to go into all sorts of business. Then came the forestry proposal. It was passed, thereby giving the state the right to go into the forestry business, and only today you passed a proposal for a land-registration system to be established in the state of Ohio. What is that except the insurance of land titles? So you have been putting the state of Ohio into business almost every day since the Convention began. Why should we now shy, like a country horse, at a red automobile, at putting the state into business? And the further this progresses to a greater extent will you find the public in business of various kinds. Why, take the national government. We are in the postal savings business, the post office business, almost every sort of business. We are in the canal business, we are trying to get into the trolley business, the water works business and we know the insurance business as it is now carried on is doing far more harm and costing far more money than all of these other businesses. Now I want you to clearly understand, my friends, that it is not my purpose and it is not the intention of this proposition to start up here in the state house a great big insurance business in Columbus and not do anything else. I want simply to give the state the right to do anything it wants to do for the protection of its citizens, to furnish those citizens insurance in the various counties at reasonable rates.

The time of the delegate here expired and on motion was extended five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS: I feel grateful to the Convention and will not impose upon your good nature, but I simply want to add a few words as to how nicely this system I propose will fit in with the present order of things.

At present we have in Ohio an insurance department and at the head of that insurance department an officer who has so much time that he can attend to business on the outside. That department is so constituted that without an expenditure of more than $5,000 the insurance business of the state could be started. In every auditor's office is the valuation of the property, and the foundation upon which the insurance is based must be values, and every spring an assessor goes around over the state examining the property; and we have the fire marshal's office and that fire marshal's office has really been doing a great work, but who is getting the benefit of it? Not the state of Ohio, because we are paying $5,000,000 extra and that fire marshal's office is dividing and classifying and working for the benefit of the insurance companies and for no other purpose. I believe some system should be established by which the people of the state of Ohio should get some benefit and keep down the premiums at the same time, and you will never get that in any other way except by the state going in competition with the insurance companies.

The question of life insurance resolves itself to about the same thing. While we are paying out $15,000,000 we are getting back about $5,000,000 in fire insurance. We are paying out $30,000,000 and getting back $10,000,000 in life insurance. When you depart from the ordinary forms of insurance the figures become even more startling. Take the insurance commissioner's reports on the Fidelity and Casualty of New York, which is one of the great financial institutions. Out of $1,800,- 000 received they pay out $700,000 in accident insurance. Another company takes in $1,100,000 and pays out $500,000. So it is all the way down the list.

The PRESIDENT: The presiding officer wants to correct an error. We are acting on the minority report and the rule under which we are proceeding is five minutes, but since I made the mistake I should like to ask to extend to the chairman of the committee fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOSKINS: I am not an insurance expert and I do not care to take up much time in the discussion of this question, but I want to call attention to the fact that this is an important matter. I should like each member to give the minority and majority reports careful attention. The difference between the two reports is that the majority report is signed by ten and the minority report by seven members of the committee. The committee unanimously recommended Proposal No. 51 by Mr. Miller. Then when it came upon the floor there was a discussion of it and Mr. Woods offered an amendment and that was followed by an amendment by Mr. Stevens. After discussion it was referred back to the committee, and the committee, after having several hearings upon the matter, accepted in a great part the Woods amendment, and that is in the majority report and this is signed by ten members of the committee. Then the minority report embraced all that was in the amendment offered by Mr. Stevens. The ten members who signed the majority report are not in favor of putting the state into the insurance business. We believe by the incorporation of the Woods amendment we have provided as far as we possibly can go upon that proposition. It is conceded by everyone that the mutual insurance companies are not organized for the purpose of doing business at a profit and that they are attempting to give insurance to the public at cost, and there is no question that they are doing that. Of course, the law requires certain reserves to be carried in order to insure safety, and the larger the reserves carried the safer the company is and the more it is sought as a medium of insurance. The very idea of insurance is to make the company perfectly safe. Now, from all that I can gather—I do not understand some of the figures read by Mr. Miller, of Crawford, but in a general way it seems to be conceded that the mutual companies are able to do fire insurance business from twenty to thirty-three per cent lower than the old-line companies. I have had considerable experience and have made some observations. I am very largely insured in mutual companies and I know that the insurance runs twenty per cent less in the mutual than in the old-line companies. In other words, the mutual companies in which I carry insurance and of which I have some knowledge are doing an insurance business at twenty per cent less rates than the old-line companies. The average rate I think is about that, although some say it is thirty-three per cent.

It is impossible to fix an absolute rate for fire insurance. The great fires come, the conflagrations come, and companies must be strong enough to stand these extreme losses. We have many cases in which companies failed where extraordinary fires have taken place. Now if mutual companies are furnishing this fire insurance at from twenty to thirty per cent less than the old-line companies furnish it there is not a wide margin of difference left there. If the state of Ohio undertakes to control rates then I have no objection if that amendment of the committee carries.

Now the main point is not so much the premium charge as the expense of operation which the insurance department should have control of, and what is true of fire insurance is true also of life insurance. The abuses have grown up because of the expenses of operation, but the law is not undertaking to control these expenses of operation, and the Woods amendment to the original proposal would take care of that matter in both fire and life insurance.

In reference to life insurance—I think we all pay life insurance—we are all more or less acquainted with the rates and we are all in fraternal life insurance, and if the state went into the insurance business it would come into conflict with the fraternal orders of insurance and with the life insurance companies. You are acquainted with the rate you are compelled to pay in your fraternal insurance life companies. A large fraternal company in which I carried part of my insurance a few years ago was furnishing life insurance and it was being operated at cost. It was actually furnishing insurance to its members at cost, but it got into financial trouble and was compelled to advance its insurance rate until today I am paying practically what the old-line rates are. If the full monthly premiums were paid as they have been assessed it would be an old-line rate on $3000 of insurance which I carry in that organization, but if the death rate is small enough and the premium receipts are sufficient there will be about two months a year that the premiums will be remitted. Do you mean that the state of Ohio would be put in competition with a fraternal organization that is carrying on business for the benefit of its membership at large? And what applies to this organization applies to every organization in the state of Ohio or doing business in the state of Ohio. Now when it comes to old-line life insurance rates I do not know how much those rates could be reduced. I am not an expert along those lines, but I do know about the fraternal organizations that have undertaken in the past years to furnish insurance at cost. When they established these extremely low rates which were attractive to many applicants and got them into membership as young men expecting it would be a provision for their old age and for accidents that might come to them, at a time when they could not get insurance in other companies, they found that those companies were failing them. Those companies have not been extravagantly managed for the reason that they were organized for the purpose of furnishing insurance at cost, and in the two fraternal organizations in which I carry insurance I know as clearly as I know anything that there has been no excessive cost of management, and yet both of these fraternal organizations have been compelled to raise their rates or quit.

Now with reference to the Armstrong investigation in New York, I don't know anything about it, but I want to call the attention of the members of the Convention to the fact that the great abuses in the management of the three large life insurance companies grew out of the deferred dividend policies which those companies instituted years and years ago. In other words, the dividends were not to be paid until the maturity of the policy. A large part of the accumulations of those three large companies have grown out of the deferred dividend plan. One result of the Armstrong investigation was to do away with and prevent the company from writing this deferred dividend plan of insurance, and another result of the Armstrong investigation was to limit the volume of business that might be done by any company. But its particular application was to the three large companies in New York. A further result of that was to do away with certain forms of policies, one of which was the deferred dividend policy, and prevent the company from writing those policies hereafter.

Mr. STILWELL: What was the object of the Armstrong commission in limiting the amount of business that an insurance company could do?

Mr. HOSKINS: They were getting too big.

Mr. STILWELL: It was dangerous.

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes; I agree with you, but that is eliminated. So far as that is concerned the state of Ohio has no control over it.

You understand that every insurance company, every life insurance company, every fraternal company and every old-line company, must submit its rates to the insurance department of the state and the insurance department will not permit any company, under the present law, to write life insurance policies below certain rates and insists that the rate should be at a certain figure for the purpose of taking care of future losses of the company. If we give to the lawmaking power of the state a right—as I believe we ought to do—to regulate if there are abuses that creep into the insurance system—and I don't say there are any—to regulate the matter of rates and expenses, and, in other words, to give them full power over the situation in this state, we have gone as far as we ought to go.

While I am not familiar with it I think it will be conceded by those who are, that this proposition of putting the state into the insurance business is not a new one, but is an old one. It has been tried out time and again and has been found to be a failure in times past; so in the judgment of the committee we urge that the Convention reject the minority report and adopt the majority report with the provisions suggested.

Mr. STEVENS: You say that government insurance has been tried out and has failed. Where?

Mr. HOSKINS: In England.

Mr. STEVENS: Was not the state insurance proposition introduced in England by no less a person than William A. Gladstone, and is not that insurance in operation after fifty years?

Mr. HOSKINS: And it has proved to be an absolute failure and has gone down, down, down.

Mr. STEVENS: I understood you to say you thought that the insurance was being done at the lowest possible rate.

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: If you think so how do you account for the fact that in the ten year period the receipts were $10,000,000 and the expenses were $5,000,000, and another time the receipts were $15,000,000 and the expenses $5,000,000? Do you think the business is being done at a bare margin of profit? What becomes of that $5,000,000?

Regulating Insurance.

Mr. HOSKINS: You don't seem to remember that the companies are required to carry large reserves.

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking of receipts and disbursements.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: I do not believe that most of the members of this Convention have original minds. I know I have not. I reason by comparison. I had a little object lesson this morning and I learned something about insurance rates. I took out a policy today in one of the London companies. I don't know what company it was, but the insurance agent handed me my policy and the rate was six-tenths of one per cent for three years. That would be about $5 a year, and if we could save thirty-three per cent on that it would be about $1.60 or the premium would be $3.40. So $5 paid the insurance agent and the premium for one year and $15 paid for three years. Now I doubt whether the state of Ohio could furnish insurance much cheaper than that. The best rates in this state are secured by the farmers. They have a good many mutual insurance companies among themselves, but they have the best line of risks. I do not believe that insurance could be done at much less rates than that for which I insured this property. I do not like to see the state go into all kinds of business. We have gone into the printing business and it was said that that measure was strictly legislative. I don't see why this matter of fire and life insurance should not be left to the legislature. Let us try the printing business out before we go into the insurance business. I think it is a dangerous experiment. I do not understand life insurance or fire insurance and I am not a stockholder in any of those companies. Yes, I believe I do own $100 of life insurance stock in the state of Ohio. It is an Ohio corporation, but I don't make any fortune out of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Will you answer a question?

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: I don't know that I can answer it.

Mr. STEVENS: Do you know the fact that the fire losses of your Atlas Company were $800,000 and that the single item of commissions to agents was $360,000?

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: How many American millions did that insure?

Mr. STEVENS: I could not say.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: They are represented by a great many agents and have to pay taxes, etc.

Mr. STEVENS: Then is your argument against this based on the fact that this company should be an eleemosynary institution?

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you conceive that mutual companies are being operated at cost?

Mr. STEVENS: No, sir.

Mr. HOSKINS: You think rates can be reduced?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; I do.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then I have no further argument.

Mr. KRAMER: Just a word about the minority report. I would like to call the attention of the members to the fact that no man ever takes out insurance, especially life insurance, unless he is hounded to death. I believe in life insurance as much as I believe in anything. I carry a little life insurance and I should carry more, but I will never take out a dollar's worth more until I cannot refrain. I thought when I came down here I would escape the life insurance agent, and, lo and behold, when I came into the Constitutional Convention I found I was still hounded by life insurance agents.

I tell you the state of Ohio will never make a success of this without having a horde of agents. That is what I want to call your attention to.

The member from Tuscarawas [Mr. STEVENS] is not fair. He knows that it costs an immense amount of money to get these life insurance agents and that in the expenditure of this vast sum of money he mentions, a great deal of it was given to the agents.

Mr. STEVENS: Can I ask a question?

Mr. KRAMER: No, sir. Not right now. You didn't show much courtesy to my friend back there [Mr. HALPHILL]. I say that the state cannot engage in the life insurance business without maintaining a vast horde of agents. Wouldn't it be a grand scheme for the state of Ohio to have eighty-eight agents in every county soliciting business?

Mr. ULMER: May I ask a question?

Mr. KRAMER: Yes; I yield to you.

Mr. ULMER: Does the minority report compel the state to go into the insurance business? It doesn't compel it. It is in the constitution, so that if there is reason for it to go into the business it can go in.

Mr. KRAMER: I am one of those persons who are not in favor of saddling responsibility upon somebody or something else. If I don't believe in a thing I am not willing to saddle the responsibility of engaging in it upon the legislature and whenever the time comes when the legislature or the state of Ohio should engage in the insurance business we will find ways and means to enable them to do so, but I am not willing to have the state of Ohio go into the insurance business when I know it cannot succeed to any extent without a horde of agents running over the state of Ohio and who possibly would not be interested, but might be used for something else. Just think how hard they would work! Why, they would become grayheaded in a year on account of the energy they would put into the business. I don't want any eighty or eight-eight thousand men running over the state spending their time electioneering. Then another thing, suppose we have a Titanic disaster or a Chicago fire or a San Francisco earthquake and have no reserve fund. Bless you, gentlemen, let us not adopt the minority report without mighty careful consideration.

Mr. DOTY: Suppose we did have some such disaster as you have referred to. Do you know of any combination of insurance companies that are financially able to stand as great a drain on their resources as the state of Ohio?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: How would the losses be paid, by taxes?

Mr. CAMPBELL: And under the one per cent limit, too?

Mr. KRAMER: I have said all I want to say on this matter. I think I can conscientiously vote for the majority report. This is not so dangerous, but let us keep away from this minority report.

Mr. STILWELL: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: Just a word relative to the members of the committee respectively that signed the majority report and the minority report. Two of the gentlemen who signed the majority report voted with the minority in committee and signed the majority report under a misapprehension of what it was, so that as a matter of fact the report that is in here as the majority report is really the minority report.

Regulating Insurance.

Mr. HOSKINS: I wish you would enlighten us on that subject. Mr. Eby signed both by mistake.

Mr. STILWELL: Mr. Eby voted with the minority in committee and because the majority report happened to be presented to him he signed the report thinking it was the minority. The same thing is true of Mr. Smith, of Geauga.

Mr. HOSKINS: We took a tally on it in the committee.

Mr. STILWELL: Just a little further reference to these reports. The Convention had no more than taken up the discussion of this question before they were urged to delay a hearing upon it in order that somebody might come from somewhere in order to represent the great insurance companies of America. There was a meeting held in this hall and somebody came from the East. I can't recall his name, but mark you this fact about his appearance here: He was not representing any particular insurance company, but he was representing a combination of insurance companies through their president because the Armstrong commission had limited the business of those great insurance companies as to the amount they could do, and, being limited, they have combined, and now they have their president and their accounting and their different departments of business united through a centralized office. As a matter of fact, they are doing all the business that they can do, and when the limit placed upon the insurance company is reached they will simply reach out and get one more company that is not doing any business and put it in the combination and they will be able to sell about $3,000,000 more of their business, just a little personal business. I carry some insurance in two of those companies and I have carried it for some length of time. In one mutual company I am paying fifty cents and in one of the old-line companies I am paying three dollars.

Mr. MAUCK: Are you complaining about the rate in the mutual?

Mr. STILWELL: No.

Mr. MAUCK: Then we have adequate provision to fight the old-line companies under the law.

Mr. STILWELL: No, sir; it is not sufficient. The fact of the matter is that the regulation might have some effect upon the reduction of the insurance rate, but it has not been sufficient to put the proper leverage on the old-line companies to beat down the exorbitant charges that they are making at the present time. Why is it that out of the rates heretofore charged they have been able to build those skyscrapers in the East and pay their presidents enormous salaries and agents enormous commissions for writing policies. As the question of the gentleman from Lucas well indicated, this doesn't put the state in the insurance business. If the general assembly sometime in the future thinks the insurance companies could be better controlled by putting the state in the insurance business it might be done.

Mr. HOSKINS: A question of privilege. I want to know something about that correction of the number that signed in the committee.

Mr. STILWELL: I have given that.

Mr. HOSKINS: Didn't ten on the call of the roll answer for the majority report and seven for the minority report?

Mr. STILWELL: You must be mistaken. There were not seventeen present.

Mr. REDINGTON: There were just fifteen. There were eight for the majority and seven for the other side. The two who signed by mistake were Mr. Eby and Mr. Smith, of Geauga.

Mr. CROSSER: I have frequently noticed in what little experience I have had that when for any reason there is a reference to some special committee or back to a committee of a matter which has come up for discussion before the legislative body itself, there really is a great deal more trouble in passing it when it comes back. That has been my experience. When it goes to committees of which I have been a member, there are experts who come in and explain it all to us, how it happened and what should and should not pass. I am not enthused about the government operation of this thing, but I am in favor of the minority report for this reason: There are no better means of coercion than the power of the state to go into the business itself if it sees fit to. If this proposition proposed that the state should go into the business of insurance I would hesitate a great deal before I would give my vote for it, but when it says that the state may go into the business if in the wisdom of the legislature it should do so, that is another thing. I think the state should have the power to do so, because there will be no better plan or means of bringing down rates of the regular companies than this method. You can regulate all you please. You can have your commission regulate prices, just as your railway commissions and your public service commissions, but it won't amount to a hill of beans unless you have some means of combating with them.

They say we must have eighty thousand insurance agents to get the business. Is that reasonable? If there is any truth about what my brother from Tuscarawas says about rates they charge, if the state can split that rate do you think it is reasonable that you would pay five or six agents a half bigger price to come to you? No, the people would find where the cheap insurance is and when the cheapest insurance is with the state they will come to the state. Don't let us assume to ourselves that infinite wisdom that the majority report contemplates. Every time you put any addition in the constitution that says shall or shall not you impute infinite wisdom to us more than to the people that are to come after us.

Mr. ELSON: You would not contemplate the state sending out agents to write insurance?

Mr. CROSSER: I want the state to be empowered to write insurance and properly advertise the matter, but not solicit. I have confidence in the proposition and I have confidence that when men know that they can get it cheaper and better one place than another they will go there. Now I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on substituting the minority report for the majority report.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken and resulted—yeas 50, nays 47, as follows:

Regulating Insurance.

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Beatty, Morrow,	Harter, Huron,	Pierce,
Brown, Pike,	Hoffman,	Read,
Colton,	Hursh,	Riley,
Crosser,	Kerr,	Rockel,
Davio,	Kilpatrick,	Shaffer,
Donahey,	Kunkel,	Smith, Geauga,
Doty,	Lambert,	Stevens,
Dunn,	Leslie,	Stilwell,
Dwyer,	Malin,	Tannehill,
Earnhart,	Marriott,	Tetlow,
Elson,	Marshall,	Thomas,
Fackler,	McClelland,	Ulmer,
Farrell,	Miller, Crawford,	Wagner,
Fess,	Miller, Fairfield,	Walker,
Hahn,	Miller, Ottawa,	Watson,
Halenkamp,	Moore,	Woods,
Harbarger,	Pettit,

Those who voted in the negative are:

Anderson,	Hoskins,	Partington,
Antrim,	Johnson, Williams,	Peck,
Beatty, Wood,	Jones,	Peters,
Brown, Highland,	Kehoe,	Price,
Campbell,	Keller,	Redington,
Collett,	King,	Roehm,

Fox,	Ludey,	Taggart,
Halfhill,	Matthews,	Tallman,
Harris, Ashtabula,	Mauck,	Weybrecht,
Harris, Hamilton,	Nye,	Winn,
Holtz,	Okey,

So the minority report was substituted for the majority report.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on adopting the report of the committee as amended. This is a final vote.

DELEGATES: The report has not been agreed to yet.

The PRESIDENT: It is altogether as to how you regard that second vote when you voted to substitute. The chair will rule that the substitute being adopted it does not do away with the vote on the committee's report as amended, so we will put the question to a vote.

The committee's report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: Now the question will go upon the adoption of the proposal and the secretary will call the roll.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted—yeas 54, nays 44, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Beatty, Morrow,	Halenkamp,	Miller, Fairfield,
Beatty, Wood,	Harbarger,	Miller, Ottawa,
Brown, Pike,	Harter, Huron,	Moore,
Colton,	Hoffman,	Pettit,
Crosser,	Hursh,	Pierce,

Halfhill,	Matthews,	Weybrecht,
Harris, Ashtabula,	Mauck,	Winn,
Harris, Hamilton,	McClelland,	Woods,
Harter, Stark,	Nye,

So the proposal, not having received the requisite number, failed to pass.

Mr. WOODS: I move that the vote whereby Proposal No. 51 was lost be now reconsidered.

The motion was seconded.

The PRESIDENT: The chair would inquire how the gentleman voted?

Mr. WOODS: I voted the right way to make the motion.

Mr. PECK: I move to lay that motion on the table.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 36, nays 64, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Hoskins,	Okey,
Brown, Highland,	Jones,	Peck,

So the motion to table was lost.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. WOODS: I now offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Regulating Insurance.

Strike out lines 14, 15, 16, and 17 and 18 and in line 13 after "state" insert "for profit".

Mr. WOODS: Gentlemen of the Convention: I am not here this morning because I like to be. I was for the Stevens amendment. I would like to have seen that proposition go into the constitution, not because I am a believer in the state going into the insurance business, but because I wanted the state to have that club over the insurance companies. However, we were only able to muster forty-six votes for the Stevens amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: Fifty-four.

Mr. WOODS: My idea is when we cannot get a whole loaf we had better get a half. I don't like to see this proposal killed. I don't want to see the amendment I offer to it killed. There is not a man in Ohio who owns property who does not carry insurance, and I think it is ridiculous that whenever a man who has any property insured before he can get it insured in an old-line company the board at Columbus fixes the rate he will have to pay. I do not care what the business is, when it comes to a point that you cannot get the necessities of life—and insurance is a necessity of life—without the companies binding you and making you pay their price because there is no competition in that business, it is time for the state to step in and say something about that price. I say to you, gentlemen, that the fire insurance companies of this state have gone into an agreement and they have a board here in Columbus and that board fixes the price that we all have to pay. I think the companies have a right to make profits, but not to make the profits that they are making now.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you mean to strike out the last two lines or the last three words of lines 16, 17 and 18? That would destroy the original amendment in the minority report. I don't believe you mean that.

Mr. WOODS: The minority report, lines 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18.

Mr. HOSKINS: But you have added the Miller amendment at the end of the minority report, so that it is in lines 17 and 18, and it would strike out what Mr. Miller was after.

Mr. WOODS: What I was trying to do was to strike out the Stevens amendment.

Mr. HARTER, of Huron: How can the state compel insurance companies to accept the rates the state may make?

Mr. WOODS: They cannot do it. But if we put this amendment in the constitution and then the general assembly passes a law under it, the insurance companies will be regulated just the same as any other corporation.

Mr. MARRIOTT: They accept it or go out of the business.

Mr. DOTY: I move to lay the amendment of the delegate from Medina on the table and I call for a division on that.

The motion was carried.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I offer an amendment. The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

ARTICLE VIII.

SECTION 6. The general assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town or township, by vote of its citizens, or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint stock company, corporation, or association, whatever; or to raise money for, or to loan its credit to, or in aid of any such company, corporation, or association.

Providing however; that nothing in this section shall prevent public buildings or property being insured in mutual fire insurance associations or companies.

The general assembly may provide by law for the regulation of all rates charged or to be charged by any insurance company, corporation or association organized under the laws of the state or doing any insurance business in this state for profit.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. The Convention has once within half an hour voted this very amendment down by a ye and nay vote and the only way to get at that is to reconsider it.

Mr. HOSKINS: When was that done?

Mr. DOTY: The minority report was substituted for the majority.

Mr. LAMPSON: It is true that that amendment was included in the majority report, but the question that was put was on substitution of the one report for the other and not upon the adoption of an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The chair will rule that the amendment being in the report the vote was not specifically on it, but the report simply included the amendment. This is in order.

Mr. DOTY: I move that we lay this on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The chair cannot recognize the gentleman to make the motion. The chair was trying to recognize the delegate from Delaware.

Mr. MARRIOTT: I move to amend at the end of line 13 by adding the words "for profit".

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I want that included in my amendment; I accept that.

Mr. FACKLER: I do not believe any man or set of men is wise enough or good enough to be master of other men. I realize in the piling up of the tremendous fund that is now accumulating in the city of New York from the great insurance companies there is a real menace to the liberties of the people. The enormous amount of $1,500,000,000 is represented by three of those companies and they are in a position to bring about any disaster to prosperity or any depression to business that they desire. That is not a healthy power. How can you remedy it? The state itself will be forced to take some action.

Mr. DOTY: Do you not know that the state of Ohio regulates the rates charged for life insurance?

Mr. FACKLER: They have not exercised any authority at all.

Mr. DOTY: Do you not know that a life insurance company cannot do any business unless they abide by the rates provided by the state of Ohio?

Mr. FACKLER: No, sir; I don't know that. I say the policy holders should be protected. I say that the control of that vast amount of money I have mentioned is a menace to the whole nation and in the near future we shall know of it.

Regulating Insurance.

Mr. WOODS: Is it not a fact before a life insurance company can do business in this state they have to get a certificate showing it is a good company and it has never anything to do with the rate?

Mr. FACKLER: That is my idea. My colleague [Mr. Dory] was taking the part of an Ohio corporation. I don't understand that the state of Ohio has any control whatsoever over the rates charged by foreign insurance companies. Now I would not place the right of the state to engage in this business upon any desire for a regulation of the rates particularly. It is a broader right than that. Many insurance companies are furnishing insurance at the lowest rate they can furnish insurance, but this piling up of great amounts of money is a menace to the liberty of the country.

Mr. HALFHILL: Are you aware of the fact that there are common law insurance contracts, and are they not all absolutely in the control of the state?

Mr. FACKLER: No; there are no common law insurance contracts that I know of any place.

Mr. HALFHILL: I mean by that as distinguished from an ordinary contract?

Mr. FACKLER: I am not familiar with the insurance laws. Do you know that there is such a law?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes; I do as a lawyer, and I also know something about life insurance and establishing rates and controlling rates. You could not do business unless you submitted to the rates.

Mr. FACKLER: Has the state control of the rates?

Mr. HALFHILL: Absolute control. Even the form of the contract.

Mr. FACKLER: That was copied after the Armstrong law.

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; it was not copied after that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Are you aware that one savings bank in the city of New York has something like $200,000,000 in bank?

Mr. FACKLER: No, sir; what bank is it?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The Bowery Savings Bank. Do you consider that a menace to the people of the state of Ohio?

Mr. FACKLER: No, sir. But whenever any three large institutions, with their various national banks and their various trust companies with which they are affiliated, are in a position to do as those three insurance companies are doing, we know that they can make everybody else tremble. You know that as a banker and as a broker.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Your statement is not correct. I am not a banker nor a broker. I never have been and I never expect to be.

Mr. FACKLER: I am misinformed as to your business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As a matter of information, do you know that every investment of those three great life insurance companies is regulated by law?

Mr. FACKLER: That is what they say and still lend out large sums of money on call loans upon collateral, and the law does not prevent them from calling those loans whenever they want to. It is the power to call loans that is the power to bring about panics.

Mr. WINN: There is another side of this question that we have not touched upon.

The delegate from Defiance here yielded to a motion to recess.

On motion of Mr. Doty the Convention recessed until 7:30 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess.

Mr. WINN: I was about to say at the time we recessed for supper that there are some features of the question that have not been discussed, and I was about to call attention to the fact that until recently there were very few life insurance companies in this state. The Union Central Life Insurance Company, an Ohio corporation, has been in existence a good while. It is a splendid company, with a good many policy holders in the state; but within very recent years, in fact, within the last two years, two large insurance companies have been organized in Toledo and one or two in Columbus, and since the commencement of this year the Gem City Life Insurance Company of Dayton was authorized to do business; in fact, it has been authorized to do business within the last four or five weeks. I speak of that company because it so happens that those who have to do with the organization of it are acquaintances and friends of mine. Not long since I was shown a list of the stockholders and I find on that list quite a large number of very respectable citizens of Defiance, a large number in Van Wert, a very great number in Columbus and page after page of stockholders who live in Cincinnati and Montgomery and all over the state. There were, I was told by the president, fifty-four agents out selling stock in different parts of the state. The Gem City Life Insurance Company with $100,000 capital and $110,000 surplus is one of the most promising companies ever organized to open business in this or any other state.

What does this mean? If we are to say that Ohio is going into the insurance business in competition with Dayton and these two new companies in Toledo and two or three companies in other parts of the state, it is practically ruination to them. They cannot do business. These stockholders, running up to many thousands, will have to pay their money for their stock and get nothing because whenever it is known that the great commonwealth of Ohio is going to set up business in competition with its citizens it means ruination to the business of the citizens. That is not all. Even though the state shall never engage in business it will write that into the constitution, and if we write into the constitution a provision that the legislature may whenever it sees fit go into the insurance business in competition with existing companies, no company in Ohio will ever be organized as long as that constitutional provision exists. I venture the assertion that if that provision is written into the constitution there never will be attempted the organization of another life or fire insurance company in this state.

Regulating Insurance.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you think the Ohio Farmer's Fire Insurance Company could compete with the great state of Ohio in the insurance business?

Mr. WINN: I do not. In every locality there is a little insurance company. Over in my county there is a farmers' mutual. It has a right to do business in Defiance and part of Williams and part of Paulding. It is writing insurance in all that part of the country. What is the result? Immediately the state of Ohio goes into the insurance business and we put the state in competition with the farmers' mutual, or with any of these other mutuals with which my friends are connected, we array against all of the work we have been doing here not only thousands of policy holders of the Union Central Life Insurance Company all over the state of Ohio, but all of the policyholders of all other Ohio institutions.

Mr. WATSON: Will you yield for a question?

Mr. WINN: No; I will not.

The PRESIDENT: The time of the gentleman is up. The delegate from Mercer is recognized.

Mr. FOX: I notice that the delegates from the cities and everywhere are all interested in their homes. A number of delegates say, "This does not interfere with you, but it a great help to us," and they have asked me to assist them. Here is a proposition that comes from the rural districts. Mercer county is a county of farmers and we have in our county one township that has a large association, a farmers' mutual, mentioned by Mr. Winn. They have done business in the fire insurance line for over thirty years. They have protected the farmers' interests at less than one-half of the money that they would have had to pay to the old-line insurance companies. Then we have right close to us a settlement of people called the Dunkards and they also write a part of the country. They are located in Miami county. That company does a great deal of business in Mercer, Preble and Montgomery counties. I think it does some in Shelby also. These people have insured farmers and they also insure houses in villages, and I know their rates average from twenty-two to forty-eight cents per hundred less than those of the old-line companies and you know what a saving that is. We also have another company, the Minster Mutual. The company covers a good deal of territory. It extends to a number of counties, and I know about one-half of the people in our town are insured in this company. I have been insured with them for twenty-four years and as a mutual company it is the cheapest I have known. It is the cheapest insurance I have ever been in. They have done business for more than twenty years and since the decision of the attorney general that it would be illegal to insure school houses and other public buildings in a mutual company, outside companies have come in and are trying to do business on the strength of the attorney general's decision.

Mr. WINN: You understand that if the amendment offered by Mr. Miller is adopted it merely cuts out the state insurance proposition and leaves all the rest intact?

Mr. FOX: Yes; I was opposed to that. I was looking at the interest of our people. If that is inserted I am in favor of it.

Mr. WINN: We are in favor of that, but the Miller amendment is a substitute for the minority report.

Mr. KNIGHT: No; the majority report for the minority report.

Mr. WINN: All right.

Mr. FOX: I also object to the state going into business. It is not best. I would not favor the state launching into that, but otherwise I would like to see the proposal pass.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to make two motions—that is, that further consideration of the pending matter be deferred and that it be placed at the head of the calendar for tomorrow. Then I want to follow that with a motion to adjourn to Chillicothe. I now offer the first motion.

Mr. WINN: I move that that motion be laid on the table, and on that I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 41, nays 39, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Beyer,	Hoskins,	Peters,
Collett,	Johnson, Williams,	Pettit,
Colton,	Jones,	Pierce,
Cordes,	King,	Riley,
Crites,	Kramer,	Rockel,
Cunningham,	Lambert,	Roehm,
Davio,	Lampson,	Rorick,
Donahay,	Leete,	Shaffer,
Halenkamp,	Leslie,	Smith, Geauga,
Halfhill,	Longstreth,	Stokes,
Harbarger,	Ludey,	Thomas,
Harris, Hamilton,	Okey,	Winn,
Harter, Huron,	Partington,	Woods.
Harter, Stark,	Peck,

Those who voted in the negative are:

Baum,	Fox,	Price,
Beatty, Morrow,	Harris, Ashtabula,	Solether,
Beatty, Wood,	Hoffman,	Stalter,
Bowdle,	Hursh,	Stevens,
Cassidy,	Kilpatrick,	Stewart,
Cody,	Knight,	Stilwell,
Crosser,	Kunkel,	Taggart,
Dunlap,	Malin,	Tannehill,
Dunn,	Marriott,	Tetlow,
Dwyer,	Marshall,	Ulmer,
Earnhart,	McClelland,	Walker,
Fackler,	Miller, Crawford,	Watson,
Fluke,	Moore,	Wise.

So the motion was tabled.

Mr. STEVENS: I move that we adjourn to meet tomorrow at Chillicothe.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is out of order.

Mr. CORDES: I move the previous question on the Miller proposal.

The PRESIDENT: The chair wants to state for the benefit of the gentleman making the motion that there was a motion before the house.

Mr. STEVENS: I withdraw the motion to recess.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. STILWELL: I move to adjourn.

Mr. WINN: I demand the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. STILWELL: I second the demand.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 38, nays 54, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Beatty, Morrow,	Dunn,	Hahn,
Beatty, Wood,	Dwyer,	Halenkamp,
Cassidy,	Earnhart,	Harbarger,
Crosser,	Fackler,	Harris, Ashtabula,
Donahay,	Farrell,	Hoffman,

Knight,	Solether,	Thomas,
Kunkel,	Stalter,	Ulmer,
Leslie,	Stevens,	Walker,
Malin,	Stewart,	Watson,
Marshall,	Stilwell,	Wise.
McClelland,	Taggart,

Those who voted in the negative are:

Anderson,	Harter, Stark,	Miller, Fairfield,
Baum,	Henderson,	Okey,
Beyer,	Holtz,	Partington,
Bowdle,	Hoskins,	Peck,
Cody,	Johnson, Williams,	Peters,
Collett,	Jones,	Pettit,
Colton,	Kehoe,	Pierce,
Cordes,	Keller,	Read,
Crites,	King,	Riley,
Cunningham,	Kramer,	Rockel,
Davio,	Lambert,	Roehm,
Dunlap,	Lampson,	Rorick,
Fess,	Leete,	Shaffer,
Fluke,	Longstreth,	Smith, Geauga,
Fox,	Ludey,	Stokes,
Halfhill,	Matthews,	Tallman,
Harris, Hamilton,	Mauck,	Winn,
Harter, Huron,	Miller, Crawford,	Woods.

So the motion to adjourn was lost.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 87, nays 4, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Harter, Stark,	Peck,
Baum,	Hoffman,	Peters,
Beatty, Morrow,	Holtz,	Pettit,

Harbarger,	Moore,	Winn,
Harris, Hamilton,	Okey,	Wise,
Harter, Huron,	Partington,	Woods.

Those who voted in the negative are: Cunningham, Halfhill, Harris, of Ashtabula, and Price.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 51—Mr. Miller of Crawford. To submit an amendment to article VIII, section 6, of the constitution.—Relative to permitting public property being insured in mutual associations and companies.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE VIII.

SECTION 6. The general assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town or township, by vote of its citizens, or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint stock company, corporation, or association whatever; or to raise money for, or to loan its credit to, or in aid of any such company, corporation, or association;

Providing however; that nothing in this section shall prevent public buildings or property being insured in mutual fire insurance associations or companies.

The general assembly may provide by law for the regulation of all rates charged or to be charged by any insurance company, corporation or association organized under the laws of this state or doing any insurance business in this state for profit.

Mr. Lampson moved that the vote whereby Proposal No. 51 was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. Lampson moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was carried.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. Stilwell arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on the motion to lay Proposal No. 16, by Mr. Elson, on the table. His name being called, Mr. Stilwell voted "no."

Mr. Winn arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on the motion to lay Proposal No. 16, by Mr. Elson, on the table. His name being called, Mr. Winn voted "aye."

Mr. Hoskins arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 331, by Mr. Walker. His name being called, Mr. Hoskins voted "no."

Mr. Halfhill arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 331, by Mr. Walker. His name being called, Mr. Halfhill voted "no."

Mr. Marshall arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 331, by Mr. Walker. His name being called, Mr. Marshall voted "aye."

The PRESIDENT: The president desires to call attention to the fact that he is not going to permit this any more. If the delegates are not here they will not be permitted to vote.

Mr. ANDERSON: The regular order.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 330.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. DWYER: I want to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "fifth" and in lieu thereof insert the word "fourth".

In line 8 strike out the word "fifth" and in lieu thereof insert the word "fourth".

Strike out lines 11, 12 and 13 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Appellate Court Districts — Creating Office of Superintendent of Public Instruction.

"The counties of Delaware, Morrow, Richland, Ashland, Wayne, Stark, Tuscarawas, Holmes, Knox, Coshocton, Muskingum, Morgan and Perry shall constitute the fifth appellate court judicial district."

In line 17 strike out the comma and in lieu thereof insert the word "and" and strike out the words "and Washington".

In line 19 between the words "of" and "Franklin" insert "Licking, Fairfield."

Mr. DWYER: I will explain very briefly what the object of the proposal is so that you can understand it. Twenty-five years ago the state was divided into eight circuits. At that time we had about three million people in Ohio. Now we have nearly five millions, and we have the same eight circuits still. At the present time some of those circuits have too much work and the judges cannot do justice to the work they have to do. This circuit has eleven counties—Franklin, with a large city, Montgomery, with a large city, and Clark county with a large city. In addition to that the attorney general has a right to bring suits in this county from any part of the state, so that the circuit court of this county has more work than it can attend to and this circuit is overloaded. The lawyers in our county are complaining that the judges cannot give the time to the work that they should. They cannot give the cases the consideration that they should. Now, especially if we are going to make an appellate court a court of final jurisdiction, it will need more time. We want carefully prepared decisions by the appellate court hereafter if it is to be a court of final jurisdiction in most cases. It was to relieve that situation that I offered this proposal. This only affects the second circuit. For example, the proposition is to put seven counties into one circuit and call it the second circuit, and then the other four counties with two counties from the fifth circuit will make the tenth circuit. Judge Taggart says that this circuit has eighteen counties, that they have fifteen hundred cases on the docket and that the judges cannot get through with their work. The proposition is to take the two counties from that circuit and let them be thrown in with Franklin county and take Fairfield and Licking and put them in with these counties, which will make six counties in this circuit, and that will put seven in the Montgomery circuit. That is all the disturbance we make in this part of the state. Mr. Anderson has said that work in his part of the state is growing very rapidly and those counties up there have iron works and all that and are growing so rapidly that he says they cannot do the work in his district. He wants to divide that district. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. RILEY: This proposal was recommended by the Judiciary committee?

Mr. DWYER: Yes.

Mr. RILEY: Everybody is ready to vote on it I think.

Mr. PETTIT: I want to say a word. This is the first time that I have heard of judges being much overworked. Down in our district they are playing most of the time. In Adams county they didn't have a case last term. In Brown county they had one. At Portsmouth they have a little and at Ironton they have a little, and outside of that there is very little to do. I am opposed to making any more circuits.

Mr. PRICE: I move that the proposal and the amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 96, which the secretary will read.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. FESS: I want the Convention to bear with me not over ten minutes.

Mr. PECK: That is a good while tonight.

Mr. FESS: I am running a great risk because eighteen men can defeat this proposal. I would very much rather not have it considered now, but I see the situation we are in and we must bring it to the test. I have been anxious that we should make the educational department of the state the most important thing next to the governor, as it really ought to be. I think there are no interests that are dearer to the state than the educational interests, and what I would like to make possible is to create a state department of education that would be ranked as it ought to be ranked. As it now stands everybody knows that the educational department of Ohio has no constitutional rating. It is not even mentioned in the constitution. It has no recognition so far as power is required. It is remarkable what the department has been able to do, but that is because of the devotion of the men who have been at the head of it. If the present commissioner had the power commensurate with the importance of educational work he could do so much more than is possible under the situation now existing. This is what I want to do, to make the head of the department of education an appointive officer, so that we can secure efficiency in the department. Give the power to the governor to appoint the head so that the educators of the state and other people can unite upon some leader and say to the governor that they would like to have this man. If the governor believes that the man is the person the teachers of the state can be heard in the matter. Then if the governor appoints him for four years, and he proves a good official, the governor can reappoint him. At present he is in politics, nominated at the tail end of the convention, when it is tired. The selection is often the result of geography. We want to take it out if possible. So I ask you men if you can see your way clear to do it to take this department out of politics so far as possible and put it within our power to secure a man like Superintendent Dwyer of Cincinnati or others who could not be induced to go into a political struggle. But if he could be appointed he could easily be secured. We cannot reach the rank in the educational work of Ohio we should have unless we can make some change. I am going to risk this. I am going to ask you to vote your confidence in a department of education so that we will be in the same position that Pennsylvania is. Twenty years ago a democratic governor appointed a democratic head of the educational department, and when that democrat was superseded by a republican the teachers united upon Dr. Shaffer, the incumbent, and he was reappointed. A second republican governor reappointed him, and a third, and a fourth, and a fifth. All of these reappointments came because he is a great educator. He never could have been continued in that position if the position had been elective. Make it possible for us to get a man like that and put him in office, not for the sake of the politicians but for the sake of the schools of Ohio.

Creating Office of Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Mr. PETTIT: Does this do away with the state school commissioner?

Mr. FESS: The name is changed, but the same officer is provided with additional powers.

Mr. PIERCE: I was going to make the same inquiry. I want to know if it makes an additional officer?

Mr. FESS: No, sir.

Mr. FACKLER: I am for the proposal if it does not.

Mr. KING: Section 3 authorizes a school commissioner.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I was going to call attention to that.

Mr. FESS: There is only the one officer.

Mr. THOMAS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the word "four" in the seventh line and insert the word "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOSKINS: I don't think changes should be made so fast unless they can show some reason for them. I don't much like this appointing power.

Mr. PRICE: It seems to me on this proposition there is room for radical difference of opinion. I don't see that we are going to keep it away from politics. I believe time will demonstrate if this man is appointed the head of the system that the office will drift into politics and we will have politics in the public schools.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 66, nays 22, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Fackler,	Holtz,

Halfhill,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 96—Mr. Fess. To submit an amendment by adding section 4 to article VI, of the constitution.—Relative to the office of superintendent of public instruction.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE VI.

SEC. 4. A superintendent of public instruction shall be included as one of the officers of the executive department to be appointed by the governor, for the term of two years, with such powers as may be prescribed by law.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. Harter, of Huron, arose to a question of privilege and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 272, by Mr. FitzSimons. His name being called Mr. Harter, of Huron, voted "aye."

Mr. Marriott arose to a question of privilege and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 15, by Mr. Riley. His name being called, Mr. Marriott voted "aye."

Leave of absence for Thursday was granted to Mr. Stilwell, Mr. Walker and Mr. Tetlow.

On motion of Mr. Lampson the Convention adjourned.

SEVENTY-SECOND DAY

AFTERNOON SESSION.

CHILlicothe, O., THURSDAY, May 9, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. Howard B. Cooper, of Chillicothe, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DOTY: I demand a call of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: A call of the Convention is demanded. The sergeant-at-arms will close the doors and the secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Brown, Lucas,	Harris, Hamilton,	Stilwell,
DeFrees,	Malin,	Tetlow,
Donahey,	Norris,	Walker,
Farnsworth,	Smith, Hamilton,	Worthington.
FitzSimons,

The PRESIDENT: There are one hundred and six members present.

Mr. DOTY: I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I have a resolution that is necessary for the conduct of our future business, and I would like to dispose of that before we go any farther.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 124:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourns at Chillicothe, May 9, 1912, it be to meet in the hall of the house of representatives, in the state house, in Columbus, Ohio, at the time regularly set.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and this resolution be considered at this time?

The rules were suspended.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. KERR: I desire unanimous consent to offer a resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT: Will the member withhold the resolution for a moment?

Mr. KERR: Yes.

The PRESIDENT: Chillicothe, the first capital of Ohio, was founded in April, 1796, by Nathaniel Massie, of Virginia. In 1800 it became the capital of the Northwest Territory.

Chillicothe grew rapidly, and in 1798 the honorable, the court of quarter sessions, authorized Thomas Worthington and others, designated "gentlemen", to buy a site and build a court house. This was the old stone square state house, which stood on the site of the present Ross county court house. It was the first public stone building in the territory. The territorial legislature met in it in 1801, and here, on Monday, November 1, 1802, met the first constitutional convention, authorized by the enabling act passed by congress, April 30, 1802. The first state assembly met here in April, 1803. The first constitutional convention, was composed of thirty-four members and was in session twenty-nine days. The members were:

Adams county—Joseph Darlington, Israel Donalson, Thomas Kirker.

Belmont county—James Caldwell, Elijah Woods.

Clermont county—Philip Gatch, James Sargent.

Fairfield county—Henry Abrams, Emanuel Carpenter.

Hamilton county—John W. Browne, Charles Willing Byrd, Francis Dunlavy, William Goforth, John Kitchel, Jeremiah Morrow, John Paul, John Reily, John Smith, John Wilson.

The grandson of Jeremiah Morrow is with us today, and he bears the same name. I ask him to arise.

[The gentleman indicated arose.]

Jefferson county—Rudolph Bair, George Humphrey, John Milligan, Nathan Updegraff, Bazaleel Wells.

Ross county—Edward Tiffin, Michael Baldwin, James Grubb, Nathaniel Massie, Thomas Worthington.

There are descendants present of two of Ross county's delegates to this first convention. The great-grandson of Edward Tiffin is here and I ask Hon. Robert W. Manley to arise. [The gentleman indicated arose.]

The grandson of Nathaniel Massie, the Hon. D. M. Massie, is also present, and I will ask him to arise. [The gentleman indicated arose.]

Trumbull county—David Abbott, Samuel Huntington.

Washington county—Ephraim Cutler, Benjamin Ives Gilman, John McIntire, Rufas Putnam.

Edward Tiffin was president and Thomas Scott, secretary, both of Chillicothe. The Convention was in session only twenty-nine days, for on November 29, 1802, the first constitution was signed.

The old state house stood until 1852, when it was torn down to make way for the present court house. The fence in front of the jail, on Main street, is part of the original fence around state house square.

Chillicothe remained the state capital until 1810, and again from 1812 to 1816. From the old town came the following governors: Edward Tiffin, 1803-'07; Thomas Worthington, 1814-'18; Duncan McArthur, 1830-'32; William Allen, 1874-'76.

The great-grandson of Governor McArthur and grandson of Governor Allen, in the person of William Allen Scott, is here today, and I ask him to arise. [The gentleman indicated arose.]

A plaster medallion of Edward Tiffin is above my head. An oil portrait of Governor St. Clair is beneath the medallion of Tiffin. Over the door to my right is a picture of Governor Allen. On the wall to my right is an oil painting of Nathaniel Massie. Over the door to my left is a portrait of Governor McArthur. On the wall to my left is a portrait of James Ross, the pioneer whose name Ross county bears. Before me is the constitutional convention table, the old journal, the weather vane and the bell of the first capitol building of Ohio.

The president recognized the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON].

Mr. LAMPSON: As you were reading this most interesting bit of history, I was reminded of the fact that Resolution of Thanks to Citizens of Chillicothe.

this section of Ohio is sometimes called the "Southern Reserve." There are many delegates of this Convention who come from the Western Reserve, and as you read that Chillicothe was first settled in 1796, it reminded me of the fact that the first settlement in the Western Reserve was in my county of Ashtabula in the same year of 1796. Eighty-four years after the first constitutional convention of Ohio was held in this city I served in the general assembly of Ohio with the representative from this county, John C. Enriken, who was then speaker of the house of representatives. It was my fortune to succeed him as speaker of the house of representatives. As you read further along I was agreeably reminded of the fact that Senator D. M. Massie, who was mentioned in your report and who arose on the right of the hall, also served with me in the senate of Ohio. So while the Western Reserve and the Southern Reserve of Ohio are widely separated, after all we have been most closely associated in building up one of the greatest states of our great republic.

Since we came into your beautiful city today we have been many times reminded of the fact that Chillicothe is all right, and the first thing that impressed me with that feeling was the happy, hearty welcome that was extended to us by innumerable school children, indicating conclusively that in the creed of Chillicothe there is no place for race suicide. And it is in these innumerable school children that the hope, not only of our great commonwealth, but of our great republic rests.

Mr. STOKES: Mr. President: This Convention should not recess until it is satisfied that it has treated every individual and every proposal and the work of every committee with absolute fairness. I voted yesterday morning to table the proposal of the gentleman from Athens [Mr. ELSON] feeling that the majority of the Convention was against the proposal; and because we had so much to do, I thought it was proper to dispose of the proposal in that way. Since that time I have regretted my vote, and for the purpose of placing this Convention absolutely right before the people and so we can go from here without a single regret, I move that the vote by which the proposal was laid on the table be reconsidered.

Mr. DOTY: I make the point of order that the motion to reconsider such a motion is out of order.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken.

Mr. WOODS: I move that the Elson proposal be taken from the table.

Mr. DOTY: That motion is out of order at this time. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT: Resolution No. 118—Mr. Lampson, is the regular order.

Mr. KERR: I offered a resolution a while ago and withdrew it at the request of the president. It will take only a moment to dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member from Ashtabula yield?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes.

Mr. KERR: I offer a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 125:

WHEREAS, The table upon which the first constitution of the state of Ohio was signed by the members of the constitutional convention in 1802 is yet in existence and in possession of Mr. Frederick A. Stacy at Chillicothe; therefore, be it Resolved, That Mr. John L. Baum, delegate to this Convention from Ross county, be appointed a committee of one to procure, if possible, the loan of said table for the purpose of signing thereon by the members of this Convention the fourth constitution of the state of Ohio.

Mr. KERR: I move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution be considered immediately.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CRITES: I offer a resolution:

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 126:

Be it resolved by the Fourth Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, assembled this ninth day of May, 1912, on the historic site on which the first constitution of the state was drafted and amid surroundings reminiscent of the great men of the past who have helped to lay broad and deep the foundations on which the free institutions and prosperity of our state have been erected,

That, in token of our appreciation of the hospitality this day extended to us, we tender our sincere thanks to the citizens of Chillicothe for their kind invitation to visit a city which has played so important a part in the history of our state and for the royal manner in which we have been entertained by them.

We congratulate them on the many evidences of enduring prosperity which are apparent on every hand and we hope that Chillicothe, which has in the past produced so many whose names are blazoned forth on the pages of our nation's history, may continue to be the mother of statesmen among the cities of Ohio.

We desire especially to emphasize our thanks to Colonel Enderlin and the ladies of Chillicothe for the bountiful and delicious luncheon with which they provided us. By their presence and efforts they have done much to add to the enjoyment of this happy occasion and to render our session here an event to which we, one and all, will look back with pleasure.

Mr. CRITES: I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution be considered at once.

The motion was carried.

Mr. FESS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I think we ought to express the unanimous appreciation of the Convention of this great courtesy which has given us so much pleasure. I am sure there is not a member here, no matter how much he feels the honor of being a member of the Convention, who does not feel a still greater honor in sitting in this place. Therefore, I hope the roll will be called and that all of us may be found on the roll answering in favor of the resolution.

The question being "Shall the resolution be adopted?"

Form of Ballot Submitting Amendments to the People.

Mr. DOTY: Do I understand that Mr. Brattain even voted in the affirmative?

Mr. BRATTAIN: Yes, and I voted for other good things too.

RESOLUTIONS LAID OVER.

The PRESIDENT: The order of business is Resolution No. 118. The member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] is recognized.

The resolution was read.

Mr. LAMPSON: I shall occupy but a very few moments. A few days ago I introduced Resolutions Nos. 118 and 119, suggesting plans of ballots for the submission of the work of the Convention. Since that time Mr. Donahey has introduced a further resolution upon the same subject. My idea in introducing these resolutions was simply to get before the delegates of the Convention a basis upon which to construct some plans for the submission of our work. The first plan of ballot will be found on page 4 in the journal. You will notice that there is a circle at the top of the ballot, "To vote for all the amendments mark X within the circle." If a voter desires to vote for all the amendments he can mark an X in the circle. If he desires to vote for nearly all of them, it would be easier to mark within a circle and then go down the column and mark a cross in the square against those that he didn't want to vote for.

Mr. HOSKINS: Are you working on Resolution No. 118 or Resolution No. 119?

Mr. LAMPSON: No. 118. Now, I am committed personally, but I am not going to make any sort of argument for or against any of these different plans. I will say first that the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, of which I am a member, has agreed to report the titles as indicated here as far as they go. Of course this only goes down to title No. 9. The first proposal, amendment No. 1, is an amendment to article I, section 5, "Reform of the Civil Jury System." That is the title the committee has agreed to recommend for that amendment, and it connects up with what precedes the ballot in the printed part of the resolution, the idea being that preceding the resolution finally, when we come to agree upon all of our work, will be all of the amendments in one grand review, as Mr. Doty expresses it here, so that the resolution that is adopted, if one should be adopted on this plan, will be referred back to all the amendments, put upon one piece of paper and then entered up with the resolution, "Article I, section 5, Reform of the Jury System," will be a sufficient description to connect it with the amendment in detail as it appears, my idea being that every delegate will sign a piece of paper having all the amendments we adopt certified to by the president and secretary.

In this first ballot the affirmative and negative are printed, the negative immediately following the affirmative, and there is an opportunity for any one who desires to vote against any amendment or all amendments to do so by placing an X in the space before the word "against," but the affirmative has somewhat the advantage, the voter being able to vote for all the amendments at once by simply making one mark and the advantage might very likely belong to the affirmative. The presumption might be fairly said to be that the work of the Convention was going to be approved, and if anyone was opposed to it he should be put to a little more trouble to vote against all amendments than if he wanted to vote for all. That is the theory of that ballot.

The next ballot contains simply the titles, "Reform of the Civil Jury System." This ballot was not completed when sent to the printer. Instead of using "for" and "against" the words "yes" and "no" are used; the idea being to put a cross mark before the word "yes" if you desire to vote for it, and before the word "no" if you desire to vote against it.

While we have been laboring under the impression that the ballot would be very long, as a matter of fact it will not be very long, even with the titles of all our proposals printed upon a single ballot.

The other plan, which is in Resolution No. 119, involves double columns with a circle at the head of each column, with the affirmative in the first column and the negative in the second column, and opportunity to vote for all the proposals by putting a cross mark in the circle at the head of the first column and also opportunity to vote against all proposals by putting a cross mark in the circle at the head of the second column. Having placed a mark in the circle at the top of the first column, if the voter desires to vote against some one or two amendments, he can go over to the second column and place his cross mark before the word "against" in the space provided for it there, just as you do with the two-party ticket. If you have a republican and democratic ticket and you want to vote largely for the democrats you mark in the circle, and then if you want to vote for a few of the republicans, you go over and go down the column and mark opposite the name you desire to vote for.

Form of Ballot Submitting Amendments to the People.

There is opportunity on either of these ballots, as far as that is concerned, for every voter to vote his choice.

Now I do not desire to take up much of the time, because the best way to understand these ballots is for the individual delegates first to read the resolution to see what is aimed at and then examine carefully the ballot.

Mr. ANTRIM: How many people in the state of Ohio would vote against the whole forty-two amendments we have adopted?

Mr. LAMPSON: I would not think very many intelligent voters would vote against all.

Mr. ANTRIM: For that reason I think only one circle would be necessary. I do not think even Mr. Brattain would vote against all of them.

Mr. BRATTAIN: I promise not to vote against all of them.

Mr. PECK: I desire to make a suggestion for the benefit of the committee and the Convention. It is primarily for the committee. Perhaps it might be a good idea to print this ballot in the form of a pamphlet, the first page to be the ballot and the remaining pages to contain the constitution with all the amendments so that every man who votes for it will vote for the constitution before him.

Mr. LAMPSON: That is a good suggestion. My purpose is that the two resolutions I have introduced and the one by Mr. Donahey may all go to the committee on Submission, but I do not want to cut off anybody from expressing an opinion.

The PRESIDENT: The member moves that these ballots, together with the suggestion from Mr. Peck, be referred to the committee on Submission and Address to the People.

Mr. LAMPSON: If any delegate wishes to make any remarks or ask any questions I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. KING: I think the resolutions should be referred, but perhaps the Convention might avoid getting in a snarl by giving instructions that the blanks should be filled with the words, "September 14, 1912."

Mr. DOTY: I make that motion, only I believe I would rather have it "September 6, 1912."

Mr. KING: Do you want it on Friday?

Mr. DOTY: No.

Mr. EARNHART: A number of us—at least in my case—in campaigning for election to the position we occupy, expressly promised that the much mooted liquor question should be offered in a separate amendment and on a separate ballot. That was incorporated in the proposal as the proposal passed. It is also in the woman's suffrage proposal.

Mr. CROSSER: I rise to a point of order. It does not strike me that matter is up for consideration. It must be referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT: The question is debatable and the member from Warren has the floor.

Mr. EARNHART: I move that as provided in the Donahey resolution, the liquor license proposal and the woman's suffrage proposal shall be separate from the others. My reasons for that are, as I commenced to state before I was interrupted, that in the Convention and before the election to the Convention, when these matters were being discussed, it was the opinion and understanding and desire, so far as I could find out, that these matters should be submitted separately.

Mr. LAMPSON: I rise to a point of order. The question of amending these resolutions is not now up.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken and the motion is not in order.

Mr. EARNHART: I fully believe we should give this matter a little more consideration. I am only actuated by a desire to secure the approval of our work here.

Now let us be fair with ourselves and let us be fair with the people. I believe if we put the circle at the top whereby we can vote for the whole thing and do not put a circle at the top whereby we can vote against every thing, the newspapers will come out and say we are seeking to take undue advantage. You know in the debate that followed the matter of exemption of bonds from, or rather the restoration of bonds to, taxation, it was asserted, and truthfully so, that the people were tricked in the matter of exempting bonds from taxation because of the fact that the parties had indorsed it and the people voted for the exemption without any knowledge of what they were doing. Now let us be fair with the people and with ourselves, and let us submit at least those two separately. The rest I do not care for.

Mr. PRICE: I think we are at liberty to make a suggestion now, and I suggest that when the committee takes the matter under consideration that the time for opening and closing the polls, 5:30 o'clock a. m. and 5:30 o'clock p. m., be changed to 6 o'clock as the statute fixes now. I suggest that that be considered. Quite a number of us have discussed the matter and have another suggestion. We think that all of the circles should be kept off the top and that each one of these amendments should be voted on separately. I do not think there should be any circles on the top at all. I think every man who votes should vote for or against a particular amendment.

Mr. NYE: I would like to have our work approved, but if this is submitted so that a voter can vote for all of the amendments by making one cross mark, it seems to me an equal right should be given to vote against all by making one cross mark. If you wish to submit so each voter must vote for or against each proposition, I am content with that, but it seems to me it would not be fair to the voters of the state to permit them to make a cross mark in the circle to vote for all the propositions and not allow the same privilege in the way of voting against the propositions by one cross mark. The same right should be extended in the one case as in the other.

Mr. MARRIOTT: May I inquire whether the Convention will or will not have a right to consider all of these matters when the committee reports back, and is there any necessity that we take up the time now on this matter?

Form of Ballot Submitting Amendments to the People—Petitions and Memorials.

Mr. NYE: Certainly, but I understood that suggestions were in order.

Mr. HOSKINS: Just a matter of information to find out where we are. As I understand it, there is a motion pending to insert a date, September 6 or 7.

Mr. DOTY: That was out of order.

Mr. HOSKINS: I didn't know you ever did anything out of order.

Mr. DOTY: I did this time.

Mr. HOSKINS: To what committee is this question of fixing the date or reporting it out to the Convention to be assigned?

The PRESIDENT: The committee on Submission and Address to the People.

Mr. HOSKINS: Another question: Is that committee to take care of the question as to when these different amendments will go into effect?

The PRESIDENT: No; the committee on Schedule will attend to that.

Mr. HOSKINS: For instance, I am concerned about the question of the election of common pleas judges. Will the committee on Schedule report the time and manner of that amendment's going into effect?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: If I may give some information that will help the committee on Phraseology, we are to have a joint meeting of the committees on Arrangement and Phraseology and Schedule and Submission to the People, so we can do our work together and submit the reports to the Convention.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want some information on that because some of the amendments that we have adopted conflict with existing provisions.

Mr. DOTY: That is always the case and that will be provided for by the Schedule committee.

The chair recognized the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Fess].

Mr. ELSON: The chair recognized me.

The PRESIDENT: The chair recognized the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Fess].

Mr. FESS: We can not do anything here except simply refer these resolutions to the committee and let the committee bring them back. Then we can amend any way we wish. I therefore move the previous question on this matter.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I believe the president recognized the gentleman from Athens [Mr. ELSON].

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall debate close?

Mr. EBY: I rise to a point of order, or rather to ask for information. If this goes to that committee, is the committee bound by the three suggestions only?

The PRESIDENT: No.

The main question was ordered.

The motion to refer was carried.

Mr. COLTON: I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Portage will make a statement unless there is objection.

Mr. COLTON: Upon solicitation of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology it was thought best to state to the delegates the manner in which we proposed to submit our reports to the people for consideration, as that report will be one of the main things before you after you come back from recess. We propose when you come back to have a book containing all of the proposals that have been passed. The proposals will be arranged in the order submitted, and each proposal will be printed on white paper as passed by the Convention. Then following that, on a different colored paper, will be our report, containing every suggestion we make, which will follow line for line the engrossed copy, and following that on a different colored paper still, so that you can distinguish them readily, will be the proposal as it will appear if the suggestions of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology are approved. We hope in this way to put the matter before you so you can decide easily whether our changes are proper or not, and we hope also that you will be able after the first meeting of the Convention to study beforehand and be ready to approve or disapprove when the matter comes before you.

The PRESIDENT: The president will ask Judge Dennis Dwyer, the senior member of the Convention, to take the chair.

Mr. Dwyer thereupon took the chair as presiding officer.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: Gentlemen of the Convention: I express to the president and to you my hearty thanks for the honor you now confer upon me. It is really gratifying to occupy a chair in the city where the first constitutional convention in the state of Ohio was held. My age gives me this honor and I am proud of my age and I am proud of the honor, and I am glad to meet you all and be here in the city of Chillicothe where the first convention was held. I thank you, gentlemen, for the courtesy you have extended me.

Mr. LAMPSON: I suggest that before we adjourn we unite in singing "America", and I ask Mr. Stewart and Mr. Redington and any other good singers to lead.

VOICES: Mr. Campbell.

Messrs. Stewart, Redington and Campbell came forward and led in the singing of "America", which was joined in by the entire Convention and visitors.

SEVENTY-THIRD DAY

AFTERNOON SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, May 22, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the member from Knox, the Rev. Mr. McClelland.

The journal of Thursday, May 9, was read and approved.

Mr. TAGGART: Mr. President: Just a brief word of explanation. In order to expedite business, it is the desire of the committee on Schedule that a certain proposal be introduced in order that it may be engrossed and printed and be referred back to the committee. While it is not in form, we desire to have it printed to get the matter in shape.

By unanimous consent the following proposal was introduced and read the first time:

Proposal No. 340—Mr. Taggart. To submit an amendment to schedule No. 4.

Mr. Colton submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 174—Mr. Mauck, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends its indefinite postponement for the reason that the substance thereof has been incorporated in Proposal No. 72.

Mr. COLTON: By unanimous consent I want to make a brief statement explaining. The committee on Phraseology was at work steadily here during last week the entire time until Thursday night, reviewing the proposals, and a subcommittee was at work from that time until now reviewing the proof from the printer. The result of the work is embodied in the books on your tables. If you will turn to the first page you will find a list of the proposals on which we have reported. There are eleven reports found in this book. We were not ready to report all this afternoon, but will promise the others later. This report consists of three parts. You will find the subject of Proposal No. 24, the first one passed, on white paper. It is the engrossed proposal as it passed this Convention. Following this, on pink paper, you will find the report of the committee, referring to the engrossed proposal by lines and suggesting certain changes. Following this, on buff paper is the proposal as it will appear if the amendments suggested by the committee are incorporated in it. So it will be fairly easy for the members to make comparison and determine whether the amendments are proper or not. We have done the work with a great deal of care and we have read and reread the proof again and again, but we can hardly hope to have detected every possible inaccuracy or error. We have done our work as carefully and as well as the time permitted.

Mr. MAUCK: I think it is apparent that the provisions of Proposal No. 72 and Proposal No. 174 should be incorporated in one proposal and I consent that Proposal No. 174 be indefinitely postponed, calling attention to the fact that Proposal No. 72 as reported by the committee needs further amendment than that submitted by the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology. I merely call the attention of the committee to it because the last sentence in the amended Proposal No. 72, being that part of Proposal No. 174 that has been drawn from Proposal No. 72, "laws may be passed regulating the sale and conveyance of other personal property," is in effect an article wholly devoted to corporations, and if the ordinary rule of construction of a constitutional or statutory provision should prevail that would be construed in pari materia—if the member from Highland [Mr. Brown] will excuse the latin expression—and it would probably be held that this provision only applies to the sale and conveyance of personal property belonging to corporations. If that sentence is amended that laws may be passed regulating the sale and conveyance of other personal property, whether owned by a corporation, partnership or individual, the purpose of both proposals I think will be effectually expressed.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The report of the committee was agreed to and Proposal No. 174 indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COLTON: I offer a report.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 72—Mr. Stokes, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

In the title change "8" to "2".

Strike out all after the dash in the title and insert: "Regulation of corporations and sale of personal property."

In line 4 change comma to period and strike out "Section 2".

In line 5 before "Corporation" insert "Sec. 2".

In lines 6 and 7 eliminate paragraph.

In line 9 change "stock" to "stocks".

In line 10 change "stock" to "stocks".

After "law," in line 11 add: "Laws may be passed regulating the sale and conveyance of other personal property".

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the proposal be engrossed with the line numbers in accordance with the buff printed form and that it be read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: This refers to Proposal No. 72?

Mr. DOTY: That is all.

The motion was carried.

Mr. NYE: I offer a report.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 209—Mr. Tetlow, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Reports of Standing Committees.

Strike out title and insert:

"To submit an amendment by adding section 37 to article II, of the constitution.—Eight hour day on public work."

Strike out lines 4 to 9 and insert:

ARTICLE II.

"Sec. 37. Except in cases of extraordinary emergencies, not to exceed eight hours shall constitute a day's work, and not to exceed forty-eight hours a week's work, for laborers engaged on any public work carried on or aided by the state, or any political subdivision thereof, whether done by contract, or otherwise."

Mr. THOMAS: I think the language in line 7 should be changed to "laborers and mechanics," adding the words "and mechanics". "Laborers" might be construed to mean only those who do common labor.

Mr. DOTY: If this proposal is agreed to at this time it will go upon the calendar for tomorrow, which will give the member a chance to prepare any amendment he desires.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the proposal be placed on the calendar and be read the third time tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. FESS: I offer a report.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 24—Mr. Cordes, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out the title and insert: "To submit an amendment by adding section 35 to article II, of the constitution.—Workmen's compensation."

In line 5 change "Section 33" to "Sec. 35."

In lines 5 and 6 strike out "from a state fund".

In line 8 strike out "and administered by the state and".

In line 8 insert "state" between "a" and "fund".

In line 9 after "employers" strike out the semi-colon and insert: "and administered by the state,".

In line 10 insert a comma after "therefrom".

In line 11 strike out the third "e" in "employees".

In line 12 strike out "es" in "employees".

In line 14 strike out the third "e" in "employees".

In line 11 insert a semi-colon after "employers".

In line 16 change semi-colon to comma and insert "to".

In line 17 strike out "the general rule of" and insert "such".

In line 17 insert a comma after "classification".

In line 18 insert a comma after "fund".

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that the proposal be engrossed and placed upon the calendar for third reading tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Halfhill submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 236—Mr. Worthington, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out, in the title, all after dash and insert: "Investigations by each house of general assembly."

In line 2 strike out "Section 8 of Article II of".

In line 5 change "Section" to "Sec."

In line 9 strike out "other" and strike out the comma after "safety".

In line 11 insert a comma after "contemplation".

In line 11b insert a comma after "members".

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. COLTON: I move that that proposal be engrossed and placed upon the calendar for a third reading tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. ANTRIM: I offer a report.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 100—Mr. Fackler, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

In the title strike out all after the dash and insert: "Abolition of justices of the peace in certain cities."

In line 5 change "Section" to "Sec."

In line 7 change the period to colon and change capital "P" to lower case "p".

In line 8 strike out "there shall be" and change "justices" to "justice" and after "peace" insert "shall be elected."

In line 8 change "where" to "in which."

In line 9 insert commas after "is" and after "be."

In line 10 strike out "are given" and insert "have."

In line 10 change the second "justices" to "justice."

In line 11 insert commas after "have" and after "exercise".

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ANTRIM: I move that the proposal be engrossed and placed on the calendar for third reading tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. LAMPSON: I offer a report from the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Reports of Standing Committees.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 241—Mr. Dwyer, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out the title and insert:

To submit an amendment by adding section 38 to article II, of the constitution.—Removal of officials.

Between lines 3 and 4 insert sub-head ARTICLE II.

In line 4 change "Section 24a" to "Sec. 38."

In line 6 change capitals "G" and "A" to lower case "g" and "a".

In line 8 strike out "provided" and insert before the period, "authorized by the constitution."

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that this proposal be engrossed and placed upon the calendar for third reading tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. LAMPSON: I offer a report.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 118—Mr. Lampson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

In the title strike out all after dash and insert: "State bond limit for good roads."

In line 5 change "Section" to "Sec." and strike out "(Public Debt)."

In lines 8 and 13 change "G" and "A" to lower case "g" and "a".

In line 12 change period to colon.

In lines 12 and 13 eliminate paragraph.

In line 13 change capital "P" to lower case "p".

In line 15 strike out "of" and change "millions" to "million."

In line 16 insert "rebuilding" after "constructing."

In line 16 insert "repairing and" after "improving" and strike out the comma after "maintaining."

Strike out "repairing and" at the end of line 16.

In line 17 strike out "rebuilding."

In line 18 change semi-colon to a period and change "not" to "Not".

In line 18 change "millions" to "million" and strike out "of".

In line 18 change "in" to "of".

In line 20 strike out comma.

In line 21 strike out comma and insert "to" before "provide".

In line 21 strike out "final".

In lines 22 and 23 eliminate paragraph.

Strike out comma at the end of line 23.

Strike out all of line 24 after "cost" and insert: "of constructing, rebuilding, improving, repairing and maintaining the same shall be paid by the state."

In lines 24 and 25 eliminate paragraph.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that the proposal be engrossed and placed on the calendar for third reading tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Mr. ELSON: I offer a report from the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 122—Mr. Farrell, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended.

Strike out the title, and insert: "To submit an amendment by adding section 34 to article II of the constitution.—Welfare of employes."

Between lines 3 and 4 insert ARTICLE II.

In line 4 before "Laws" insert "Sec. 4."

In line 5 insert a comma after "wage".

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that the proposal be engrossed and placed upon the calendar for tomorrow for its third reading.

The motion was carried.

Mr. ANTRIM: I offer a report.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 166—Mr. Stilwell, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out the title and insert: "To submit an amendment by adding section 33 to article II of the constitution.—Mechanics' and builders' liens."

Between lines 3 and 4 insert sub-head "ARTICLE II."

In line 4 change "Section" to "Sec."

In line 4 insert a comma after "laborers".

In line 6 after "or" insert "for which they have".

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ANTRIM: I move that the proposal be engrossed and placed on the calendar for its third reading tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

Reports of Standing Committees—Invitation to Convention to meet at Cincinnati.

Mr. FESS: I offer a report relative to Proposal No. 54.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, to which was referred Proposal No. 54—Mr. Elson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all after dash in title and insert: "Reform of civil jury system."

In line 5 change "Section" to "Sec."

Strike out the semi-colon in line 5 and all of the remainder of line 5 and all of lines 6 and 7, and insert:

"except that, in civil cases, the general assembly may authorize the rendering of a verdict by not less than three-fourths of the jury."

Mr. LAMPSON: I want to call the attention of the committee on Phraseology to the fact that the committee voted to change that word "reform" in the title to "change", not to use the word "reform," that being a word rather indefinite in meaning.

Mr. DOTY: That is all right.

Mr. LAMPSON: We changed that.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that that be withdrawn from the Convention and referred to the committee to permit the committee to correct it.

Mr. DOTY: It is easy to correct it on third reading.

Mr. NORRIS: When are these reports open for discussion? As they are called up?

The PRESIDENT: Yes. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. DOTY: If there are no further reports, I move that the rules be suspended and that Proposal No. 340 be referred to the committee on Schedule. This is the proposal introduced this afternoon, and the plan is to refer it back to the committee so that the committee may make its report and save time.

Mr. PECK: What is it about?

Mr. DOTY: Schedule.

Mr. PECK: That doesn't tell us anything.

Mr. ANDERSON: I received a telephone call from Mr. Campbell stating that by reason of illness in his family he cannot be here today or tomorrow and requesting leave of absence.

Leave of absence was granted.

Mr. DOTY: The proposal introduced by Mr. Taggart is a proposal affecting the schedule. This has been introduced and read the first time, and under the rules it could not be referred until tomorrow. To expedite business I desire to have this proposal submitted to the committee on Schedule at this time.

The motion to submit was carried.

Mr. KILPATRICK: I offer a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 127:

Resolved, That the services of the sergeant-at-arms, J. C. Sherlock, be and are hereby continued for the period of ten days after the adjournment of this Convention for the purpose, and he is hereby instructed to procure boxes and all necessary material for packing and shipping the personal effects of the members; that he be and is hereby authorized to retain from the present force, the necessary help required not to exceed five persons; that said sergeant-at-arms and the persons so retained by him shall receive for such service the same per diem as is now being paid them by this Convention; that the president of the Convention is hereby authorized and instructed to sign vouchers therefor and for necessary material and express charges.

Mr. KILPATRICK: You have accumulated while here quite a good deal of property by way of proposal books and other things of that kind and it has been the custom in sessions of the legislature to have all these things boxed up and sent to our respective homes. It is necessary to have a resolution of this kind to have that done, and for that reason I would ask that the rules be suspended and the resolution be put on its passage.

Mr. DOTY: I agree with the general substance, but there is one word that may have to be changed. There is no hurry and I prefer to have it go over.

The PRESIDENT: Then the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. DOTY: I would like to state that the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology has made all the reports it is ready to make, and we expect to have all the rest or nearly all the rest reported tomorrow morning, which we think, with the proposal to be put upon the calendar tomorrow, will make a full day for tomorrow. There will be perhaps a few that we will have to report on Friday, but we can report every proposal by Friday morning, and perhaps by tomorrow afternoon they will be put in this book in numerical order, not in the order in which the proposals were passed, and thereby we can turn to them more readily. I therefore move that we adjourn until 9:30 tomorrow morning—no, I will withhold the motion to adjourn as Judge Peck has something to be offered at this time.

Mr. PECK: I take pleasure in presenting the following communication:

The Business Men's Club Co.

May 20, 1912.

Hon. HERBERT S. BIGELOW,

President of Ohio Constitutional Convention—
Columbus, Ohio.

Dear Mr. Bigelow:

The board of directors of the Business Men's Club of Cincinnati extend a most cordial invitation to all of the members of the Constitutional Convention now in session at Columbus to meet at a dinner to be given in the club house of our organization some evening in the near future convenient to your body. We shall be delighted to receive an early acceptance of this invitation and hope as many members as possible of your distinguished body will find it convenient and agreeable to accept this invitation.

Very sincerely yours,
The Business Men's Club Co.

Invitation to Convention to Meet in Cincinnati.

Mr. PECK: This is just what it purports to be, an invitation to dine with the Business Men's Club if you choose to do so, and to hold a meeting there. My idea is that it would be a graceful thing to hold our last meeting there. They are in earnest. They want to see you. They have nothing to ask, no axe to grind. It is simply a social matter. They want you to come to Cincinnati to enable them to show you how nicely you can be entertained there and how glad they will be to see you all. I hope the committee will be appointed and fix a date. They asked me to fix it when I was there and I said, "If you extend an invitation you had better leave it to the Convention to fix the day as no one knows when they can come." You observe the tone of the letter on that subject. My idea would be to consult with them and have the last meeting of the Convention there.

Mr. PRICE: I move that the invitation be received and that we take it up for consideration now.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: In order that we may have something to discuss I move that the invitation be accepted, but I want to call your attention to this situation: The chairman of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology has said the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology has been very busy working while the rest of the Convention has been away, for the sole purpose of making it possible to have an early adjournment; not with any idea of undue haste, but to make it possible to adjourn next Tuesday. Now if this Convention make up their minds to work until next week and stay here and begin early Monday morning, it is possible for us to do our work, as I think, and the members on the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology think, it will be possible for us to adjourn the Convention by Tuesday night, or at the very latest by Wednesday. The reason I have stated this is because of this invitation. If that program were carried out, it makes it possible, if we desire to conclude our work by Tuesday night, to then accept the invitation of the member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] and to hold our last session in Cincinnati on Wednesday. That is the only way that I can see where we can get through at this time and be reasonably sure in accepting the invitation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Be through here Tuesday?

Mr. DOTY: It is my guess. I have not fixed it positively.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Why suggest that?

Mr. DOTY: It is possible to get through Tuesday if we work all of the time until Tuesday, but if we recess Thursday we will not get through until June.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Following the reasoning of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty], if we accept that invitation we must necessarily compress the work into the time between now and then.

Mr. DOTY: Yes; perhaps between now and Monday we can come to a definite conclusion. I do not contend that we can get through on Tuesday, but if we are not going to work on Saturday and Monday the chances are very much against our getting through on Wednesday.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I want to call the attention of the member to the fact that we have found it exceedingly difficult to hold a quorum here on Friday and to hold this whole Convention over Sunday seems to be a large undertaking, even if they agree to stay.

Mr. DOTY: That is the reason I am telling them. If they don't desire to stay they can govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I dislike to get this thing in shape to be compressed. The invitation is fine, but I dislike to make that the closing day and fix the date.

Mr. DOTY: I just made the motion so as to have something discussed; not what is absolute but what is possible, and at any rate to continue up to Wednesday night.

Mr. PECK: The invitation is not conditioned upon anything. It is not conditioned upon the fact that you hold the last meeting there or that you fix the time to go. They will be glad to see you any time.

Mr. LAMPSON: Apropos of what the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] has been saying, I would call attention to the fact that next Thursday is Decoration day. A great many delegates have engagements for that. If we could get through before that we would have opportunity to fill engagements. The following week the state conventions of both parties are held, so that if we don't get through by Wednesday of next week it looks as though we might be here two or three weeks without accomplishing very much. I think every delegate in this Convention ought to make a sacrifice, to give attention to the business of this Convention now so that we can close it up in an orderly manner by Wednesday of next week.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I conclude that the argument of my colleague, if it means anything, means a Saturday session. My attention has been called to the fact that there are seventy county conventions held next Saturday. In the face of that what is the use of this talk?

Mr. DOTY: Those are partisan conventions.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: They are political conventions.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, and this is not a political body.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: No. And there are no candidates here and nobody cares anything about their political future either!

Mr. PRICE: I move to receive and discuss this matter now because this is about as good a time as any other time. So far as working Saturday is concerned, I don't think that cuts any figure. I do not think any man can say how long we are going to be here since accepting these reports, and I think the regular thing to do is to adjourn Friday and come back here regularly next week and then fix the time and go to Cincinnati. I have been down to that town and my experience was such that I would like to go back.

Mr. KING: All that is before us is to accept or decline the invitation. We are now approaching the first of June, and I am certainly in favor of working not only days but nights and Sundays if necessary.

DELEGATES: No, No.

Mr. KING: It is nonsense to stand here and talk about the county conventions of political parties. We have forty-two proposals. Let us go to work and dispose of them. It should not take the Convention beyond Invitation to Convention to Meet in Cincinnati—Reform of Jury System.

the date suggested by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY], if we work at it. I want to work at it and I want to get to the last of this Convention just as soon as we can do it. I do not want to hurry, but I am in favor of working until we finish.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I expect to be here Saturday myself. I am entirely willing to work Saturday. I have heard the same line of argument as advanced by the gentleman from Erie a half dozen times and I have been here Friday and Saturday and I have seen how it works out. I will be as glad to get through this as any one, but I want to look at the case as it is, in the light of our experience.

Mr. WINN: I am in favor of the adoption of the resolution by this Convention providing that from this time until the conclusion of the sessions there shall be no leaves of absence granted except by unanimous consent, and if anybody shall absent himself from the Convention without its consent he shall forfeit twenty dollars a day. I started to prepare such a resolution and I shall prepare it and offer it at the earliest possible moment. I am opposed to the acceptance of that invitation to visit Cincinnati. I am opposed to it because it has no place in a constitutional convention. I do not say that for this Convention to adjourn and hold a session in Cincinnati will discredit it. I mean it would not be a discredit to the Convention because the visit is to Cincinnati, but I say it will discredit this Convention to adjourn to meet any place except the place where it holds its sessions under the law. We are going to have enough when we get before the people in September—or whenever we appeal to them for approval or disapproval of our work—we are going to have enough to do if we succeed in obtaining the approval by the electors of the state of what we are doing, and every time we indulge in any frivolities we just simply drive off a certain number of votes. That is certain. There is no person here who would not be pleased to accept the invitation of Judge Peck to visit Cincinnati, not only because it comes from that great city, but because it comes from one of our most distinguished and honored members; but we cannot afford, gentlemen, to do anything else here except attend to our business, if we expect to avoid criticism of the people of Ohio. I should like to make a trip to Cincinnati some day myself. I am going down there at the first real good opportunity. I would like to have all the members there and I would like to have a big dinner.

Mr. PECK: What is the objection to doing it now?

Mr. WINN: My objection is this: We were elected and sent here to perform a certain duty.

Mr. PECK: Suppose we go after our work is done?

Mr. WINN: If you will accept the invitation to be dined by that club some day in June, July, August, or September, after we conclude our work and have gone back home, where we belong, I shall vote to accept the invitation, but let it be after we have concluded our work, so that we shall not go as a Convention.

Mr. FESS: As a citizen living very near to Cincinnati, I should like to see this invitation accepted if we could do it. It seems that it will take a little time after we do accept it for them to prepare. We can not accept it today and go tomorrow. That would not be fair, and since we have so very much work—I have been thinking how long it will take to read the forty-two proposals.

It will take a day to do that and a good deal of the time in calling the rolls, and there are some questions that are bound to be discussed that are of great importance to the committee on Submission. We are bound to consume some time. I agree with everybody that has spoken that we should stay here and get through with this work as soon as possible. If we could do that and have a session at Cincinnati I would be delighted to vote for it, and I therefore move that this matter be referred to the committee on Rules so they can arrange the time and conditions and report later on. I think in that way we do not jeopardize any of the work of the Convention.

The motion was carried.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that the rules be suspended and that we take up now for consideration Proposal No. 54, by Mr. Elson:

The motion was carried.

The proposal was read the third time.

The delegate from Marion was here recognized.

Mr. DOTY: Before the member starts in debate, I would like to have settled the question as to how much time debate shall occupy?

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order. The member from Marion [Mr. NORRIS] has the floor.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Marion might be allowed to take care of himself.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Marion has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS: I want to be fully heard. I have not occupied ten minutes of the time of this Convention in speaking so far, and I want to be heard fully now.

Mr. DOTY: I have no desire or power to interfere with your rights now in any way, but I think it is time to bring up the general question before we get into anything like a general debate, as to what time shall be allowed.

Mr. LAMPSON: I suggest to the members that the member from Marion [Mr. NORRIS] has occupied very little time, and I suggest that the motion be withheld until he gets through.

Mr. Norris moved to amend Proposal No. 54 as follows:

Strike out all after the word "inviolable" in line 5 insert a period and strike out the remainder of line 5 and all of lines 6 and 7.

Mr. NORRIS: With all due respect I deny that this Convention has the authority to invite the people of Ohio to surrender, or to authorize the legislature to surrender, the right of a citizen to submit his controversy, triable to a jury in a court of record, to other than a common law jury, or to accept in determination of his rights a verdict other than the united conclusion of the twelve jurors.

And I assert that the proposed amendment now before this Convention is inimical to the compact of the ordinance of 1787 relating to trial by jury and judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, as adopted by our present state constitution and the constitution of 1802, and that it is not within the legal power of this Convention to submit it, and not within the province of the people of Ohio to adopt it and accept it as a part of the organic law of this state.

On page 78 of the journal of this Convention, under date of January 24, appears Resolution No. 42. By that resolution a committee is appointed by this body to examine and report as to the binding effect of the ordinance of 1787 upon us, and the relations of that ordinance and its compacts to the constitution that may be proposed by this Convention.

Reform of Jury System.

In obedience to that authority the standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights submitted its report, declaring that the ordinance of 1787 has been suppressed by the assent of the states to the federal constitution and by the action of the supreme court of the United States, and that it only remains to complete the destruction of that great charter that the people of Ohio ratify the action of this Convention in declaring it abrogated and so cast it into oblivion. The report may be found under date of February 15 on pages 197-200 of the journal of this Convention.

This report has been received by this Convention, printed by its authority, awaits the further action of this body and finds lodgement with this proposal as a brief in its support; wherefore, with all deference to the learning and research and integrity of my colleagues of the Judiciary committee, I may take issue with them and express incidentally my unfaith in their conclusion, of which this report is the evidence.

Of all the dangers which this Convention could invite there can be nothing so fatal as the menace that slumbers in this report. It is a gratuitous and unnecessary and uncalled for, and I trust, unintentional, attempt to surrender that which belongs to posterity; an attempt to surrender that which, unless abrogated by the authority that created it, in manner provided by its terms, will endure as long as the people of Ohio, and of the states that were the Northwest Territory, shall love their country and have the spirit and courage to defend it. But once that compact is abrogated, nothing can recall that abrogation; once suppressed, as that report declares it, nothing can rehabilitate or resurrect it.

It matters not that we may now be unsuccessful in our assault upon it and that for all of this report and its attack that great charter will still live on, yet, if this report be the view of this Convention, as expressive of its willingness and wish, we then leave in the record here of the acts of men gathered by the people to make organic law that from which courts in the far future, disposed to be not jealous of the people's rights, can quote and draw conclusions, and that with which men seeking to subvert the institutions of their country can slap posterity in the face.

And all this; without demand, without requirement, without necessity and without reason.

I expect to show by the authorities cited in that report that the compacts of the ordinance of 1787 are not suppressed and not stamped out and not ended. But at farthest, when adopted by the constitution of a state of the Northwest Territory, as its compacts are and ever have been adopted by the constitution of Ohio, these compacts, thus adopted, then as a part of the ordinance, stand in abeyance and in temporary inactivity only, and do await the violation of them by the state which has thus adopted them to become reintegrate and to spring into quick life.

There is not a clause in the compacts of that ordinance that is not, either in letter or in spirit, written into the present constitution of Ohio, as they were in our constitution of 1802, and there is nothing in either of those instruments repugnant to those articles of compact.

So that except where held in abeyance by substantive articles of the federal constitution for federal purposes and to assist federal government and to guard the rights of states, which affect not the proposal here, that compact and all of it is through our state constitution in full force now. And if every state except Ohio would consent to sweep the federal constitution and its beneficent provisions out of existence, and would enact a thousand pages of tyranny in its stead, Ohio, not consenting, because of this compact, would not be bound, and could seek refuge behind and in this mighty charter.

Let us see what this ordinance is that this Convention is advised to view with cold, oblique regard as one of the many mistakes our fathers made and which I plead here in bar to this proposed amendment to the constitution of this state.

The ordinance of 1787, and the wisdom of it and in it, is admired by the statesmen of the world as the greatest charter of liberty that ever was produced. Aided perhaps by the great men of that time, it was written by either Thomas Jefferson or Nathan Dane, both of whom are even now thought by many to have been men of at least fair intellect and to a degree somewhat patriotic. That ordinance dissipated the jealousies that had arisen between the colonies immediately following the Revolutionary War, which threatened the direst calamity, and smoothed the road and made it possible for those independent nations to form of themselves the Great Republic.

Jealousy and bitterness had arisen between the colonies. The act of confederation, sometimes called the first constitution of the United States, went into effect on the 9th of July, 1778, in the midst of the revolutionary struggle. While the citizens of the respective colonies possessed certain privileges and immunities under it, yet the act of confederation was not operative proximately upon the inhabitants, either individually or collectively, but, for the purposes therein named, only upon the states. So that citizenship as we know citizenship under the federal constitution, to which every inhabitant is a party, did not then exist. (Cooley's General Principles of Constitutional Law, 26-28; 1 Wharton, 304-324. 6 Wharton, 264-413.)

And while the continental congress had jurisdiction to settle differences between the colonies and power to make provision for carrying on the war, yet, as a government, the colonies thus confederated together, were a government without citizens; it had no executive head, no courts, and no method of enforcing the ordinances of its congress other than by argument and persuasion and appeal.

This confederacy was not a nation as this report declares it. It was a league of friendship, each with the other, says the third article of the act, for their common defense, the security of their liberties and their mutual general welfare. They were bound to assist each other against all attack from any source, on any pretense whatsoever, and to effect this the union was perpetual. Each state retained its independence and its every power and jurisdiction and right which were not expressly delegated by that confederation, to effect the purposes of that union.

Reform of Jury System.

It was an alliance offensive and defensive between independent nations, and the delegates in the continental congress bore to each other more the relation of ambassadors from independent powers than otherwise. Such was the confederacy and its character, which up to the end of the Revolutionary War had been held together by common danger and by the cohesive power of common defense. The war had ended. No longer facing a common enemy and having time to contemplate it, they were astounded by the enormous debt which their victorious war had created.

This vast indebtedness was to be defrayed out of a common treasury, which was to be supplied by the respective states. All the colonies were poor. Their resources were exhausted by nearly eight years of continuous war. The vast debt to the payment of which they stood bound, and the manner of its apportionment among them and the manner of its exaction, gave promise to most of them of years of taxation and poverty and toil and final bankruptcy.

Let us see the method of taxation by which these people were being destroyed; for there is nothing new under the sun. I quote from the articles of confederation:

All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense and general welfare, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several states in proportion to the value of all lands within each state, granted to or surveyed to any person, as such land, and the improvements thereon shall be estimated, and the taxes for the paying of that portion, shall be laid and levied by the legislature of the several states.

Do you recognize this method of sapping and destroying the energy and strength of a people? It savors of the single tax which has admirers here. Why, the act of confederation even provided the recall. Men wiser than we, under the old union, before the adoption of the federal constitution, which is a radical departure from it, had tested out to the verge of ruin the dangerous fads and fancies which in this twentieth century and here so strangely challenge our approval.

Let us see the condition of the old union and the colonies after they had tried these heresies and weighed them in the balance and found them wanting. I read from a letter of Alexander Hamilton of date of December 1, 1787, fifteen months before the federal constitution went into effect, and thirteen months before the ordinance of 1787 and its compacts were read into and made a part of Virginia's corrected deed of cession of the Northwest Territory. This was the situation:

We may indeed, with propriety, be said to have reached almost the last stage of national humiliation. There is scarcely anything that can wound the pride, or degrade the character of an independent people, which we do not experience. Are there engagements, to the performance of which we are held by every tie respectable among men? These are the subjects of constant and unblushing violation. Do we owe debts to foreigners, and to our own citizens, contracted in a time of imminent peril, for the preservation of our political existence? These remain without any proper or satisfactory provision for their discharge. We have neither troops, nor treasury, nor government. Is public credit an indispensable resource in time of public danger? We seem to have abandoned its cause as desperate and irretrievable. Is commerce of importance to national wealth? Ours is at the lowest point of declension. Is respectability in the eyes of foreign powers a safeguard against foreign encroachments? The imbecility of our government even forbids them to treat with us: Our ambassadors abroad are mere pageants of mimic sovereignty. Is a violent and unnatural decrease in the value of land a symptom of national distress? The price of improved land in most parts of the country is much lower than can be accounted for by the quantity of waste land at market, and can only be fully explained by that want of public and private confidence, which are so alarmingly prevalent among all ranks, and which have a direct tendency to depreciate property of every kind. Is private credit a friend and patron of industry? The most useful kind which relates to borrowing and lending, is reduced within the narrowest limit, and this still more from an opinion of insecurity than from a scarcity of money. To shorten an enumeration of particulars which can afford neither pleasure nor instruction, it may in general be demanded, what indication is there of national disorder, poverty, and insignificance, that could befall a community so peculiarly blessed with natural advantages as we are, which does not form a part of the dark catalogue of our public misfortunes? ***

In our case, the concurrence of thirteen distinct sovereign wills is requisite under the confederation, to complete execution of every important measure that proceeds from the Union. It has happened, as was to have been foreseen. The measures of the Union have not been executed; the delinquencies of the states have, step by step, matured themselves to an extreme, which has at length arrested all the wheels of government, and brought them to an awful stand. Congress at this time scarcely possesses the means of keeping up the forms of administration, till the states can have time to agree upon a more substantial substitute for the present shadow of a federal government. Things did not come to this desperate extremity at once. The causes which have been specified, produced at first only unequal and disproportionate degrees of compliance with the requisitions of the Union. The greater deficiencies of some states furnish the pretext of example, and the temptation of interest to the complying or at least delinquent states. Why should we do more in proportion than those who are embarked with us in the same political voyage; why should we consent to bear more than our proper share of the common burthen? These were suggestions which human selfishness could not withstand, and which even speculative men who look forward to remote consequences could not, without hesitation, combat.

Reform of Jury System.

Each state, yielding to the persuasive voice of immediate interest or convenience, has successively withdrawn its support, till the frail and tottering edifice seems ready to fall upon our heads, and to crush us beneath its ruin. (Federalist, pages 139, 140, 186.)

The wealth and resources of the colonies lay in the unoccupied lands. The colonies, except Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, possessed little, if any, ungranted territory. Virginia owned an empire. The Northwest Territory concededly belonged to her. She had in it, title and possession. She owned it, water, air, earth and sky. All that vast territory, now the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota east of the Mississippi River and north of the Lake of the Woods. This territory Virginia had conquered at her own expense and with her own troops.

And this was the voice of Virginia to her sister republics: Our confederacy is going to pieces, shattered by the hardships and poverty of vast indebtedness. Let us form of ourselves the Great Republic. I will open the road; I will smooth the way; I own an empire; I will so cede it by treaty and concession that its boundless wealth may be devoted to lifting from us the burden that is crushing us, and to no other purpose whatsoever.

Then followed Virginia's deed of cession. And then the ordinance and compacts of July 13, 1787. Then the submission of the ordinance and its compacts to the Virginia legislature in 1788. Then its acceptance by the people of Virginia on the 30th of December, 1788. And then the corrected deed of cession into which by its terms the ordinance is read. (60 U. S. 503.)

And so born into the world to bless mankind was that great charter of human liberty, the ordinance of 1787.

Let me read the six articles of compact by which I claim we are bound, and which bar the submission of this proposed amendment to the people of this state. If ever writing was divinely inspired, that writing was divinely inspired:

And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory: to provide also for the establishment of states and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils on an equal footing with the original states, at as early periods as may be consistent with general interest:

It is hereby ordained and declared, by the authority aforesaid, that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original states and the people and states in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent, to-wit:

Article 1. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiment in said territory.

Article 2. The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature; and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law; all persons shall be bailable unless for capital offenses where the proof shall be evident or the presumption great; all fines shall be moderate, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted; no man shall be deprived of liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land; and should the public exigencies make it necessary for the common preservation to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same; and in the just preservation of rights and property it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made, or have force in the said territory, that shall in any manner whatever interfere with, or affect private contracts or engagements, bona fide and without fraud previously formed.

Article 3. Religion, morality and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged. * * *

Article 4. The said territory, and the states which may be formed therein shall forever remain a part of this confederacy of the United States of America, subject to the articles of confederation, and to such alterations therein as shall be constitutionally made; and to all the acts and ordinances of the United States in Congress assembled, conformable thereto. * * * The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence and carrying places between the same shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other states that may be admitted into the confederacy without any tax, impost or duty therefor.

Article 5. There shall be formed in the said territory not less than three nor more than five states; and the boundaries of the states, as soon as Virginia shall alter her act of cession and consent to the same, shall become fixed and established as follows, to-wit: * * *

And whenever any of the said states shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such state shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original states, in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and state government; provided, the constitution and government so to be formed, shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles. * * *

Article 6. There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted. * * *

The words, "the inhabitants shall always be entitled to the benefits of trial by jury and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law," do not find place in that compact as mere verbiage and interpolation, but they are classed with the greatest principles of civil and political liberty. Let us see in what light the federal courts view them. I read from Spooner vs. McConnell, 1 McLean, 364. In speaking of the ordinance, the court says:

Reform of Jury System.

Then followed the articles of compact, six in number, guaranteeing, in the most solemn and impressive forms of expression, the great principles of civil and political liberty, namely, the toleration of freedom of opinion in matters of religion; the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus; of trial by jury; and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law; the encouragement of schools, and the means of instruction, etc,

Then follows with the other compacts. So that these words speak of the most sacred of human rights, held under the substantive guarantees of that compact to be yielded up only in accordance with its terms.

But this report declares that the assent of the states to the federal constitution is the assent to the suppression of the ordinance by that constitution, and that the states generally in ordaining the federal constitution, says the report, have consented to the abrogation of the ordinance; and then the report, in glib and graceful cadence; labels its conclusion as "dry logic too reasonable for the purposes of productive litigation." Let us see about how much logic of any kind there is in this opinion.

The federal constitution went into effect on the 4th of March, 1789, three months after Virginia had accepted the ordinance and changed her deed of cession. The federal constitution was reported by the convention on the 17th of September, 1787, two months after these independent states had met in the congress of the Confederation and created the ordinance. Many members of the convention which framed the federal constitution had been members of the continental congress. Many members of the continental congress were members of the first congress under the federal constitution. Eighteen members of the first congress under the federal constitution had been members of the convention which framed the federal constitution, and that convention was in session when the ordinance was created. So it would not be violent presumption to conclude that the men who were building the great republic, holding fresh within their view these two great charters, the ordinance and the federal constitution, understood, or thought they understood, their relations one to the other.

The United States, under the articles of confederation, was for the purposes named in that act, a perpetual union. In no less than six instances in the articles is it so declared. It was a government whose constitution had been ordained by the states and not by the people. Its powers were vested in a congress consisting of delegates from independent states. It was a government of but a single department, having neither an executive, a judiciary nor a citizen. For the government of an alliance of states at peace with the world and with each other, or as a foundation upon which to rest a suitable government, it had failed.

From the act of confederation to the federal constitution was not merely a new dynasty, succeeding another in an established government. It was a new government, radically different from the old. It was a new union, inheriting only the perpetuity of the union which preceded it. They had the perpetual union, which had been formed by the states under the Confederation. But it was necessary, in order to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessing of liberty to themselves and their posterity, to form a more perfect perpetual union. Not by a constitution ordained by the states, as this logical report declares it; if ordained by the states, it would still remain a mere confederacy. But in order to form a more perfect union, we—not the states—but we, the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America. And it was adopted by the people through delegates elected for the express purpose of considering and deciding upon it; and the people of the states, as well as the states themselves, became parties to it. And it became operative upon all the people, individually and collectively, within the sphere of its power, as well as upon all the states. (Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, 26-27-28; 1 Wheaton, 304-324; 6 Wheaton, 264-413.) And so, when the iron tongue of midnight tolled off the last second of March 3, 1789, there appeared on earth for the first time an American citizen, and the Great Republic then first took its place among the nations of the earth.
